viii. 22. The balm or balsam of Gilead was celebrated in very ancient times. The tree producing it appears to be not now found in Palestine, but that it once grew there is clear, not only from Scripture, but from the writings of Josephus, Pliny, Strabo, and Tacitus.

ix. 2. Dr. Blayney remarks that "travellers in the East are not, nor ever were, accommodated at inns on the road, after the manner of that they were forced to seek for shelter there; "How are we spoiled!" How are we stripped of all our possessions. "We are greatly confounded," ashamed of ourselves and our poverty; for that is it they complain of; that is it they blush at the thoughts of, rather than of their sin; "We are confounded, because we have forsaken the land," forced so to do by the enemy; not because we have forsaken the Lord, drawn aside of our own lust and enticed; "because our dwellings have cast us out," not because our God hath cast us off. Thus unhumbled hearts lament their calamity, but not their iniquity, the procuring cause of it.

2nd. There is more still to come that shall be for a lamentation. Things are bad, but they are likely to be worse. They whose land had spewed them out, as it did their predecessors, the Canaanites, and justly, because they trod in their steps, Lev. xviii. 28, complain that they are driven into the city, but after a while those of the city, and they with them, shall be forced thence too. "Yet hear the word of the Lord," he hath something more to say to you, ver. 20; let the women hear it, whose tender spirits are apt to receive the impressions of grief and fear, for the men will not heed it, will not give it a patient hearing. The prophets will be glad to preach to a congregation of women that tremble at God's word. Let your ear receive the word of God's mouth, and bid it welcome, though it be a word of terror. Let the women teach their daughters wailing, which intimates that the trouble shall last long. Grief shall be entailed upon the generation to come. Young people are apt to love mirth, and expect mirth, and are disposed to be gay and airy, but let the elder women teach the younger to be serious; tell them what a vale of tears they must expect to find this world, and train them up among the mourners in Zion, Tit. ii. 4, 5. Let every one teach her neighbour lamentation, which intimates that the trouble shall spread far, shall go from house to house. People shall not need to sympathize with their friends, they shall all have cause enough to mourn for themselves. Note, Those that are themselves affected with the terrors of the Lord should endeavour to affect others with them. The judgment here threatened is made to look terrible.

First. Multitudes shall be slain, ver. 21. Death shall ride in triumph, and there shall be no escaping his arrests, when he comes with commission, neither within doors nor without. Not within doors, for let the doors be shut never so fast, let them be never so firmly locked and bolted, "Death comes up into our windows," like a thief in the night; it steals upon us ere we are aware. Nor doth it thus boldly attack the cottages only, but it is entered into our palaces, the palaces of our princes and great men, though never so stately, never so strongly built and guarded. Note, No palaces can keep out death. Nor are those more safe that are abroad; death "cuts off even the children from without, and the young men from the streets." The children who might have been spared by the enemy in pity, because they had never been hurtful to them, and the young men, who might have been spared in policy, because capable of being serviceable to them, yet shall fall together by the sword It is usual now, even in the severest military executions, to put none to the sword but those that are found in arms; but then even the boys and girls playing in the streets were sacrificed to the fury of the conqueror.

Secondly. Those that are slain shall be left unburied; ver. 22, "Speak, Thus saith the Lord," for the confirmation and aggravation of what was before said, "Even the carcases of men shall fall as dung," neglected, and left to be offensive to the smell, as dung is. Common humanity obligeth the survivors to bury the dead, even for their own sake; but here such numbers shall be slain, and those so dispersed all the country over, that it shall be an endless thing to bury them at all; nor shall there be hands enough to do it, nor shall the conquerors permit it; and those that should do it shall be overwhelmed with grief, so that they shall have no heart to do it. The dead bodies even of the fairest and strongest, when they have lain awhile, become as dung, such vile bodies have we. And here such multitudes shall fall that their bodies shall lie as thick as heaps of dung in the furrows of the field, and no more notice taken of them than of the handfuls which the harvestman drops for the gleaners, for none shall gather them, but they shall remain in sight, monuments of Divine vengeance, that the eye of the impenitent survivors may affect their heart. "Slay them not," bury them not, "lest my people forget," Ps. lix. 11.

23 Thus saith the LORD,
Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom,
Neither let the mighty man glory in his might,
Let not the rich man glory in his riches:
24 But let him that glorieth glory in this,
That he understandeth and knoweth me,
That I am the LORD which exercise lovingkindness,
Judgment, and righteousness, in the earth:
For in these things I delight, saith the LORD.
25 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will punish all them which are circumcised with the uncircumcised;
26 Egypt, and Judah, and Edom,
And the children of Ammon, and Moab,
And all that are in the utmost corners,
That dwell in the wilderness:
For all these nations are uncircumcised,
And all the house of Israel are uncircumcised in the heart.

The prophet had been endeavouring to possess this people with a holy fear of God and his judgments, to convince them both of sin and wrath, but still they had recourse to some sorry subterfuge or other, under which to shelter themselves from the conviction, and with which to excuse themselves in their obstinacy and carelessness; he therefore sets himself here to drive them from these refuges of lies, and to shew them the insufficiency of them.

First. When they were told how inevitable the judgment would be, they pleaded the defence of their politics and powers, which, with the help of their wealth and treasure, they thought made their city impregnable. In answer to this he shews them the folly of trusting to, and boasting of, all these stays, while they have not a God in covenant to stay themselves upon, ver. 23, 24. Here he shews,

1. What we may not depend upon in a day of distress; "Let not the wise man glory in his wisdom," as if with the help of that he could outwit or countermine the enemy, or in the greatest extremity find out some evasion or other, for a man's wisdom may fail him then when he needs it most, and he may be taken in his own craftiness. Ahithophel was befooled, and counsellors are oft led away spoiled. But if a man's policies fail him, yet sure he may gain his point by might and dint of courage. No, "Let not the strong man glory in his strength," for the battle is not always to the strong; David the stripling proves too hard for Goliath the giant. All human force is nothing without God, worse than nothing against him. But may not the rich man's wealth be his strong city? money answers all things. No, "Let not the rich man glory in his riches;" for they may prove so far from sheltering him, that they may expose him and make him the fairer mark. Let not the people boast of the wise men, and mighty men, and rich men that they have among them, as if they could make their part good against the Chaldeans, because they have wise men to advise concerning the war, mighty men to fight their battles, and rich men to bear the charges of the war. Let not particular persons think to escape the common calamity by their wisdom, might, or money, for all these will prove but vain things for safety.

2. He shews what we may depend upon in a day of distress. 1st. Our only comfort in trouble will be that we have done our duty. They that refused to know God, ver. 6, will boast in vain of their wisdom and wealth, but they that know God intelligently, that understand aright that he is the Lord, that have not only right apprehensions concerning his nature, and attributes, and relations to man, but receive and retain the impressions of them, may glory in this, it will be their rejoicing in the day of evil. 2nd. Our only confidence in trouble will be, that having through grace, in some measure, done our duty, we shall find God a God all-sufficient to us. We may glory in this, that, wherever we are, we have an acquaintance with, and an interest in, a God that "exerciseth lovingkindness, and judgment, and righteousness in the earth;" that is not only just to all his creatures, and will do no wrong to any of them, but kind to all his children, and will protect them and provide for them. "For in these things I delight;" God delights to shew kindness and to execute judgment himself, and is pleased with those who herein are "followers of him as dear children." Those that have such knowledge of the glory of God as to be changed into the same image, and to partake of his holiness, it is their perfection and glory; and the God they thus faithfully conform to they may cheerfully confide in in their greatest straits. But the prophet intimates that the generality of this people took no care about this. Their wisdom, and might, and riches, were their joy and hope, which would end in grief and despair. But those few among them that had the knowledge of God might please themselves with it, and boast themselves of it; it would stand them in better stead than thousands of gold and silver.

Secondly. When they were told how provoking their sins were to God, they vainly pleaded the covenant of their circumcision. No doubt but they were the people of God; as they had the temple of the Lord in their city, so they had the mark of his children in their flesh. It is true the Chaldean army has laid such and such nations waste because they were uncircumcised, and therefore not under the protection of the Divine providence, as we are. To this the prophet answers, that the days of visitation were now at hand, in which God would punish all wicked people, without making any distinction between the circumcised and the uncircumcised, ver. 25, 26. They had by sin profaned the crown of their peculiarity, and lived in common with the uncircumcised nations, and so had forfeited the benefit of it, and must expect to fare never the better for it. God will punish the circumcised with the uncircumcised. As the ignorance of the uncircumcised shall not excuse their wickedness, so neither shall the privileges of the circumcised excuse theirs, but they shall be punished together. Note, The Judge of all the earth is impartial, and none shall fare the better at his bar for any external advantages, but he will render to every man, circumcised or uncircumcised, according to his works. The condemnation of impenitent sinners, that are baptized, will be as sure, nay, and more severe, than that of impenitent sinners that are unbaptized. It would affect one to find here Judah industriously put between Egypt and Edom, as standing upon a level with them, and under the same doom, ver. 26. These nations were forbidden a share in the Jews' privileges, Deu. xxiii. 3; but the Jews are here told that they shall share in their punishments. Those "in the utmost corners, that dwell in the wilderness," are supposed to be the Kedarens, and those of the kingdoms of Hazor, as appears, by comparing ch. xlix. 28, 32. Some think they are so called because they dwelt, as it were, in a corner of the world; others, because they had the hair of their head polled into corners. However that was, they were of those nations that were uncircumcised in flesh, and the Jews are ranked with them, and are as near to ruin for their sins as they; for "all the house of Israel are uncircumcised in the heart." They have the sign, but not the thing signified, ch. iv. 4. They are heathens in their heart, strangers to God, and enemies in their minds by wicked words. Their hearts are disposed to idols, as the hearts of the uncircumcised Gentiles are. Note, The seals of the covenant, though they dignify and oblige us, yet they will not save us, unless the temper of our minds, and the tenor of our lives, agree with the covenant. That only is circumcision, and that baptism, which is of the heart Rom. ii. 28, 29.

CHAPTER X.

We may conjecture that the prophecy of this chapter was delivered after the first captivity, in the time of Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin, when many were carried away to Babylon; for it has a double reference. I. To those that were carried away into the land of the Chaldeans, a country notorious above any other for idolatry and superstition; and they are here cautioned against the infection of the place, not to learn the way of the heathen, ver. 1,,2, for their astrology and idolatry are both foolish things, ver. 3—5, the worshippers of idols brutish, ver. 8, 9, and so it will appear in the day of their visitation, ver. 14, 15. They are likewise exhorted to adhere firmly to the God of Israel, for there is none like him, ver. 6, 7; he is the true God, lives for ever, and has the government of the world, ver. 10—13; and his people are happy in him, ver. 16. II. To those that yet remained in their own land; and they are cautioned against security, and bidden to expect distress, ver. 17, 18; and that by a foreign enemy which God would bring upon them for their sin, ver. 20—22. This calamity the prophet laments, ver. 19, and prays for the mitigation of it, ver. 23—25.

HEAR ye the word which the LORD speaketh unto you, O house of Israel: 2 Thus saith the LORD,
Learn not the way of the heathen,
And be not dismayed at the signs of heaven;
For the heathen are dismayed at them.
3 For the customs of the people are vain:

European nations. In some towns indeed, but not in all, there are large public buildings provided for their reception, which they call caravanseras, but these afford merely a covering, being absolutely without furniture. In passing through the desert it is well if they can find a cave or a hut which some one before them may have erected for a temporary shelter." There are cases, however, in which travellers meet with places to lodge in specially erected for the purpose.

ix. 25, 26. The Divine justice would be impartial: circumcision would avail nothing, and uncircumcision would avail nothing. Not merely the Jew who gloried in the law, but his pagan neighbours—Egyptians, Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites—would be overtaken by chastisement. The phrase, "all that are in the utmost corners, that dwell in the wilderness," is not well translated. The Hebrew is idiomatic, and will scarcely bear a literal translation; but there is little doubt that it describes certain inhabitants of the desert who

For one cutteth a tree out of the forest,

GODS OF THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

4 They deck it with silver and with gold;
They fasten it with nails and with hammers,
That it move not.
5 They are upright as the palm tree,
But speak not:
They must needs be borne,
Because they cannot go.
Be not afraid of them; for they cannot do evil,
Neither also is it in them to do good.
6 Forasmuch as there is none like unto thee, O LORD;
Thou art great, and thy name is great in might.
7 Who would not fear thee, O King of nations?
For to thee doth it appertain:
Forasmuch as among all the wise men of the nations,
And in all their kingdoms, there is none like unto thee.
8 But they are altogether brutish and foolish:
The stock is a doctrine of vanities.
9 Silver spread into plates is brought from Tarshish,
And gold from Uphaz,
The work of the workman,
And of the hands of the founder:
Blue and purple is their clothing:
They are all the work of cunning men.

DRESSED IMAGES.

10 But the LORD is the true God,
He is the living God, and an everlasting king:
At his wrath the earth shall tremble,
And the nations shall not be able to abide his indignation.
11 Thus shall ye say unto them,
The gods that have not made the heavens and the earth,
Even they shall perish from the earth, and from under these heavens.
12 He hath made the earth by his power,
He hath established the world by his wisdom,
And hath stretched out the heavens by his discretion.
13 When he uttereth his voice, there is a multitude of waters in the heavens, [of the earth;
And he causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends
He maketh lightnings with rain,
And bringeth forth the wind out of his treasures.
14 Every man is brutish in his knowledge:
Every founder is confounded by the graven image:
For his molten image is falsehood,
And there is no breath in them.
15 They are vanity, and the work of errors:
In the time of their visitation they shall perish
16 The portion of Jacob is not like them:
For he is the former of all things;
And Israel is the rod of his inheritance:
The LORD of hosts is his name.

The prophet Isaiah, when he prophesied of the captivity in Babylon, added warnings against idolatry, and largely exposed the sottishness of idolaters; not only because the temptations in Babylon would be in danger of drawing the Jews there to idolatry, but because the afflictions in Babylon were designed to cure them of their idolatry. Thus the prophet Jeremiah here arms people against the idolatrous usages and customs of the heathen; not only for the use of those that were gone to Babylon, but of those also that stayed behind; that, being convinced and reclaimed by the word of God, the rod might be prevented, and it is written for our learning. Observe here,

First. A solemn charge given to the people of God not to conform themselves to the ways and customs of the heathen. Let the house of Israel hear and receive this word from the God of Israel, "Learn not the way of the heathen;" do not approve of it, no, nor think indifferently concerning it, much less imitate it, or accustom yourselves to it. Let not any of their customs steal in among you, as they are apt to do insensibly, nor mingle themselves with your religion. Note, It ill becomes those that are taught of God, to learn the way of the heathen, and to think of worshipping the true God with such rites and ceremonies as they used in the worship of their false gods: see Deu. xii. 29—31. It was the way of the heathen to worship the host of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars; to whom they gave Divine honours, and from them they expected Divine favours, and therefore according as the signs of heaven were, whether they were auspicious or ominous, they thought themselves countenanced or discountenanced by their deities; which made them observe those signs, the eclipses of the sun and moon, the conjunctions and oppositions of the planets, and all the unusual phenomena of the celestial globe, with a great deal of anxiety and trembling. Business was stopped, if any thing occurred that was thought to bode ill; if it did but thunder on their left hand they were almost as if they had been thunderstruck. Now God would not have his people to be "dismayed at the signs of heaven;" to reverence the stars as deities, or to frighten themselves with any prognostications grounded upon them. Let them fear the God of heaven, and keep up a reverence of his providence, and then they need not be dismayed at the signs of heaven, for the stars in their courses fight not against any that are at peace with God. The heathen are dismayed at these signs, for they know no better; but let not the house of Israel, that are taught of God, be so.

Secondly. Divers good reasons given to enforce this charge.

1. The way of the heathen is very ridiculous and absurd, and is condemned even by the dictates of right reason, ver. 3. The statutes and ordinances of the heathen are vanity itself, they cannot stand the test of a rational disquisition. This is again and again insisted upon here, as it was by Isaiah. The Chaldeans valued themselves by their wisdom, in which they thought they excelled all their neighbours; but the prophet here shews that they and all others that worshipped idols, and expected help and relief from them, were brutish and sottish, and had not common sense.

1st. Consider what the idol is that is worshipped. It was a tree cut out of the forest originally, it was fitted up by the hands of the workman, squared and sawed, and worked into shape: see Isa. xliv. 12, &c. But after all it was but the stock of a tree, fitter to make a gate-post of than any thing else. But to hide the wood they deck it with silver and gold, they gild or lacker it, or they deck it with gold and silver lace, or cloth of tissue. They fasten it to its place, which they themselves have assigned it, with nails and hammers, that it fall not, or be thrown down, or stolen away, ver. 14. The image is made straight enough, and it cannot be denied but that the workman did his part, for it is upright as the palm-tree, ver. 5. It looks stately, and stands up as if it were going to speak to you, but it cannot speak, it is a poor dumb creature; nor can it take one step towards your relief. If there be any occasion for it to shift its place, it must be carried in procession, for it cannot go. Very fitly doth it come in here, "Be not afraid of them," no more than of the signs of heaven. "Be not afraid" of incurring their displeasure, "for they can do no evil;" be not afraid of forfeiting their favour, for "neither is it in them to do good." If you think to mend the matter by mending the materials of which the idol is made, you deceive yourselves. Idols of gold and silver are as unworthy to be worshipped as wooden gods, "The stock is a doctrine of vanities," ver. 8; it teacheth lies, teacheth lies concerning God. It is an instruction of vanities; wood it is. It is likely the idols of gold and silver had wood underneath for the substratum; and then "silver spread into plates is brought from Tarshish," imported from beyond sea, "and gold from Uphaz," or Phaz, which is sometimes rendered, the fine gold, Ps. xxi. 3. A great deal of art is used, and pains taken about it. They are trimmed their beards in a peculiar manner. Our translators almost guessed as much, for in the margin they say the Hebrew means, "cut off into corners, or having the corners of their hair polled." The custom of some Arabian tribes was to clip or shave off the hair near the ears and temples, as stated by Herodotus (iii. 8). Niebuhr's description of the modern practice, given in his account of Arabia (p. 59), shows that the Jews in this respect were distinguished from others who shaved near the ears and temples.

x. 2. The superstitious of all ages gave a prophetic sense to the appearance of comets, mock suns, rainbows, &c., and to the occurrence of eclipses, thunder-storms, &c. The Chaldeans especially attended to such things, and were influenced by them.

x. 3—5. The idol-worship of the heathen is as absurd as their observation of planets, stars, comets, &c. Compare Isa. xl. 18—20; xliv. 9—20.

x. 9. Where Tarshish was, whether in Spain or India, for example, not such ordinary mechanics that are employed about these as about the wooden gods, ver. 3. These are cunning men; it is "the work of the workman," the graver must do his part when it has past through "the hands of the founder." Those were but decked here and there with silver and gold, these are gold and silver all over. And that these gods might be reverenced as kings, "blue and purple is their clothing," the colour of royal robes, ver. 9, which amuseth ignorant worshippers, but makes the matter no better. For what is the idol when it is made, and when they have made the best they can of it? He tells us, ver. 14, "They are falsehood," they are not what they pretend to be, but a great cheat put upon the world. They are worshipped as the gods that give us breath, and life, and sense, whereas they are lifeless, senseless things themselves, "and there is no breath in them;" 'no spirit in them,' so the word is; they are not animated or inhabited, as they are supposed to be, by any Divine spirit, or Numen; they are so far from being gods, that they have not so much as "the spirit of a beast that goes downward." "They are vanity, and the work of errors," ver. 15. Inquire into the use of them, and you will find they are vanity; they are good for nothing, no help is to be expected from them, nor any confidence put in them. They are a deceitful work, works of illusions, or mere mockeries; so some read the following clause. They delude those that put their trust in them, make fools of them, or rather, they make fools of themselves. Inquire into the rise of them, and they are the work of errors, grounded upon the grossest mistakes that ever men that pretended to reason were guilty of. They are the creatures of a deluded fancy; and the errors by which they were produced they propagate among their worshippers.

2nd. Infer from hence what the idolaters are that worship these idols; ver. 8, "They are altogether brutish and foolish;" they that make them are like unto them, senseless and stupid, and there is no spirit in them; no use of reason, else they would never believe in such gods; no sense of honour, else they would never stoop to them; ver. 14, "Every man" that makes or worships idols, is become "brutish in his knowledge;" that is, brutish for want of knowledge; or brutish in that very thing which one would think they should be fully acquainted with: compare Jude 10, "What they know naturally," what they cannot but know by the light of nature, "in those things as brute beasts they corrupt themselves." Though in the works of creation they cannot but see the eternal power and godhead of the Creator, yet they "are become vain in their imaginations, not liking to retain God in their knowledge:" see Rom. i. 21, 28. Nay, whereas they thought it a piece of wisdom thus to multiply gods, it really was the greatest folly they could be guilty of. "The world by wisdom knew not God," 1 Cor. i. 21; Rom. i. 22. "Every founder is" himself "confounded by the graven image;" when he has made it by a mistake, he is more and more confirmed in his mistake by it; he is bewildered, bewitched, and cannot disentangle himself from the snare. Or, it is what he will one time or other be ashamed of.

2. The God of Israel is the one only living and true God, and those that have him for their God need not make their application to any other; nay, to set up any other in competition with him is the greatest affront and injury that can be done him. Let the house of Israel cleave to the God of Israel, and serve and worship him only; for,

1st. He is a nonsuch. Whatever men may set in competition with him, there is none to be compared with him. The prophet turns from speaking with the utmost disdain of the idols of the heathen, as well he might, to speak with the most profound and awful reverence of the God of Israel, ver. 6, 7, "Forasmuch as there is none like unto thee, O Lord," none of all the heroes which the heathen have deified, and make such ado about; the dead men of whom they made dead images, and worshipped them. Some were deified and adored for their wisdom; but among all the wise men of the nations, the greatest philosophers, or statesmen, as Apollo or Hermes, there is none like thee. Others were deified and adored for their dominion; but in all their royalty, so it may be read, among all their kings, as Saturn and Jupiter, there is none like unto thee. What is the glory of a man that invented a useful art, or founded a flourishing kingdom, (and these were grounds sufficient among the heathen to entitle men to an apotheosis,) compared with the glory of Him that is the Creator of the world, and that "formeth the spirit of man within him?" What is the glory of the greatest prince or potentate compared with the glory of Him whose "kingdom ruleth over all?" He acknowledgeth, ver. 6, "O Lord, thou art great," infinite and immense, and "thy name is great in might," thou hast all power, and art known to have it. Men's name is often beyond their might; they are thought to be greater than they are; but God's name is great, and no greater than he really is. And, therefore, "Who would not fear thee, O King of nations?" Who would not choose to worship such a God as this, that can do every thing, rather than such dead idols as the heathen worship, that can do nothing? Who would not be afraid of offending or forsaking a God whose name is so great in might? Which of all the nations, if they understand themselves aright, would not fear him who is the King of nations? Note, It is not only the house of Israel that is bound to worship the great Jehovah as the God of Israel, the King of saints, Rev. xv. 4, 5, but all the families of the earth are bound to worship him as King of nations; for to him it doth appertain, to him it suits and agrees. Note, There is an admirable decency and congruity in the worshipping of God only. It is fit that he that is God alone should alone be served; that he that is Lord of all should be served by all; that he that is great should be greatly feared and greatly praised.

2nd. His verity is as evident as the idols' vanity, ver. 10. They are the work of men's hands; and therefore nothing is more plain than that it is a jest to worship them, if that may be called a jest which is so great an indignity to him that made us. "But the Lord is the true God," the God of truth, he is God in truth; God Jehovah is truth; he is not a counterfeit and pretender as they are, but is really what he has revealed himself to be; he is one we may depend upon, in whom and by whom we cannot be deceived. First. Look upon him as he is in himself, and he is the living God; he is life itself, has life in himself, and is the Fountain of life to all the creatures. The gods of the heathen are dead things, worthless and useless; but ours is a living God, and hath immortality. Secondly. Look upon him with relation to his creatures, and he is a king, and absolute monarch over them all; is their owner and ruler, has an incontestable right both to command them and dispose of them. As a king he protects the creatures, provides for their welfare, and preserves peace among them. He is an everlasting king. The counsels of his kingdom were from everlasting, and the continuance of it will be to everlasting. He is a king of eternity. The idols whom they call their kings are but of yesterday, and will soon be abolished; and the kings of the earth that set them up to be worshipped will themselves be in the dust shortly; but "the Lord shall reign for ever, thy God, O Zion, unto all generations."

3rd. None knows the power of his anger. Let us stand in awe, and not dare to provoke him by giving that glory to another which is due to him alone; for at his wrath the earth shall tremble, even the strongest and stoutest of the kings of the earth; nay, the earth, as firmly as it is fixed, when he pleaseth, is made to quake, and the rocks to tremble, Ps. civ. 32; Hab. iii. 6, 10. Though the nations should join together to contend with him, and unite their force, yet they would be found utterly unable not only to resist, but even to abide his indignation. They cannot only not make head against it, for it would overcome them, but they cannot bear up under it, for it would overload them, Ps. lxxvi, 7, 8; Nah. i. 6.

4th. He is the God of nature, the Fountain of all being; and all the powers of nature are at his command and dispose, ver. 12, 13. The God we worship is he that made the heavens and the earth, and has a sovereign dominion over both. So that his invisible things are manifested and proved in the things that are seen.

First. If we look back we find that the whole world owed its original to him, as its first cause. It was a common saying, even among the Greeks, 'He that sets up to be another god ought first to make another world.' While the heathen worship gods that they made, we worship the God that made us and all things. 1*st.* The earth is a body of vast bulk, has valuable treasures in its bowels, and more valuable fruit on its surface. It and them he hath made by his power; and it is by no less than an infinite power that it hangs upon nothing, as it doth, Job xxvi. 7; ponderibus librata suis,—'poised by its own weight.' 2*nd.* The world, the habitable part of the earth, is admirably fitted for the use and service of man, and he hath established it so by his wisdom, so that it continues serviceable in constant changes and yet a continual stability from one generation to another. Therefore both the earth and the world are his, Ps. xxiv. 1. 3*rd.* The heavens are wonderfully stretched out to an incredible extent, and it is by his discretion that they are so, and that the motions of the heavenly bodies are directed for the benefit of this lower world. These declare his glory, Ps. xix. 1, and oblige us to declare it; and not give that glory to the heavens which is due to him that made them.

Secondly. If we look up, we see his providence to be a continued creation; ver. 13, "When he uttereth his voice," gives the word of command, "there is a multitude of waters in the heavens," which are poured out on the earth, whether for judgment or mercy, as he intends them. When he uttereth his voice in the thunder, presently there follow thunder showers, in which there are a multitude of waters; and those come with a noise, as the margin reads it; and we read of the noise of abundance of rain, 1 Kin. xviii. 41. Nay, there are wonders done daily in the kingdom of nature without noise; "He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth," from all parts of the earth, even the most remote, and chiefly those that lie next the sea. All the earth pays the tribute of vapours, because all the earth receives the blessing of rain. And thus the moisture in the universe, like the money in a kingdom, and the blood in the body, is continually circulating for the good of the whole. Those vapours produce wonders, for of them are formed lightnings for the rain, and the winds, which God from time to time brings forth out of his treasures, as there is occasion for them, directing them all in such measure, and for such use, as he thinks fit, as payments are made out of the treasury. All the meteors are so ready to serve God's purposes, that he seems to have treasures of them that cannot be exhausted, and may at any time be drawn from, Ps. cxxxv. 7. God glories in the treasures he has of these, Job xxxviii. 22, 23. This God can do; but which of the idols of the heathen can do the like? Note, There is no sort of weather but furnisheth us with a proof and instance of the wisdom and power of the great Creator.

5th. This God is Israel's God in covenant, and the felicity of every Israelite indeed. Therefore let the house of Israel cleave to him, and not forsake him to embrace idols; for if they do they certainly change for the worse; for, ver. 16, "The portion of Jacob is not like them." Their rock is not as our rock, Deu. xxxii. 31, nor ours like their mole-hills. Note, First. They that have the Lord for their God have a full and complete happiness in him. The God of Jacob is the portion of Jacob; he is his all, and in him he hath enough, and needs no more in this world or the other. In him we have a worthy portion, Ps. xvi. 5. Secondly. If we have an entire satisfaction and complacency in God as our portion, he will have a gracious delight in us as his people, whom he owns as the rod of his inheritance, his possession and treasure, with whom he dwells, and by whom he is served and honoured. Thirdly. It is the unspeakable comfort of all the Lord's people, that he that is their God is the former of all things, and therefore is able to do all that for them, and give all that to them, which they stand in need of. Their help stands in his name who made heaven and earth; and he is the Lord of hosts, of all the hosts in heaven and earth; hath them all at his command, and will command them into the service of his people, when there is occasion. This is the name by which they know him, which they first give him the glory of, and then take to themselves the comfort of. Fourthly. Herein God's people are happy above all other people,—happy indeed, bona si sua norint,—'did they but know their blessedness.' The gods which the heathen pride, and please, and so portion themselves in, are vanity and a lie; but "the portion of Jacob is not like them."

Thirdly. The prophet having thus compared the gods of the heathen with the God of Israel, (between whom there is no comparison,) reads the doom, the certain doom, of all those pretenders, and directs the Jews in God's name to read it to the worshippers of idols, though they were their lords and masters; ver. 11. "Thus shall ye say unto them," and the God ye serve will bear you out in saying it, "The gods which have not made the heavens and the earth," and therefore are no gods, but usurpers of the honour due to him only who did make heaven and earth, "those shall perish," perish of course, because they are vanity; perish by his righteous sentence, because they are rivals with him. As gods they shall perish "from off the earth," even all those things on earth beneath which they make gods of, "and from under these heavens," even all those things in the firmament of heaven, under the highest heavens, which are deified, according to the distribution in the second commandment. These words in the original are not in the Hebrew, like all the rest, but in the Chaldee dialect, that the Jews in captivity might have this ready to say to the Chaldeans in their own language, when they tempted them to idolatry, Do you press us to worship your gods? We will never do that; for, 1*st.* They are counterfeit deities. They are no gods; for they "have not made the heavens and the earth," and therefore are not entitled to our homage, nor are we indebted to them either for the products of the earth or the influences of heaven, as we are to the God of Israel. The primitive Christians would say, when they were urged to worship such a god, 'Let him make me a world, and he shall be my god.' While we have him to worship who made heaven and earth, it is very absurd to worship any other. 2*nd.* They are condemned deities. They shall perish; the time shall come when they shall be no more respected as they are now, but shall be buried in oblivion, and they and their worshippers shall sink together; the earth shall no longer bear them, the heavens shall no longer cover them, but both shall abandon them. It is repeated, ver. 15, "In the time of their visitation," when God comes to reckon with idolaters, he shall make them sick of their idols, and glad to be rid of them; they shall "cast them to the moles and to the bats," Isa. ii. 20. Whatever runs against God and religion will be run down at last.

17 Gather up thy wares out of the land,
O inhabitant of the fortress.

Behold, I will sling out the inhabitants of the land at or in both, cannot here be discussed, but the reader will find a summary of opinions in "Cassell's Bible Dictionary," in "Smith's Dictionary of the Bible," and in other similar works. There is equal uncertainty in respect to Uphaz, which after all may only be a mis-spelling of the word Ophir, the site of which is as unsettled as that of Tarshish.

x. 11. It is very curious that this verse is introduced into the Hebrew Bible in the Chaldee language. Some have explained this by saying that the prophet employs the actual words to be used by the exiles in Babylonia. But if so, why is the Chaldee form found in the introductory words, "Thus shall ye say unto them?" Of course, it is possible that Jeremiah wrote the verse in Chaldee; but it is more probable either that it is an interpolation or that the Chaldee version was substituted at a very ancient date. There is no valid reason for rejecting it as an interpolation, because it agrees with the following verse, and it is found in all the oldest versions. On the whole, there-

And will distress them, that they may find it so.
19 Woe is me for my hurt!
My wound is grievous; but I said,
Truly this is a grief, and I must bear it.
20 My tabernacle is spoiled, and all my cords are broken:
My children are gone forth of me, and they are not:
There is none to stretch forth my tent any more,
And to set up my curtains.
21 For the pastors are become brutish,
And have not sought the LORD:
Therefore they shall not prosper,
And all their flocks shall be scattered.
22 Behold, the noise of the bruit is come,
And a great commotion out of the north country,
To make the cities of Judah desolate,
And a den of dragons.
23 O LORD, I know that the way of man is not in himself:
It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps.
24 O LORD, correct me, but with judgment;
Not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing.
25 Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not,
And upon the families that call not on thy name:
For they have eaten up Jacob,
And devoured him, and consumed him,
And have made his habitation desolate.

In these verses,

First. The prophet threatens in God's name the approaching ruin of Judah and Jerusalem, ver. 17, 18. The Jews that continued in their own land, after some were carried into captivity, were very secure. They thought themselves inhabitants of a fortress, their country was their stronghold, and in their own conceit impregnable, but they are here bidden to think of leaving it; they must prepare to go after their brethren, and pack up their effects in expectation of it. "Gather up thy wares out of the land," contract your affairs, and bring them into as little a compass as you can. "Arise, depart, this is not your rest," Mic. ii. 10. Let not what you have lie scattered, for the Chaldeans will be upon you again, to be the executioners of the sentence God has passed upon you; ver. 18, "Behold, I will sling out the inhabitants of the land at this once." They have hitherto dropped out, by a few at a time, but one captivity more shall make a thorough riddance, and they shall be slung out as a stone out of a sling, so easily, so thoroughly, shall they be cast out; nothing of them shall remain; they shall be thrown out with violence, and driven to a place at a great distance off in a little time: see this comparison used to signify an utter destruction, 1 Sam. xxv. 29. Yet once more God will shake their land, and shake the wicked out of it, Heb. xii. 26. He adds, "And I will distress them, that they may find it so." He will not only throw them out hence, (that he may do, and yet they may be easy elsewhere,) but wherever they shall go trouble shall follow them; they shall be continually perplexed and straitened, and at a loss within themselves; and who or what can make those easy whom God will distress? Whom he will distress, that they may find it so; that is, that they may feel that which they would not believe. They were told many a time of the weight of God's wrath, and their utter inability to make head against it, or bear up under it; were told that their sin would be their ruin, and they would not regard or credit what was told them, but now they shall find it so; and therefore God will pursue them with his judgments, that they may find it so, and be forced to acknowledge it. Note, Sooner or later sinners will find it just so as the word of God has represented things to them, and no better, and that the threatenings were not bugbears.

Secondly. He brings in the people sadly lamenting their calamities; ver. 19, "Woe is me for my hurt!" Some make this the prophet's own lamentation, not for himself, but for the calamities and desolations of his country. He mourned for those that would not be persuaded to mourn for themselves; and since there were none that had so much sense as to join with him, he weeps in secret, and cries out, "Woe is me!" In mournful times it becomes us to be of a mournful spirit. But it may be taken as the language of the people, considered as a body, and therefore speaking as a single person. It is what they should say. The prophet puts these words into their mouths; whether they would say them or no, they should have cause to say them. Some among them would thus bemoan themselves, and all of them at last would be forced to do it. They lament it,

1. That the affliction is very great, and it is very hard to them to bear it; the more hard, because they had not been used to trouble, and now did not expect it. "Woe is me for my hurt!" not for what I fear, but for what I feel; for they are not, as some are, worse frightened than hurt. Nor is it a slight hurt, but a wound, a wound that is grievous, very painful, and very threatening.

2. That there is no remedy but patience. They cannot help themselves, but must sit still, and abide it. "But I said," when I was about to complain of my wound, To what purpose is it to complain? "This is a grief, and I must bear it" as well as I can. This is the language rather of a sullen than of a gracious submission; of a patience perforce, not a patience by principle. When I am in affliction, I should say, This is an evil, and I will bear it, because it is the will of God I should; because his wisdom has appointed this for me, and his grace will make it work for good to me. This is receiving evil at the hand of God, Job ii. 10; but to say, This is an evil, and I must bear it, because I cannot help it, is but a brutal patience, and argues a want of those good thoughts of God which we should always have, even under our afflictions, saying, not only, God can and will do what he pleaseth, but, Let him do what he pleaseth.

3. That the country was quite ruined and wasted; ver. 10, "My tabernacle is spoiled." Jerusalem, though a strong city, now proves as weak and movable as a tabernacle. Their government is dissolved, and their state fallen to pieces, like a tabernacle or tent, when it is taken down, and all its cords, that should keep it together, are broken. Or, by the tabernacle here may be meant the temple, the sanctuary, which at first was but a tabernacle, and is now called so, as then it was sometimes called a temple. Their church is ruined, and all the supports of it fail. It was a general destruction of church and state, city and country; and there were none to repair these desolations; "My children are gone forth of me," some are fled, others slain, others carried into captivity, so that as to me they are not. I am like to be an outcast, and to perish for want of shelter; for "there is none to stretch forth my tent any more," none of my children that used to do it for me, "none to set up my curtains," none to do me any service. "Jerusalem has none to guide her of all her sons," ch. li. 18.

4. That the rulers took no care, nor any proper measures, for the redress of their grievances, and the re-establishing of their ruined state; ver. 21, "The pastors are become brutish." When the tents, the shepherds' tents, were spoiled, ver. 20, it concerned the shepherds to look after them, but they were foolish shepherds. Their kings and princes had no regard at all to the public welfare, seemed to have no sense of the desolations of the land, but were quite besotted and infatuated. The priests, the pastors of God's tabernacle, did a great deal towards the ruin of religion, but nothing towards the repair of it. They are brutish indeed; for "they have not sought the Lord;" they have neither made their peace with him nor their prayer to him; they had no eye to him and his providence, in their management of their affairs; they neither acknowledged the judgment nor expected the deliverance to come from his hand. Note, Those are brutish people that do not seek the Lord, that live without prayer, and live without God in the world. Every man is either a saint or a brute; but it is sad indeed with a people when their pastors, that should feed them with knowledge and understanding, are themselves thus brutish. And what comes of it? "Therefore they shall not prosper;" none of their attempts for the public safety shall succeed. Note, Those cannot expect to prosper who do not by faith and prayer take God along with them in all their ways. And when the pastors are brutish, what else can be expected but that all their flocks should be scattered; for "if the blind lead the blind, both will fall into the ditch." The ruin of a people is often owing to the brutishness of their pastors.

5. That the report of the enemy's approach was very dreadful; ver. 22, "The noise of the bruit is come," that is, of the report which at first was but whispered and bruited abroad, as wanting confirmation. It now proves too true; there is a great commotion ariseth out of the north country, which threatens to make all the cities of Judah desolate, and a den of dragons; for they must all expect to be sacrificed to the avarice and fury of the Chaldean army. And what else can that place expect but to be made a den of dragons, which has by sin made itself a den of thieves.

Thirdly. He turns to God, and addresseth himself to him, finding it to little purpose to speak to the people. It is some comfort to poor ministers, that if men will not hear them God will; and to him they have liberty of access at all times. Let them close their preaching with prayer, as the prophet, and then they shall have no reason to say they have laboured in vain.

1. The prophet here acknowledgeth the sovereignty and dominion of the Divine providence, that by it, and not by their own will and wisdom, the affairs both of nations and particular persons are directed and determined, ver. 23. This is an article of our faith, which is very proper for us to make confession of at the throne of grace, when we are complaining of an affliction, or suing for a mercy. "O Lord, I know," and believe, "that the way of man is not in himself." Nebuchadnezzar did not come of himself against our land, but by the direction of a Divine providence. We cannot of ourselves do any thing for our own relief, unless God work with us, and command deliverance for us; for, "it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps," though he seem in his walking to be perfectly at liberty, and to choose his own way. Those that had promised themselves a long enjoyment of their estates and possessions, when they were thrown out by the Chaldeans were made to know, by sad experience, that "the way of man is not in himself." The designs which men lay deep, and think well formed, are dashed to pieces in a moment. We must all apply this to ourselves, and mix faith with it, that we are not at our own dispose, but under a Divine direction; the event is often overruled quite contrary to our intention and expectation. We are not masters of our own way, nor can we think that every thing should be according to our mind; we must therefore refer ourselves to God, and acquiesce in his will. Some think the prophet mentions this here with design to make this comfortable use of it, that the way of the Chaldean army being not in themselves, they can do no more than God permits them; he can set bounds to these proud waves, and say, "Hitherto they shall come, and no farther." And a quieting consideration it is, that the most formidable enemies have no power against us, but what is given them from above.

2. He deprecates the Divine wrath, that it might not fall upon God's Israel, ver. 24. He speaks not for himself only, but on the behalf of his people; "O Lord, correct me, but with judgment," that is, in measure and with moderation, and in wisdom, no more than is necessary for the driving out of the foolishness that is bound up in our hearts. "Not in thine anger." How severe soever the correction be, let it come from thy love, and be designed for our good, and made to work for good; not to bring us to nothing, but to bring us home to thyself. Let it not be according to the desert of our sins, but according to the designs of thy grace. Note, 1st. We cannot pray in faith that we may never be corrected, while we are conscious to ourselves that we need it and deserve it, and know that as many as God loves he chastens. 2nd. The great thing we should dread in affliction is the wrath of God. Say not, Lord, do not correct me, but Lord, do not correct me in anger; for that will infuse wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery; that will "bring us to nothing." We may bear the smart of his rod, but we cannot bear the weight of his wrath.

3. He imprecates the Divine wrath against the oppressors and persecutors of Israel; ver. 25, "Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not." This prayer doth not come from a spirit of malice or revenge, nor is it intended to prescribe to God whom he should execute his judgments upon, or in what order; but, 1st. It is an appeal to his justice; as if he had said, 'Lord, we are a provoking people, but are there not other nations that are more so? And shall we only be punished? We are thy children, and may expect a fatherly correction; but they are thine enemies, and against them we have reason to think thine indignation should be, not against us.' This is God's usual method. The cup put into the hands of God's people is full of mixture, mixture of mercy; but the dregs of the cup are reserved for the wicked of the earth; let them wring them out, Ps. lxxv. 8. 2nd. It is a prediction of God's judgments upon all the impenitent enemies of his church and kingdom. If judgment begin thus at the house of God, what shall be the end of those that obey not his Gospel? 1 Pet. iv. 17. See how the heathen are described, on whom God's fury shall be poured out. First. They are strangers to God, and are content to be so. They know him not, nor desire to know him. They are families that live without prayer, that have nothing of religion among them; they call not on God's name. And those that restrain prayer, it is an evidence they know not God; for they that know him will seek to him, and intreat his favour. Secondly. They are persecutors of the people of God, and are resolved to be so. They have eaten up Jacob, with as much greediness as those that are hungry eat their necessary food; nay, with more, for they never know when they have enough. They have devoured him, and consumed him, and made his habitation desolate, that is, the land in which he lives; or the temple of God fore, we think the Chaldee translation of Jeremiah's Hebrew words occurs in this place, and that it crept in at a very early period. At the same time it is but right to observe that the words are treated as an interpolation or as a marginal note by a good many modern critics.

x. 14, 15. For "brutish in his knowledge" the margin has, "more brutish than to know;" i.e., "is so brutish as not to know," which we think is more correct. Dr. Henderson has "brutish without knowledge." The "founder" is one who founds or casts a molten image of metal. A "work of errors" should be "a work of mockeries," i.e., a ridiculous work; and the word for "visitation" is to be understood of punishment.

x. 17. The word "wares" here should rather be "baggage," and "fortress" means a place which is besieged, referring to Jerusalem.

x. 19, 20. Here the prophet speaks in the person of the Hebrews, who would thus lament over the calamities which overtook them.

which is his habitation among them. Note, What the heathen, in their rage and malice, do against the people of God, though therein he makes use of them as the instruments of his correction, yet he will for that make them the objects of his indignation. This prayer is taken from Ps. lxxix. 6, 7.

CHAPTER XI.

In this chapter, I. God by the prophet puts the people in mind of the covenant he had made with their fathers; and how much he had insisted upon it, as the condition of the covenant, that they should be obedient to him, ver. 1—7. II. He chargeth it upon them, that they in succession to their fathers, and in confederacy among themselves, had obstinately refused to obey him, ver. 8—10. III. He threatens to punish them with utter ruin for their disobedience, especially for their idolatry, ver. 11, 13, and tells them, that their idols should not save them, ver. 12, that their prophets should not pray for them, ver. 14, and justifies his proceedings herein, they having brought all this mischief upon themselves by their own folly and wilfulness, ver. 15—17. IV. Here is an account of a conspiracy formed against Jeremiah by his fellow-citizens, the men of Anathoth; God's discovery of it to him, ver. 18, 19; his prayer against them, ver. 20; and a prediction of God's judgments upon them for it, ver. 21—23.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Hear ye the words of this covenant, and speak unto the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem; 3 And say thou unto them, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel; Cursed be the man that obeyeth not the words of this covenant, 4 Which I commanded your fathers in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, from the iron furnace, saying, Obey my voice, and do them, according to all which I command you: so shall ye be my people, and I will be your God: 5 That I may perform the oath which I have sworn unto your fathers, to give them a land flowing with milk and honey, as it is this day. Then answered I, and said, So be it, O LORD. 6 Then the LORD said unto me, Proclaim all these words in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem, saying, Hear ye the words of this covenant, and do them. 7 For I earnestly protested unto your fathers in the day that I brought them up out of the land of Egypt, even unto this day, rising early and protesting, saying, Obey my voice. 8 Yet they obeyed not, nor inclined their ear, but walked every one in the imagination of their evil heart: therefore I will bring upon them all the words of this covenant, which I commanded them to do; but they did them not. 9 And the LORD said unto me, A conspiracy is found among the men of Judah, and among the inhabitants of Jerusalem. 10 They are turned back to the iniquities of their forefathers, which refused to hear my words; and they went after other gods to serve them: the house of Israel and the house of Judah have broken my covenant which I made with their fathers.

The prophet here, as prosecutor in God's name, draws up an indictment against the Jews, for wilful disobedience to the commands of their rightful sovereign. And for the more solemn management of this charge,

First. He produceth the commission he had to draw up the charge against them. He did not take pleasure in accusing the children of his people, but God commanded him to speak it to the men of Judah, ver. 1, 2. In the original it is plural, 'Speak ye this,' for what he said to Jeremiah was the same that he gave in charge to all his servants the prophets. They none of them said any other but what Moses in the law had said; to that therefore they must refer themselves, and direct the people, "Hear the words of this covenant;" turn to your Bibles, be judged by them. Jeremiah must now proclaim this "in the cities of Judah, and the streets of Jerusalem," that all may hear, for all are concerned. All the words of reproof and conviction which the prophets spake were grounded upon the words of the covenant, and agreed with that; and therefore hear these words, and understand by them upon what terms you stood with God at first, and then, by comparing yourselves with the covenant, you will soon be aware upon what terms you now stand with him.

Secondly. He opens the charter upon which their state was founded, and by which they held their privileges. They had forgotten the tenor of it, and lived as if they thought the grant was absolute, and that they might do what they pleased, and yet have what God had promised; or, as if they thought the keeping up the ceremonial observances was all that God required of them. He therefore shews them, with all possible plainness, that the thing God insisted upon was obedience, that was better than sacrifice. He said, "Obey my voice," ver. 4, and again, ver. 7, "Obey my voice." Own God for your master, give up yourselves to him as his subjects and servants; attend to all the declarations of his mind and will, and make conscience of complying with them. "Do my commandments, not only in some things, but "according to all which I command you;" make conscience of moral duties especially, and rest not in those that are merely ritual. "Hear the words of the covenant, and do them."

1. This was the original contract between God and them, when he first formed them into a people. It was what he commanded their fathers, when he first brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, ver. 4, and again, ver. 7. He never intended to take them under his conduct and protection upon any other terms. This was it that he required from them, in gratitude for the great things he did for them, when he brought them from the iron furnace. Therefore he redeemed them out of the service of the Egyptians, which was perfect slavery, that he might take them into his own service, which is perfect freedom, Lu. i. 74, 75.

2. This was not only laid before them then, but it was with the greatest importunity imaginable pressed upon them, ver. 7. God not only commanded, but earnestly protested, it to their fathers, when he brought them into covenant with himself. Moses inculcated it again and again, by precept upon precept, and line upon line.

3. This was made the condition of the relation between them and God which was so much their honour and privilege; "So shall ye be my people, and I will be your God;" I will own you for mine, and you may call upon me as yours; which intimates, that if they refused to obey they could no longer claim the benefit of the relation.

4. It was upon these terms that the land of Canaan was given them for a possession; "Obey my voice, that I may perform the oath sworn to your fathers, to give them a land flowing with milk and honey," ver. 5. God was ready to fulfil the promise, but then they must fulfil the condition; if not, the promise is void, and it is just with God to turn them out of possession. Being brought in upon their good behaviour, they had no wrong done them if they were turned out upon their ill behaviour. Obedience was the rent reserved by the lease, with a power to re-enter for nonpayment.

5. This obedience was not only made a condition of the blessing, but was required under the penalty of a curse. This is mentioned first here, ver. 3, that they might if possible be awakened by the terrors of the Lord; "Cursed be the man," though it were but a single person, "that obeys not the words of this covenant," much more when it is the body of the nation that rebels. There are curses of the covenant as well as blessings; and Moses set before them not only life and good, but death and evil, Deut. xxx. 15; so that they had fair warning given them of the fatal consequences of disobedience.

6. Lest this covenant should be forgotten, and, because out of mind, should be thought out of date, God had from time to time called to them to remember it, and by his servants the prophets had made a continual claim of this rent, so that they could not plead in excuse of their nonpayment, that it had never been demanded. From the day he brought them out of Egypt to this day, and that was near a thousand years, he had been, in one way or other, at sundry times, and in divers manners, protesting to them the necessity of obedience. God keeps an account how long we have enjoyed the means of grace, and how powerful those means have been; how often we have been not only spoken to, but protested to, concerning our duty.

7. This covenant was consented to; ver. 5, "Then answered I, and said, Amen, so be it, O Lord." These are the words of the prophet, expressing either, 1st. His own consent to the covenant for himself, and his desire to have the benefit of it. God promised Canaan to the obedient; Lord, saith he, I take thee at thy word, I will be obedient; let me have mine inheritance in the land of promise, of which Canaan is a type. Or, 2nd. His good will and good wish that his people might have the benefit of it; Amen. Lord, let them still be kept in possession of this good land, and not turned out of it; make good the promise to them. Or, 3rd. His people's consent to the covenant; "Then answered I," in the name of the people, "So be it." Taking it in this sense, it refers to the declared consent which the people gave to the covenant, not only to the precepts of it, when they said, "All that the Lord shall say unto us we will do, and will be obedient," but to the penalties, when they said Amen to all the curses upon mount Ebal. The more solemnly we have engaged ourselves to God, the more reason we have to hope that it will be perpetual, and yet here it did not prove so.

Thirdly. He chargeth them with breach of covenant, such a breach as amounted to a forfeiture of their charter, ver. 8. God had said again and again, by his law and by his prophets, "Obey my voice," do as you are bidden, and all shall be well; "yet they obeyed not;" and because they were resolved not to submit their souls to God's commandments they would not so much as incline their ears to them, but got as far as they could out of call. "They walked every one in the imagination of their evil heart," followed their own inventions; every man did as his fancy and humour led him, right or wrong, lawful or unlawful, both in their devotions and in their conversations: see ch. vii. 24. And what then can they expect, but to fall under the curse of the covenant, since they would not comply with the commands and conditions of it? "Therefore I will bring upon them all the words of this covenant," that is, all the threatenings contained in it, because they did not what they were commanded. Note, The words of the covenant shall not fall to the ground. If we do not by our obedience qualify ourselves for the blessings of it, we shall by our disobedience bring ourselves under the curses of it.

And that which aggravated their defection from God, and their rebellion against him, was, that it was general, and, as it were, by consent, ver. 9, 10. Jeremiah himself saw that many lived in open disobedience to God, but the Lord told him the matter was worse than he thought of: "A conspiracy is found among them," by him whose eye is upon the hidden works of darkness. There is a combination against God and religion, a dangerous design formed to overthrow God's government, and bring in the pretenders, the counterfeit deities. This intimates, that they were wilful and deliberate in wickedness: they rebelled against God, not through incogitancy, but presumptuously, and with a high hand; that they were subtle and ingenious in wickedness, and carried on their plot against religion with a great deal of art and management; that they were linked together in the designs, and, as is usual among conspirators, engaged to stand by one another in it, and to live and die together; they were resolved to go through with it. A cursed conspiracy! O that there were not the like in our day! Observe, 1. What the conspiracy was. They designed to overthrow Divine revelation, and set that aside, and persuade people not to hear, not to heed the words of God. They did all they could to derogate from the authority of the Scriptures, and to lessen the value of them. They designed to draw people after other gods, to serve them, to consult them as their oracles, and make court to them as their benefactors. Human reason shall be their god; a light within their god; an infallible judge their god; saints and angels their gods; the god of this or the other nation shall be theirs: thus under several disguises they are in the same confederacy "against the Lord and against his anointed." 2. Who were in the conspiracy. One would have expected to find some foreigners ringleaders in it. No; 1st. The inhabitants of Jerusalem are in

According to another view, it is the country itself which is supposed to utter these lamentations. The "cords" are those by which a tent is fastened.

x. 22. "Bruit" is an old word, signifying a noise or report. The "dragons" of our version doubtless should be jackals, which would haunt the cities of Judah after they were desolated by the northern invader, as the Assyrian is constantly described, because marching from the north.

x. 23. Some critics have taken this to mean, "I know Jehovah, that his way is not like that of men," &c., but our version is correct.

x. 25. The words of this verse occur with some variation in Psa. lxxix. 6, 7, but which is the older composition cannot be determined.

xi. 4. A furnace of iron was used, as Lowth observes, to melt and purify metals, and is an apt illustration of any sore affliction. In verses 3, 4, and 5 of this chapter the prophet has in view various conspiracy with the men of Judah. City and country agree in this, however they may differ in other things. 2nd. Those of this generation seem to be in conspiracy with those of the foregoing generation, to carry on the war from age to age against religion. "They are turned back to the iniquities of their forefathers," and are risen up in their stead, a seed of evil doers, an increase of sinful men, Num. xxxii. 14. In Josiah's time there had been a reformation, but after his death they returned to the idolatries which then they had renounced. 3rd. Judah and Israel, the kingdom of the ten tribes and the two, that were often at daggers' drawing one with another, yet were in a conspiracy to break the covenant God had made with their fathers, even with the heads of all the twelve tribes. The house of Israel began the revolt, but the house of Judah soon came into the conspiracy. Now what else could be expected, but that God should take severe methods, both for the chastising of these conspirators and the crushing of this conspiracy? for none ever hardened his heart thus against God and prospered. He that rolleth this stone, it will return upon him.

11 Therefore thus saith the LORD,
Behold, I will bring evil upon them,
Which they shall not be able to escape;
And though they shall cry unto me,
I will not hearken unto them. [salem go,
12 Then shall the cities of Judah and inhabitants of Jeru-
And cry unto the gods unto whom they offer incense:
But they shall not save them at all
In the time of their trouble.
13 For according to the number of thy cities
Were thy gods, O Judah;
And according to the number of the streets of Jerusalem
Have ye set up altars to that shameful thing,
Even altars to burn incense unto Baal.
14 Therefore pray not thou for this people,
Neither lift up a cry or prayer for them:
For I will not hear them in the time that they cry unto me
For their trouble
15 What hath my beloved to do in mine house,
Seeing she hath wrought lewdness with many,
And the holy flesh is passed from thee?
When thou doest evil, then thou rejoicest.
16 The LORD called thy name,
A green olive tree, fair, and of goodly fruit:
With the noise of a great tumult he hath kindled fire
And the branches of it are broken. [upon it,
17 For the LORD of hosts, that planted thee,
Hath pronounced evil against thee,
For the evil of the house of Israel and of the house of Which they have done against themselves [Judah,
To provoke me to anger in offering incense unto Baal.

This paragraph, which contains so much of God's wrath, might very well be expected to follow upon that which goes next before, which contained so much of his people's sin. When God found so much evil among them, we cannot think it strange if it follows, "Therefore I will bring evil upon them," ver. 11; the evil of punishment for the evil of sin, and there is no remedy, no relief; the decree is gone forth, and the sentence will be executed.

First. They cannot help themselves, but will be found too weak to contest with God's judgments. It is evil "which they shall not be able to escape," or to go forth out of, by any evasion whatsoever. Note, Those that will not submit to God's government shall not be able to escape his wrath; there is no fleeing from his justice, no avoiding his cognizance. Evil pursues sinners, and entangles them in snares, out of which they cannot extricate themselves.

Secondly. Their God will not help them. His providence shall no way favour them; "Though they shall cry unto me, I will not hearken unto them." In their affliction they will seek the God whom before they slighted, and cry to him whom before they would not vouchsafe to speak to. But how can they expect to speed? For he has plainly told us, that he that "turns away his ears from hearing the law," as they did, ver. 8, for they inclined not their ear, even their prayer shall be an abomination to him, as the word of the Lord was now to them a reproach.

Thirdly. Their idols shall not help them, ver. 12. They shall "go and cry to the gods to whom they" now "offer incense, and put them in mind of the costly services wherewith they had honoured them, expecting they should now have relief from them, but in vain. They shall be sent to the gods whom they served, Jud. x. 4; Deu. xxxii. 37, 38; and what the better? "They shall not save them at all;" shall do nothing towards their salvation, nor give them any prospect of it; they shall not afford them the least comfort, or relief, or mitigation of their trouble. It is God only that is a friend at need, a present powerful help in time of trouble. The idols cannot help themselves, how then should they help their worshippers? Those that make idols of the world and the flesh will in vain have recourse to them in a day of distress. If the idols could have done any real kindness to their worshippers, they would have done it for this people, who had renounced the true God to embrace them, had multiplied them "according to the number of their cities," ver. 13, nay, in Jerusalem, "according to the number of their streets;" suspecting both their sufficiency and their readiness to help them, they must have many, lest a few would not serve; they must have them dispersed in every corner, lest they should be out of the way when they had occasion for them. In Jerusalem, the city which God had chosen to put his name there, publicly in the streets of Jerusalem, in every street, they had "altars to that shameful thing," that shame, even to Baal, which they ought to have been ashamed of, with which they did reproach the Lord, and bring confusion upon themselves. But now in their distress their many gods, and many altars, should stand them in no stead. Note, Those that will not be ashamed of their commission of sin as a wicked thing will be ashamed of their expectations from sin as a fruitless thing.

Fourthly. Jeremiah's prayers shall not help them, ver. 14. What God had said to him before, ch. vii. 16, he here saith again, "Pray not thou for this people." This is not designed for a command to the prophet so much as for a threatening to the people, that they should have no benefit by the prayers of their friends for them. God would give no encouragement to the prophets to pray for them, would not stir up the spirit of prayer, but cast a damp upon it; would put into their hearts to pray, not for the body of the people, but for the remnant among them; to pray for their eternal salvation, not for their deliverance from the temporal judgments that were coming upon them; and what other prayers were put up for them should not be heard. Those are in a sad case indeed that are cut off from the benefit of prayer. "I will not hear them when they cry," and therefore do not thou pray for them. Note, Those that have so far thrown themselves out of God's favour that he will not hear their prayers, cannot expect benefit by the prayers of others for them.

Fifthly. The profession they make of religion shall stand them in no stead, ver. 15. They were originally God's beloved, his spouse, he was married to them by the covenant of peculiarity; even the unbelieving Jews are said to be "beloved for the fathers' sakes," Rom. xi. 28. As such they had a place in God's house, they were admitted to worship in the courts of his temple, they did partake of God's altar, did eat of the flesh of their peace offerings, here called the holy flesh, which God had the honour of, and they had the comfort of. This they gloried in, and trusted to. What harm could come to those who were God's beloved, who were under the protection of his house! Even when they did evil, yet they rejoiced and gloried in this, made a mighty noise of this. And when their evil was, so the margin reads it, when trouble came upon them, they rejoiced in this, and made this their confidence. But their confidence would deceive them, for God has rejected it, they themselves having forfeited the privileges they so much boasted of. They have "wrought lewdness with many," have been guilty of spiritual whoredom, have worshipped many idols. And therefore, 1. God's temple will yield them no protection. It is fit the adulteress, especially when she has so often repeated her whoredoms, and is grown so impudent in them, and irreclaimable, should be put away, and turned out of doors. "What has my beloved to do in my house?" She is a scandal to it, and therefore it shall be no longer a shelter to her. 2. God's altar will yield them no satisfaction, nor can they expect any comfort from that; "The holy flesh is passed from thee," that is, an end will soon be put to thy sacrifices, when the temple shall be laid in ruins; and where then will the holy flesh be thou art so proud of? A holy heart will be a comfort to us when the holy flesh is passed from us; an inward principle of grace will make up the want of the outward means of grace. But woe unto us if the departure of the holy flesh be accompanied with the departure of the Holy Spirit.

Sixthly. God's former favours to them shall stand them in no stead, ver. 16, 17. Their remembrance of them shall be no comfort to them under their trouble, and God's remembrance of them shall be no argument for their relief. 1. It is true God had done great things for them; that people had been favourites above any people under the sun, they had been the darlings of heaven. God had called Israel's name a green olive-tree, and had made them so, for he miscalls nothing; he had planted them, ver. 17, had formed them into a people, with all the advantages they could have to make them a fruitful and flourishing people, so good was their law, and so good was their land. One would think no other but that a people so planted, so watered, so cultivated, should be, as the olive-tree is, ever green, in respect both of piety and prosperity, Ps. lii. 8. God called them fair, and of goodly fruit; both good for food and pleasant to the eye; both amiable and serviceable to God and man; for with the greenness and fatness of the olive both are honoured, Jud. ix. 9. 2. It is as true that they have done ill things against God. He had planted them a green olive, a good olive, but they were degenerated into a wild olive, Rom. xi. 17. Both the house of Israel and the house of Judah had done evil, had provoked God to anger in burning incense unto Baal, setting up other mediators between them and the supreme God beside the promised Messiah; nay, setting up other gods in competition with the true and living God, for they had gods many as well as lords many. 3. When they have carried themselves so ill, they can expect no other but that, notwithstanding what good he hath both done to them and designed for them, he should now bring upon them the evil he hath pronounced against them. He that made them will not save them. He that planted this green olive-tree, and expected fruit from it, finding it barren and grown wild, hath kindled fire upon it, to burn it as it stands, for being without fruit; it is twice dead, plucked up by the roots, Jude 12; it is cut down, and cast into the fire, the fittest place for trees that cumber the ground, Mat. iii. 10; the branches of it, the high and lofty boughs, (so the word signifies,) are broken, are broken down, both princes and priests cut off. And thus it proves that the evil done against God to provoke him to anger is really done against themselves, they wrong their own souls; God is out of their reach, but they ruin themselves: see ch. vii. 19. Note, Every sin against God is a sin against ourselves, and so it will be found sooner or later.

18 And the LORD hath given me knowledge of it, and I Then thou shewedst me their doings. [know it:
19 But I was like a lamb or an ox that is brought to the slaughter;
And I knew not that they had devised devices against me, saying,
Let us destroy the tree with the fruit thereof,
And let us cut him off from the land of the living,
That his name may be no more remembered.
20 But, O LORD of hosts, that judgest righteously,
That triest the reins and the heart,
Let me see thy vengeance on them: for unto thee have
I revealed my cause.
21 Therefore thus saith the LORD
Of the men of Anathoth, that seek thy life, saying,
Prophesy not in the name of the LORD,
That thou die not by our hand:

expressions in the Pentateuch, as Lev. xxvi. 3, 12; Deut. xxvii. 26, &c.

xi. 12, 13. These allusions to idolatrous rites and polytheism generally quite accord with what is stated in the historical books of the Bible, and with facts otherwise ascertained. The practice of adopting a certain deity as the patron god of a town or city was very widely popular, and is implied in numerous texts of the Old Testament. The setting up of altars in public places was also a very common practice at an early date; in fact, altars were erected before the doors of private houses. By the "shameful thing" it is clear that our translators understood Baal to be meant.

xi. 15. For "lewdness with many" we should put "manifold or multiplied iniquity." In the Hebrew the reference is to depravity in general, and not at all to lewdness in particular. "The holy flesh" is the holiness of the flesh of the sacrifices, which were now defiled.

22 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts,
Behold, I will punish them:
The young men shall die by the sword;
Their sons and their daughters shall die by famine:
23 And there shall be no remnant of them:
For I will bring evil upon the men of Anathoth,
Even the year of their visitation.

The prophet Jeremiah hath much in his writings concerning himself, much more than Isaiah had, the times he lived in being very troublesome. Here we have (as it should seem) the beginning of his sorrows, which arose from those of his own city, Anathoth, a priests' city, and yet a malignant one. Observe here,

First. Their plot against him, ver. 19. They devised devices against him, laid their heads together to contrive how they might be in the most plausible and effectual manner the death of him. Malice is ingenious in its devices, as well as industrious in its prosecutions. They said concerning Jeremiah, "Let us destroy the tree with the fruit thereof," a proverbial expression; let us utterly destroy him, root and branch; let us destroy both the father and the family, as, when Naboth was put to death for treason, his sons were put to death with him. Or, rather, both the prophet and the prophecy; let us kill the one, and defeat the other; "Let us cut him off from the land of the living," as a false prophet, and load him with ignominy and disgrace, "that his name may no more be remembered" with respect. Let us sink his reputation, and so spoil the credit of his predictions. This was their plot; and, 1. It was a barbarous one; but so cruel have the persecutors of God's prophets been: they hunt for no less than the precious life, and very precious the lives are that they hunt for. But, 2. It was a baffled one. They thought to put an end to his days, but he survived most of his enemies; they thought to blast his memory, but it lives to this day, and will be blessed while time lasts.

Secondly. The information which God gave him of this conspiracy against him. He knew nothing of it himself, so artfully had they concealed it. He came to Anathoth, meaning no harm to them, and therefore fearing no harm from them, like a lamb or an ox, that thinks he is driven as usual to the field, when he is brought to the slaughter; so little did poor Jeremiah dream of the design his citizens that hated him had upon him. None of his friends could, and none of his enemies would, give him any notice of his danger, that he might shift for his own safety; as Paul's sister's son gave him intelligence of the Jews that were lying in wait for him. There is but a step between Jeremiah and death, but then "the Lord has given me knowledge of it," by dream, or vision, or impression upon his spirit, that he might save himself; as the king of Israel did upon the notice Elisha gave him, 2 Kin. vi. 10. Thus he came to know it: God shews him their doings; and such were their devices, that the discovering of them was the defeating of them. If God had not let him know his own danger, it would have been improved by unreasonable men against the reputation of his predictions, that he who foretold the ruin of his country could not foresee his own peril, and avoid it. See what care God takes of his prophets; he suffers no man to do them wrong; all the rage of their enemies cannot prevail to take them off, till they have finished their testimony. God knows all the secret designs of his and his people's enemies, and can, when he pleaseth, make them known; "A bird of the air shall carry the voice."

Thirdly. His appeal to God hereupon, ver. 20. His eye is to God as the Lord of hosts, that judgeth righteously. It is matter of comfort to us, when men deal unjustly with us, that we have a God to go to, who doth and will plead the cause of injured innocency, and appear against the injurious. God's justice, which is a terror to the wicked, is a comfort to the godly. His eye is to him, as the God that tries the reins and the heart; that perfectly sees what is in man, what are his thoughts and intents. He knew the integrity that was in Jeremiah's heart, and that he was not the man they represented him to be; he knew the wickedness that was in their hearts, though never so cunningly concealed and disguised. Now, 1. He prays judgment against them; "Let me see thy vengeance on them;" that is, do justice between me and them in such a way as thou pleasest. Some think there was something of human frailty in this prayer of his; at least Christ has taught us another lesson, both by his precept and pattern, which is, to pray for our persecutors. Others think it comes from a pure zeal for the glory of God, and a pious, prophetic indignation against men that were by profession priests, the Lord's ministers, and yet were so desperately wicked, as to fly out against one that did them no harm, purely for the service he did to God. This petition was a prediction that he should see God's vengeance on them. 2. He refers himself entirely to the judgment of God; "Unto thee have I revealed my cause:" that is, to thee I have committed it, not desiring or expecting to interest any other in it. Note, It is our comfort when we are wronged, that we have a God to commit our cause to; and our duty to commit it to him, with a resolution to acquiesce in his definitive sentence; to subscribe, and not prescribe, to him.

Fourthly. Judgment given against his persecutors, the men of Anathoth. It was to no purpose for him to appeal to the courts at Jerusalem, he could not have right done him there, the priests there would stand by the priests at Anathoth, and rather second them than discountenance them; but God will therefore take cognizance of the cause himself, and we are sure his judgment is according to truth. Here is,

1. Their crime recited on which the sentence is grounded, ver. 21. They sought the prophet's life, for they forbade him to prophesy upon pain of death; they were resolved either to silence him or slay him. The provocation he gave them was his prophesying in the name of the Lord, without license from them that were the governors of the city which he was a member of; and not prophesying such smooth things as they always bespoke. Their forbidding him to prophesy was in effect seeking his life; for it was seeking to defeat the end and business of his life, and to rob him of the comfort of it. It is as bad to God's faithful ministers to have their mouth stopped as to have their breath stopped. But especially when it was resolved that if he did prophesy, as certainly he would, notwithstanding their inhibition, he should die by their hand; they would be accusers, judges, executioners, and all. It used to be said that a prophet could not perish but at Jerusalem, for there the great council sat; but so bitter were the men of Anathoth against Jeremiah, that they would undertake to be the death of him themselves. A prophet then shall find not only no honour, but no favour in his own country.

2. The sentence passed upon them for this crime, ver. 22, 23. God saith, "I will punish them;" let me alone to deal with them. 'I will visit this upon them,' so the word is; God will inquire into it, and reckon for it. Two of God's four sore judgments shall serve to ruin their town; the sword shall devour their young men, though they were young priests, not men of war; their character shall not be their protection. And famine shall destroy the children, sons and daughters, that tarry at home; which is a more grievous death than that by the sword, Lam. iv. 9. The destruction shall be final; ver. 23, "There shall be no remnant of them left," none to be the seed of another generation; they sought Jeremiah's life, and therefore they shall die; they would destroy him root and branch, that his name might be no more remembered, and therefore there shall be no remnant of them; and herein the Lord is righteous. Thus evil is brought upon them, even the year of their visitation; and that is evil enough, a recompence according to their deserts. Then shall Jeremiah see his desire upon his enemies. Note, Their condition is sad, that have the prayers of good ministers and good people against them.

CHAPTER XII.

In this chapter we have, I. The prophet's humble complaint to God of the success that wicked people had in their wicked practices, ver. 1, 2. and his appeal to God concerning his own integrity, ver. 3, with a prayer that God would for the sake of the public bring the wickedness of the wicked to an end, ver. 3, 4. II. God's rebuke to the prophet for his uneasiness at his present troubles, bidding him prepare for greater, ver. 5, 6. III. A sad lamentation of the present deplorable state of the Israel of God, ver. 7—13. IV. An intimation of mercy to God's people in a denunciation of wrath against their neighbours that helped forward their affliction, that they should be plucked out; but with a promise, that if they would at last join themselves with the people of God, they should come in shares with them in their privileges, ver. 14—17.

RIGHTEOUS art thou, O LORD, when I plead with thee:
Yet let me talk with thee of thy judgments:
Wherefore doth the way of the wicked prosper?
Wherefore are all they happy that deal very treacherously?
2 Thou hast planted them, yea, they have taken root:
They grow, yea, they bring forth fruit:
Thou art near in their mouth,
And far from their reins.
3 But thou, O LORD, knowest me:
Thou hast seen me, and tried mine heart toward thee:
Pull them out like sheep for the slaughter,
And prepare them for the day of slaughter.
4 How long shall the land mourn,
And the herbs of every field wither,
For the wickedness of them that dwell therein?
The beasts are consumed, and the birds;
Because they said, He shall not see our last end.
5 If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee,
Then how canst thou contend with horses?

RUNNING FOOTMEN OF INDIA.

And if in the land of peace, wherein thou trustedst, they wearied thee,
Then how wilt thou do in the swelling of Jordan?
6 For even thy brethren, and the house of thy father,
Even they have dealt treacherously with thee;
Yea, they have called a multitude after thee:
Believe them not, though they speak fair words unto thee.

The prophet doubts not but it would be of use to others to know what had passed between God and his soul; what temptations he had been assaulted with, and how he had got over them. And therefore he here tell us,

First. What liberty he humbly took, and was graciously allowed him, to reason with God concerning his judgments, ver. 1. He is about to plead with God, not to quarrel with him, or find fault with his proceedings, but to inquire into the meaning of them, that he might more and more see reason to be satisfied in them, and might have wherewith to answer both his own and others' objections against them. The works of the Lord, and the reasons of them, are sought out even of those that have pleasure therein, Ps. cxi. 2. We may not strive with our Maker, but we may reason with him. Now, the prophet lays down a truth of unquestionable certainty, which he resolves to abide by, in managing this argument, "Righteous art thou, O Lord, when I plead with thee." Thus he arms himself against the temptation wherewith he was assaulted, to envy the prosperity of the wicked, before he entered into a parley with it. Note, When we are most in the dark concerning the meaning of God's dispensations, yet still we must resolve to keep up right thoughts of God, and must be confident of this, that he never did, nor ever will do, the least wrong to any of his creatures; even when his judgments are unsearchable as a great deep, and altogether unaccountable, yet his righteousness is as conspicuous and

xi. 16. The designation of God's people as an olive-tree, at once beautiful and fruitful, was adopted by St. Paul in Rom. xi. 17.

xi. 18—20. In these verses the prophet soliloquises in his own person. The old versions vary rather curiously in their renderings of the words, which in our translation read, "Let us destroy the tree with the fruit thereof," &c. Thus the Greek is, "Come and let us cast wood into his bread;" and the Latin Vulgate is similar. The Syriac is, "Let us corrupt the wood with its bread," which may mean the same almost as our version. The Chaldee is, "Let us put deadly poison in his food." Justin Martyr says the Jews had excluded all this passage from many of their Bibles ("Dialogue with Trypho," sec. 72), because of its Messianic character. At present it occurs in all copies and versions. That it contained a prophetic allusion to Christ was held by many of the ancients; indeed, Jerome says that "by consent of all churches it is spoken of Christ." That it means Jeremiah is plain from verse 21.

immovable as the great mountains, Ps. xxxvi. 6. Though sometimes "clouds and darkness are round about him," yet "justice and judgment are" always "the habitation of his throne," Ps. xcvii. 2. When we find it hard to understand particular providences, we must have recourse to general truths as our first principles, and abide by them; however it be, "the Lord is righteous," see Ps. lxxiii. 1. And we must acknowledge it to him, as the prophet here, even when we plead with him, as those that have no thoughts of contending, but of learning; being fully assured that he will be justified when he speaks. Note, However we may see cause for our own information to plead with God, yet it becomes us to own that, whatever he saith or doth, he is in the right.

Secondly. What it was in the dispensations of Divine providence that he stumbled at, and that he thought would bear a debate. It was that which has been a temptation to many wise and good men, and such a one as they have hardly got over. 1. They see the designs and projects of wicked people successful; "The way of the wicked prospers;" they compass their malicious designs, and gain their point. 2. They see their affairs and concerns in a good posture; "They are happy," happy as the world can make them, though "they deal treacherously, very treacherously," both with God and man. They are hypocrites who are chiefly meant, as appears, ver. 2, who dissemble in their good professions, and depart from their good beginnings and good promises, and in both they deal treacherously, very treacherously. It has been said that men cannot expect to prosper who are unjust and dishonest in their dealings; but these deal treacherously, and yet they are happy. He shews, ver. 2, both their prosperity and their abuse of their prosperity. 1st. God had been very indulgent to them, and they were got beforehand in the world. They are planted in a good land, a land flowing with milk and honey, and thou hast planted them; nay, thou didst cast out the heathen to plant them, Ps. xliv. 2; lxxx. 8. Many a tree is planted that yet never grows or comes to any thing; but they have taken root, their prosperity seems to be confirmed and settled; they take root in the earth, for there they fix themselves, and thence they draw the sap of all their satisfaction. Yet many trees take root which yet never come on; but these grow, yea, they bring forth fruit; their families are built up, they live high, and spend at a great rate; and all this was owing to the benignity of the Divine providence, which smiled upon them, Ps. lxxiii. 7. 2nd. Thus God had favoured them, though they had dealt treacherously with him; "Thou art near in their mouth, and far from their reins." This was no uncharitable censure, for he spoke by the spirit of prophecy, without which it is not safe to charge men with hypocrisy, whose appearances are plausible. Observe, First. Though they cared not for thinking of God, nor had any sincere affection to him, yet they could easily persuade themselves to speak of him frequently, and with an air of seriousness. Piety from the teeth outward is no difficult thing. Many speak the language of Israel that are not Israelites indeed. Secondly. Though they had on all occasions the name of God ready in their mouth, and accustomed themselves to those forms of speech that savoured of piety, yet they could not persuade themselves to keep up the fear of God in their hearts. The form of godliness should engage us to keep up the power of it; but with them it did not do so.

Thirdly. What comfort he had in appealing to God concerning his own integrity; ver. 3, "But thou, O Lord, knowest me." Probably the wicked men he complains of were forward to reproach and censure him, ch. xviii. 18, in reference to which, this was his comfort, that God was a witness to his integrity. God knew he was not such a one as they were, who had God ever in their mouths, but far from their reins; nor such a one as they took him to be, and represented him, a deceiver and a false prophet. They that thus abused him, did not know him; 1 Cor. ii. 8, "But thou, O Lord, knowest me," though they think me not worth their notice. 1. Observe what the matter is concerning which he appeals to God; Thou knowest my heart towards thee. Note, We are as our hearts are, and our hearts are good or bad according as they are or are not towards God; and this is that therefore concerning which we should examine ourselves, that we may approve ourselves to God. 2. The cognizance to which he appeals. Thou knowest me better than I know myself; not by hearsay or report, for thou hast seen me; not with a transient glance, but thou hast tried my heart. God's knowing of us is as clear, and exact, and certain, as if he had made the most strict scrutiny. Note, The God with whom we have to do perfectly knows how our hearts are towards him. He knows both the guile of the hypocrite, and the sincerity of the upright.

Fourthly. He prays that God would turn his hand against these wicked people, and not suffer them to prosper always, though they had prospered long. Let some judgment come to pull them out of this fat pasture, as sheep for the slaughter, that it may appear their long prosperity was but like the feeding of the lambs in a large place, to "prepare them for the day of slaughter," Hos. iv. 16. God suffered them to prosper, that by their pride and luxury they might fill up the measure of their iniquity, and so be ripened for destruction. And therefore he thinks it a piece of necessary justice that they should fall into mischief themselves, because they had done so much mischief to others; that they should be pulled out of their land, because they had brought ruin upon the land; and the longer they continued in it the more hurt they did, as the plagues of their generation; ver. 4, "How long shall the land mourn," as it doth under the judgments of God inflicted upon it, "for the wickedness of them that dwell therein?" Lord, shall they prosper themselves that ruin all about them? 1. See here what the judgment was which the land was now groaning under. "The herbs of every field wither," the grass is burned up, and all the products of the earth fail; and then it follows of course, the beasts are consumed, and the birds, 1 Kin. xviii. 5. This was the effect of a long drought, or want of rain, which happened, as it should seem, at the latter end of Josiah's reign, and the beginning of Jehoiakim's; it is mentioned, ch. iii. 3; viii. 13; ix. 10, 12; and more fully afterwards, ch. xiv. If they would have been brought to repentance by this lesser judgment, the greater had been prevented. Now, why was it that this fruitful land was turned into barrenness, but for the wickedness of them that dwelt therein? Ps. cvii. 34. Therefore the prophet prays that these wicked people might die for their own sin; and that the whole nation might not suffer for it. 2. See here what was the language of their wickedness; "They said, He shall not see our last end." Either God himself shall not,—atheism is the root of hypocrisy, therefore God is far from their reins, though near in their mouth, because they say, "How doth God know?" Ps. lxxiii. 11; Job xxii. 13; he knows not what way we take, nor what it will end in,—or, 'Jeremiah shall not see our last end;' whatever he pretends when he asks us what shall be in the end hereof, he cannot himself foresee it. They look upon him as a false prophet. Or, whatever it is, he shall not live to see it, for we will be the death of him, ch. xi. 21. Note, 1st. Men's setting their latter end at a great distance, or looking upon it as uncertain, is at the bottom of all their wickedness, Lam. i. 9. 2nd. The whole creation groans under the burthen of the sin of man, Rom. viii. 22; it is for this that the earth mourns, so it may be read, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake."

Fifthly. He acquaints us with the answer God gave to those complaints of his, ver. 5, 6. We often find the prophets admonish others, as Isa. viii. 11. Ministers have lessons to learn, as well as lessons to teach, and must themselves hear God's voice, and preach to themselves. Jeremiah complained much of the wickedness of the men of Anathoth; and that, notwithstanding that, they prospered. Now this seems to be an answer to that complaint. 1. It is allowed that he had cause to complain; ver. 6, "Thy brethren," the priests of Anathoth, that are of "the house of thy father," who ought to have protected thee, and pretended to do so, "even they have dealt treacherously with thee," have been false to thee, and under colour of friendship, have designedly done thee all the mischief they could. "They have called a multitude after thee," raised the mob upon thee, and incensed the common people against thee, to whom they have endeavoured by all arts possible to render thee despicable or odious, while at the same time they pretended they had no design to persecute thee, or deprive thee of thy liberty. They are indeed such as thou canst not believe, though they speak fair words to thee. They seem to be thy friends but are really thine enemies. Note, God's faithful servants must not think it at all strange if their foes be those of their own house, Mat. x. 36; and if those they expect kindness from prove such as they can put no confidence in, Mic. vii. 5. 2. Yet he is told that he carried the matter too far. 1st. He laid the unkindness of his countrymen too much to heart. They wearied him, because it was "in a land of peace wherein he trusted," ver. 5. It was very grievous to him to be thus hated and abused by his own kindred. He was disturbed in his mind by it, his spirit was sunk and overwhelmed with it, so that he was in a mighty toss and uneasiness about it. Nay, he was discouraged in his work by it, began to be weary of prophesying, and to think of giving it up. 2nd. He did not consider that this was but the beginning of his sorrow, and he had sorer trials yet before him; and, whereas he should endeavour by a patient bearing of this trouble to prepare himself for greater, by his uneasiness under this he did but unfit himself for what farther lay before him. "If thou hast run with the footmen, and they have wearied thee," and run thee quite out of breath, then "how wilt thou contend with horses?" If the injuries done him by the men of Anathoth made such an impression upon him, what would he do when the princes and chief priests at Jerusalem should set upon him with their power, as they did afterwards? ch. xx. 2; xxxii. 2. If he was so soon tired in a land of peace, where there was little noise or peril, "What would he do in the swellings of Jordan," when that overflows all its banks, and frightens even lions out of their thickets? ch. xlix. 19. Note, First. While we are in this world we must expect troubles and difficulties. Our life is a race, a warfare; we are in danger of being run down. Secondly. God's usual method being to begin with lesser trials, it is our wisdom to expect greater than any we have yet met with. We may be called out to contend with horsemen, and the sons of Anak may perhaps be reserved for the last encounter. Thirdly. It highly concerns us to prepare for such trials, and to consider what we should do in them. How shall we preserve our integrity and peace when we come to the swellings of Jordan? Fourthly. In order to our preparation for farther and greater trials, we are concerned to approve ourselves well in present lesser trials, to keep up our spirits, keep hold of the promise, keep in our way, with our eye upon the prize; so run that we may obtain it.

Some good interpreters understand this as spoken to the people, who were very secure, and fearless of the threatened judgments. If they have been so humbled and impoverished by lesser calamities, so wasted by the Assyrians; if the Ammonites and Moabites, that were their brethren, and with whom they were in league, if these proved false to them, as undoubtedly they would, then how would they be able to deal with such a powerful adversary as the Chaldeans would be? How would they bear up their head against that invasion, which should come like the swelling of Jordan?

I have given the dearly beloved of my soul into the hand of her enemies
8 Mine heritage is unto me as a lion in the forest;
It crieth out against me:
Therefore have I hated it.
9 Mine heritage is unto me as a speckled bird,

Come to devour.

They have put themselves to pain, but shall not profit:
And they shall be ashamed of your revenues
Because of the fierce anger of the LORD.

The people of the Jews are here marked for ruin.

First. God is here brought in falling out with them, and leaving them desolate; and they could never have been undone if they had not provoked God to desert them. It is a terrible word that God here saith, ver. 7, "I have forsaken my house;" the temple, which had been his palace, they had polluted it, and so forced him out of it; "I have left mine heritage," and will look after it no more. His people, that he had taken such delight in, and care of, are now thrown out of his protection. They had been the dearly beloved of his soul, precious in his sight, and honourable above any people, which is mentioned to aggravate their sin in returning him hatred for his love, and their misery in throwing themselves out of the favour of one that had such a kindness for them, and to justify God in his dealings with them. He sought not occasion

xi. 21—23. Anathoth was Jeremiah's own town, and the hatred with which he was regarded there reminds us of Matt. xiii. 57.

xii. 1—4. Hereupon Dr. Henderson says, "However difficult Jeremiah found it to reconcile the apparent discrepancies of the Divine government, he still held fast his conviction of the rectitude of the character of Jehovah. With a holy and respectful boldness he proceeds to state the principal cause of his perplexity—the worldly prosperity of the ungodly. Compare Psa. xxxvii., lxxiii."

xii. 5. In this and the following verses the Lord answers Jeremiah, by assuring him that the wicked would not always prosper, nor the righteous be utterly forsaken. The words rendered "swelling of Jordan" literally mean "pride of Jordan." Some understand them of the annual rising of the water of the river, but others think there is a reference to the thickets upon the banks haunted by dangerous wild beasts. The phrase occurs again in Zech. xi. 3, and also in chapters xlix. 19. l. 44 of this book.

against them, but, if they would have carried themselves anything tolerably, he would have made the best of them, for they were the beloved of his soul, but they had carried themselves so that they had provoked him to give them into the hand of their enemies, to leave them unguarded, an easy prey to those that bore them ill-will. But what was the quarrel God had with a people that had been so long dear to him? Why, truly, they were degenerated. 1. They were become like beasts of prey, which nobody loves, but every body avoids and gets as far off from as they can; ver. 8, "Mine heritage is unto me as a lion in the forest." Their sins cry to heaven for vengeance as loud as a lion roars. Nay, they cry out against God in the threatenings and slaughter which they breathe against his prophets, that speak to them in his name; and what is said and done against them God takes as said and done against himself. They blaspheme his name, oppose his authority, and bid defiance to his justice, and so cry out against him, "as a lion in the forest." They that were the sheep of God's pasture are become barbarous and ravenous, and as ungovernable as lions in the forest; "Therefore I hated them;" for what delight could the God of love take in a people that had now become as roaring lions and raging beasts, fit to be taken and shot at, as a vexation and torment to all about them? 2. They were become like birds of prey, and therefore also unworthy a place in God's house, where neither beasts nor birds of prey were admitted to be offered in sacrifice; ver. 9, 'Mine heritage is unto me as a bird with talons,' so some read it, and so the margin; they are continually pulling and pecking at one another, they have, by their unnatural contentions, made their country a cockpit. Or, as a speckled bird, dyed, or sprinkled, or bedewed with the blood of her prey. The shedding of innocent blood was Jerusalem's measure-filling sin, and hastened their ruin, not only as it provoked God against them, but as it provoked their neighbours likewise; for those that have their hand against every man shall have every man's hand against them, Gen. xvi. 12; and so it follows here, the birds round about are against her. Some make her a speckled, pied, or motley bird, upon the account of their mixing the superstitious customs and usages of the heathen with Divine institutions in the worship of God; they were fond of a particoloured religion, and thought it made them fine, when really it made them odious. God's turtle-dove is no speckled bird.

Secondly. The enemies are here brought in falling upon them, and laying them desolate. And some think it is upon this account that they are compared to a speckled bird, because the fowl use to make a noise about a bird of an odd, unusual colour. God's people are among the children of this world as men wondered at, as a speckled bird. But this people had by their own folly made themselves so; and the beasts and birds are called and commissioned to prey upon them. Let all "the birds round be against her," for God has forsaken her, and with them let "all the beasts of the field come to devour." Those that have made a prey of others shall themselves be preyed upon. It did not lessen the sin of the nations, but very much greatened the misery of Judah and Jerusalem, that the desolation brought upon them was by order from heaven. The birds and beasts are perhaps called to feast upon the bodies of the slain, as in St. John's vision, Rev. xix. 17. The utter desolation of the land by the Chaldean army is here spoken of as a thing done, so sure, so near, was it. God speaks of it as a thing which he had appointed to be done, and yet which he had no pleasure in, no more than in the death of other sinners.

1. See with what a tender affection he speaks of this land, notwithstanding the sinfulness of it, in remembrance of his covenant, and the tribute of honour and glory he had formerly had from it. It is "my vineyard, my portion, my pleasant portion," ver. 10. Note, God has a kindness and concern for his church, though there be much amiss in it; and his correcting of it will very much consist with his complacency in it.

2. See with what a tender compassion he speaks of the desolations of this land. "Many pastors," the Chaldean generals that made themselves masters of the country, and ate it up with their armies, as easily as the Arabian shepherds with their flocks ate up the fruits of a piece of ground that lies common, they "have destroyed my vineyard," without any consideration had either of the value of it, or my interest in it. They have with the greatest insolence and indignation trodden it under foot; and that which was a pleasant land they have made a desolate wilderness. The destruction was universal; the whole land is made desolate, ver. 11. It is made so by the sword of war; the spoilers, the Chaldean soldiers, are come through the plain, upon all high places; they have made themselves masters of all the natural fastnesses, and artificial fortresses; ver. 12, "The sword devours from one end of the land to the other," all places lie exposed, and the numerous army of the invaders disperse themselves into every corner of that fruitful country, so that "no flesh shall have peace," none shall be exempt from the calamity, nor be able to enjoy any tranquillity. When all flesh have corrupted their way, no flesh shall have peace; those only have peace that walk after the Spirit.

3. See whence all this misery comes. 1st. It comes from the displeasure of God. It is the sword of the Lord that devours, ver. 12. While God's people keep close to him, the sword of their protectors and deliverers is the sword of the Lord, witness that of Gideon; but when they have forsaken him, so that he is become their enemy, and fights against them, then the sword of their invaders and destroyers is become the sword of the Lord, witness this of the Chaldeans. It is "because of the fierce anger of the Lord," ver. 13; that was it which kindled this fire among them, and made their enemies so furious. And "who may stand before him when he is angry?" 2nd. It is their sin that has made God their enemy, particularly their incorrigibleness under former rebukes; ver. 11, "The land mourns unto me." The country that lies desolate doth, as it were, pour out its complaint before God, and humble itself under his hand, but the inhabitants are so senseless and stupid that none of them lays it to heart. They do not mourn to God, but are unaffected with his displeasure, while the very ground they go upon shames them. Note, When God's hand is lifted up, and men will not see, it shall be laid on, and they shall be made to feel, Isa. xxvi. 11.

4. See how unable they should be to fence against it; ver. 13, "They have sown wheat," they have taken a deal of pains for their own security, and promised themselves great matters from their endeavours, but it is all in vain, "they shall reap thorns," that is, that which shall prove very grievous and vexatious to them; instead of helping themselves, they shall but make themselves more uneasy. They have "put themselves to pain," both with their labour and with their expectation, but "it shall not profit;" they shall not prevail to extricate themselves out of the difficulties into which they have plunged themselves. "They shall be ashamed of your revenues," that they have depended so much upon their preparations for war, and particularly upon their ability to bear the charges of it. Money is the sinews of war; they thought they had enough of that, but shall be ashamed of it; for their silver and gold shall not profit them in the day of the Lord's anger.

14 Thus saith the LORD
Against all mine evil neighbours,
That touch the inheritance which I have caused my people Israel to inherit;
Behold, I will pluck them out of their land,
And pluck out the house of Judah from among them.
15 And it shall come to pass, after that I have plucked them out
I will return, and have compassion on them, and will bring them again,
Every man to his heritage, and every man to his land.
16 And it shall come to pass,
If they will diligently learn the ways of my people,
To swear by my name, The LORD liveth;
As they taught my people to swear by Baal;
Then shall they be built in the midst of my people.
17 But if they will not obey,
I will utterly pluck up and destroy that nation,
Saith the LORD.

The prophets sometimes, in God's name, delivered messages both of judgment and mercy to the nations that bordered on the land of Israel; but here is a message to them all in general, who had in their turns been one way or other injurious to God's people, had either oppressed them or triumphed in their being oppressed. Observe,

First. What the quarrel was that God had with them. They were his evil neighbours, ver. 14, that is, evil neighbours to his church; and what they did against it he took as done against himself, and therefore called them his evil neighbours, that should have been neighbourly to Israel, but were quite otherwise. Note, It is often the lot of good people to live among bad neighbours, that are unkind and provoking to them; and it is bad indeed when they are all so. These evil neighbours were the Moabites, Ammonites, Syrians, Edomites, Egyptians, that had been ill neighbours to Israel in helping to debauch them, and draw them from God; therefore God calls them his ill neighbours, and now they helped to make them desolate, and joined with the Chaldeans against them. It is just with God to make those the instruments of trouble to us whom we have made instruments of sin. That which God lays to their charge is, They have meddled with "the inheritance which I have caused my people Israel to inherit," they unjustly seized that which was none of their own; nay, they sacrilegiously turned that to their own use which was given to God's peculiar people. He that said, "Touch not my anointed;" said also, Touch not their inheritance; it is at your peril if you do. Not only the persons, but the estates of God's people are taken under his protection.

Secondly. What course he would take with them. 1. He would break the power they had got over his people, and force them to make restitution. I will "pluck out the house of Judah from among them," which would be a great favour to God's people, who had either been taken captive by them, or, when they fled to them for shelter, had been detained and made prisoners; but a great mortification to their enemies, who would be like a lion disappointed of his prey. The house of Judah either cannot or will not make any bold struggles towards their own liberty; but God will, with a gracious violence, pluck them out; will, by his Spirit, compel them to come out; and, by his power, compel their taskmasters to let them go, as he plucked Israel out of Egypt. 2. He would bring upon them the same calamities that they had been instrumental to bring upon his people; "I will pluck them out of their land." Judgment began at the house of God, but it did not end there. Nebuchadnezzar, when he had wasted the land of Israel, turned his hand against their evil neighbours, and was a scourge to them.

Thirdly. What mercy God had in store for such of them as would join themselves to him and become his people, ver. 15, 16. They had drawn in God's backsliding people to join with them in the service of idols. If now they would be drawn by a returning people to join with them in the service of the true and living God, they should not only have their enmity to the people of God forgiven them, but the distance which they had been kept at before should be removed, and they should be received to stand upon the same level with the Israel of God, which had its accomplishment in part when, after the return out of captivity, many of the people of the lands that had been ill neighbours to Israel became Jews, and was to have its accomplishment in the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ. Let not Israel, though injured by them, be implacable towards them, for God is not. "After that I have plucked them out," in justice for their sins, and in jealousy for the honour of Israel, "I will return," will change my way, "and have compassion on them." Though, being heathen, they can lay no claim to the mercies of the covenant, yet they shall have benefit by the compassions of the Creator, who will look upon them as the work of his hands however. Note, God's controversies with his creatures, though they cannot be disputed, yet may be accommodated. Those who, as these here, have been not only strangers, but enemies in their minds by wicked works, may be reconciled, Col. i. 21. Observe here,

1. What were the terms on which God would shew favour to them. It is always provided, "that they will diligently learn the ways of my people." That is in general, the ways which they walk in when they carry it as my people, not the crooked ways into which they have turned aside; the ways which my people are directed to take. Note, 1st. There are good ways that are peculiarly the ways of God's people, which, however they may differ in the choice of their paths, they are all agreed to walk in. The ways of holiness and heavenly-mindedness, of love and peaceableness, the ways of prayer and sabbath sanctification, and diligent attendance on instituted ordinances, these and the like are the ways of God's people. 2nd. Those that would have their lot with God's people, and their last end like theirs, must learn their ways and walk in them; must observe the rule they walk by and conform to that rule, and the steps they take by that rule, and go forth by those footsteps. By an intimate conversation with God's people they must learn to do as they do. 3rd. It is impossible to learn the ways of God's people as they should be learned without a great deal of care and pains. We must diligently observe these ways, and diligently oblige ourselves to walk in them; look diligently, Heb. xii. 15, and work diligently, Lu. xiii. 25. In particular they must learn to give honour to God's name, by making all their solemn appeals to him. They must "learn to say, The Lord liveth," to own him, and to adore him, and to abide by his judgment, "as they taught my people to swear by Baal." It was bad enough that they did themselves swear by Baal, worse that they taught others, and worst of all that they taught God's own people, who had been better taught; and yet if they will at length reform they shall be accepted. Observe, First. We must not despair of the conversion of the worst; no, not of those who have

xii. 9. The accuracy of our version here has been disputed, but we see no good reason for rejecting it. Perhaps the first clause may be taken as a double question: "Is mine heritage unto me as a speckled bird? Are the birds round about (against) her?" The figure is that of a spotted hawk or falcon, which is surrounded and assailed by other birds, as sometimes happens. The idea suggested by the Septuagint that the word for "speckled" means a hyæna cannot at all consistently be maintained, because the word which accompanies it always means a bird of prey, and never a quadruped, as such a view implies. It is quite true that the hyæna is common to this day in Palestine, and that the Arabic name for it resembles the Hebrew word here; but the fact already mentioned, viz., that Jeremiah speaks of a bird of prey, is conclusive for our version. Probably the question would never have been raised, but for the Greek version of "speckled bird"—viz., "den of a hyæna."

xii. 10. As herdsmen and shepherds who bring their cattle and been instrumental to pervert and debauch others; even they may be brought to repentance, and, if they be, shall find mercy. Secondly. Those whom we have been industrious to draw to that which is evil, when God opens their eyes and ours we should be as industrious to follow in that which is good. It will be a holy revenge upon ourselves to become pupils to those in the way of duty to whom we have been tutors in the way of sin. Thirdly. The conversion of the deceived may prove a happy occasion of the conversion even of the deceivers. Thus they who fell together into the ditch are sometimes plucked together out of it.

2. What should be the tokens and fruits of this favour when they return to God and God to them. 1st. They shall be restored to, and re-established in, their own land; ver. 15, "I will bring them again every man to his heritage." The same hand that plucked them up shall plant them again. 2nd. They shall become entitled to the spiritual privileges of God's Israel. If they will be towardly, and "learn the ways of my people," will conform themselves to the rules, and confine themselves to the restraints of God's family, "then shall they be built in the midst of my people." They shall not only be brought among them to have a name and a place in the house of the Lord, where there was a court for the Gentiles, but they shall be built among them, they shall unite with them, the former enmities shall be slain; they shall be both edified and settled among them: see Isa. lvi. 5—7. Note, They that diligently learn the ways of God's people shall enjoy the privileges and comforts of his people.

Fourthly. What should become of those that were still wedded to their own evil ways, yea, though many of those about them turned to the Lord; ver. 17, "If they will not obey," if any of them continue to stand it out, "I will utterly pluck up and destroy that nation," that family, that particular person, "saith the Lord." Those that will not be ruled by the grace of God shall be ruined by the justice of God. And if disobedient nations shall be destroyed, much more disobedient churches, from whom better things are expected.

CHAPTER XIII.

Still the prophet is attempting to awaken this secure and stubborn people to repentance, by the consideration of the judgments of God that were coming upon them. He is to tell them, I. By the sign of a girdle spoiled, that their pride should be stained, ver. 1—11. II. By the sign of bottles filled with wine, that their counsels should be blasted, ver. 12—14. III. In consideration hereof he is to call them to repent, and humble themselves, ver. 15—21. IV. He is to convince them that it is for their obstinacy and incorrigibleness that the judgments of God are so prolonged and brought to extremity, ver. 22—27.

THUS saith the LORD unto me, Go and get thee a linen girdle, and put it upon thy loins, and put it not in water. 2 So I got a girdle according to the word of the LORD, and put it on my loins. 3 And the word of the LORD came unto me the second time, saying, 4 Take the girdle that thou hast got, which is upon thy loins, and arise, go to Euphrates, and hide it there in a hole of the rock. 5 So I went, and hid it by Euphrates, as the LORD commanded me. 6 And it came to pass after many days, that the LORD said unto me, Arise, go to Euphrates, and take the girdle from thence, which I commanded thee to hide there. 7 Then I went to Euphrates, and digged, and took the girdle from the place where I had hid it: and, behold, the girdle was marred, it was profitable for nothing. 8 Then the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

9 Thus saith the LORD,
After this manner will I mar the pride of Judah,
And the great pride of Jerusalem.
10 This evil people, which refuse to hear my words,
Which walk in the imagination of their heart,
And walk after other gods,
To serve them, and to worship them,
Shall even be as this girdle, which is good for nothing.
11 For as the girdle cleaveth to the loins of a man,
So have I caused to cleave unto me the whole house of Israel
And the whole house of Judah, saith the LORD;
That they might be unto me for a people,
And for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory:
But they would not hear.

Here is, First. A sign, the marring of a girdle, which the prophet had worn for some time, by hiding it in a hole of a rock, near the river Euphrates. It was usual with the prophets to teach by signs, that a stupid unthinking people might be brought to consider and believe, and be affected with what was thus set before them. 1. He was to wear a linen girdle for some time, ver. 1, 2. Some think he wore it under his clothes, because it was linen, and is said to cleave to his loins, ver. 11. It should rather seem to be worn upon his clothes, for it was worn for a name and a praise, and probably was a fine sash, such as officers wear, and such as are commonly worn at this day in the eastern nations. He must not put it in water, but wear it as it was, that it might be the stronger and less likely to rot; linen wastes almost as much with washing as with wearing. Being not wet it was the more stiff, and less apt to ply, yet he must make a shift to wear it. Probably it was very fine linen, which will wear long without washing. The prophet, like John Baptist, was none of those that wore soft clothing, and therefore it would be the more strange to see him with a linen girdle on, who probably used to wear a leather one. 2. After he had worn this linen girdle for some time, he must go and hide it in a hole of a rock, ver. 4, by the waterside, where, when the water was high, it would be wet, and when it fell, would grow dry again, and by that means would soon rot, sooner than if it were always wet or always dry. 3. After many days he must go and look for it, and should find it quite spoiled, gone all to rags, and good for nothing, ver. 7. It has been of old a question among interpreters, whether this was really done so as to be seen and observed by the people, or only in a dream or vision, so as to go no farther than the prophet's own mind. It seems hard to imagine that the prophet should be sent on two such long journeys, as to the river Euphrates, each of which would take him up some weeks' time, when he could so ill be spared at home; and for that reason most incline to think the journey at least was only in vision, like that of Ezekiel, from the captivity in Chaldea to Jerusalem, Eze. viii. 3, and from thence back to Chaldea, Eze. xi. 24; and the explanation of this sign is only given to the prophet himself, ver. 8, not to the people, the sign not being public. But there being, it is probable, at that time great conveniences of travelling between Jerusalem and Babylon, and some part of Euphrates being not so far off, but that it was made the utmost border of the land of promise, Jos. i. 4, I see no inconvenience in supposing the prophet to have made two journeys thither; for it is expressly said, "he did as the Lord commanded him;" and thus gave a signal proof of his obsequiousness to his God, to shame the stubbornness of a disobedient people. And the toil of his journey would be very proper to signify both the pains they took to corrupt themselves with their idolatries and the sad fatigue of their captivity; and Euphrates, being the river of Babylon which was to be the place of their bondage, was a material circumstance in this sign.

Secondly. The thing signified by this sign. The prophet was willing to be at any cost and pains to affect this people with the word of the Lord. Ministers must spend and be spent for the good of souls. We have the reddition of this sign, ver. 9—11.

1. The people of Israel had been to God as this girdle in two respects: 1st. He had taken them into covenant and communion with himself; "As the girdle cleaveth" very close "to the loins of a man," and surrounds him, "so have I caused to cleave to me the houses of Israel and Judah." They were a people near to God, Ps. cxlviii. 14; they were his own, a peculiar people to him; a kingdom of priests that had access to him above other nations. He caused them to cleave to him by the law he gave them, the prophets he sent among them, and the favours which in his providence he shewed them. He required their stated attendance in the courts of his house, and the frequent ratification of their covenant with him by sacrifices. Thus they were made so to cleave to him that one would think they could never have been parted. 2nd. He had herein designed his own honour. When he took them to be to him for a people, it was that they might be to him "for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory," as a girdle is an ornament to a man, and particularly the curious girdle of the ephod was to the high priest for glory and for beauty. Note, Those whom God takes to be to him for a people he intends to be to him for a praise. First. It is their duty to honour him by observing his institutions, and aiming therein at his glory, and thus adorning their profession. Secondly. It is their happiness that he reckons himself honoured in them and by them. He is pleased with them, and glories in his relation to them, while they behave themselves as becomes his people. He was pleased to take it among the titles of his honour to be the God of Israel, even a God to Israel, 1 Chr. xvii. 24. In vain do we pretend to be to God for a people if we be not to him for a praise.

2. They had by their idolatries and other iniquities loosed themselves from him, thrown themselves at a distance, robbed him of the honour they owed him, buried themselves in the earth, and foreign earth too, mingling themselves among the nations, and were so spoiled and corrupted that they were good for nothing. They could no more be to God as they were designed, "for a name and a praise," for "they would not hear," neither their duty to do it nor their privilege to value it; "they refused to hear the words of God," by which they might have been kept still cleaving close to him; they "walked in the imagination of their heart," wherever their fancy led them, and denied themselves no gratification they had a mind to, particularly in their worship; they would not cleave to God, but "walked after other gods to serve them and to worship them;" they doated upon the gods of the heathen nations that lay towards Euphrates, so that they were quite spoiled for the service of their own God, and were as this girdle, this rotten girdle, a disgrace to their profession, and not an ornament. And a thousand pities it was that such a girdle should be so spoiled, that such a people should so wretchedly degenerate.

3. God would, by his judgments, separate them from him, send them into captivity, deface all their beauty and ruin their excellency, so that they should be like a fine girdle gone to rags, a worthless, useless, despicable people. God will after this manner "mar the pride of Judah and the great pride of Jerusalem." He would strip them of all that which was the matter of their pride, of which they boasted, and in which they trusted; it should not only be sullied and stained, but quite destroyed, like this linen girdle. Observe, He speaks of the pride of Judah; the country people were proud of their holy land, their good land, but it is the great pride of Jerusalem; there the temple was, and the royal palace, and therefore those citizens were more proud than the inhabitants of other cities. God takes notice of the degrees of men's pride, the pride of some and the great pride of others, and he will mar it, he will stain it. Pride will have a fall, for God resists the proud. He will either mar the pride that is in us, that is, mortify it by his grace, make us ashamed of it, and, like Hezekiah, humble us for the pride of our hearts, the great pride, and cure us of it, as great as it is, (and this marring of the pride will be the making of the soul; happy it is for us if, by humbling providences, our hearts be humbled,) or else he will mar the thing we are proud of. Parts, gifts, learning, power, external privileges, if we are proud of these, it is just with God to blast them; even the temple, when it became Jerusalem's pride, was marred and laid in ashes. It is the honour of God to look upon every one that is proud and abase him.

12 Therefore thou shalt speak unto them this word;
Thus saith the LORD God of Israel,
Every bottle shall be filled with wine:
And they shall say unto thee, [with wine?
Do we not certainly know that every bottle shall be filled 13 Then shalt thou say unto them, Thus saith the LORD, sheep into a vineyard or garden, devouring and treading under foot, so would the Chaldean commanders bring their hosts to lay waste the fruitful land of Israel.

xii. 14. This verse commences a distinct prophecy concerning various nations—the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Syrians, &c.—against whom prophecies will be found in chapters xlvii.—xlix., of which this is a kind of brief summary.

xiii. 1—7. We have here a symbolical prophecy, as all admit, but there are different opinions as to the mode of interpreting it. According to some it is a record of actual occurrences, but many regard it as the record of a prophetic vision. The form of the narrative is mostly quite clear. Jeremiah was to procure a new linen girdle, which he was to wear but not to wash. He was then bidden to take his girdle to the Euphrates, and hide it in a cleft of a rock. After a long time he was sent again to the Euphrates for his girdle, and found it spoiled. If the prophet actually went twice

Behold, I will fill all the inhabitants of this land,
Even the kings that sit upon David's throne,
And the priests, and the prophets,
And all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, with drunkenness
11 And I will dash them one against another,
Even the fathers and the sons together, saith the LORD:
I will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy,
But destroy them.
15 Hear ye, and give ear; be not proud:
For the LORD hath spoken.
16 Give glory to the LORD your God,
Before he cause darkness,
And before your feet stumble upon the dark mountains,
And, while ye look for light,
He turn it into the shadow of death, and make it gross [darkness.
17 But if ye will not hear it,
My soul shall weep in secret places for your pride;
And mine eye shall weep sore, and run down with tears,
Because the LORD's flock is carried away captive.
18 Say unto the king and to the queen,
Humble yourselves, sit down:
For your principalities shall come down,
Even the crown of your glory.
19 The cities of the south shall be shut up,
And none shall open them:
Judah shall be carried away captive all of it,
It shall be wholly carried away capuve [north:
20 Lift up your eyes, and behold them that come from the Where is the flock that was given thee, thy beautiful flock?
21 What wilt thou say when he shall punish thee?
For thou hast taught them to be captains, and as chief over thee:
Shall not sorrows take thee, as a woman in travail?

Here is, First. A judgment threatened against this people that would quite intoxicate them. This doom is pronounced against them in a figure, to make it the more taken notice of and the more affecting; ver. 12, "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Every bottle shall be filled with wine;" that is, Those that by their sins have made themselves "vessels of wrath, fitted to destruction," shall be filled with the wrath of God, as a bottle is with wine, and as every vessel of mercy, prepared for glory, shall be filled with mercy and glory, so "they shall be full of the fury of the Lord," Isa. li. 20, and they shall be brittle as bottles, and as old bottles into which new wine is put, they shall burst and be broken to pieces, Mat. ix. 17; or, they shall have their heads as full of wine as bottles are, for so it is explained, ver. 13, "They shall be filled with drunkenness:" compare Isa. li. 17. It is likely this was a common proverb among them, applied divers ways; but they, not being aware of the prophet's meaning in it, ridiculed him for it, "Do we not certainly know that every bottle shall be filled with wine?" What strange thing is there in that? Tell us something that we did not know before. Perhaps they were thus tetchy with the prophet because they apprehended this to be a reflection upon them for their drunkenness, and probably it was in part so intended; they love flagons of wine, Hos. iii. 1; they made their king sick with bottles of wine; Hos. vii. 5; their watchmen were all for wine, Isa. lvi. 12; they love their false prophets to prophesy to them of wine, Mic. ii. 11, that bid them be merry, for they should never want their bottle to make them so. Well, saith the prophet, you shall have your bottles full of wine, but not such wine as you desire. They suspected he had some mystical meaning in it, which prophesied no good concerning them, but evil, and he owns that so he had. What he meant was this,

1. That they should be as giddy as men in drink. And a drunken man is fitly compared to a bottle or cask full of wine; for when the wine is in the wit, and wisdom, and virtue, and all that is good for any thing, is out. Now God threatens, ver. 13, that they shall all be filled with drunkenness; they shall be full of confusion in their counsels, shall falter in all their talk, and stagger in all their motions; they shall not know what they say or do, much less what they should say or do. They shall be sick of all their enjoyments, and throw them up as drunken men do, Job xx. 15. They shall fall into a slumber, and be utterly unable to help themselves, and, like men that have drunk away their reason, shall lie at the mercy, and expose themselves to the contempt, of all about them. And this shall be the condition not of some among them, (if any had been sober they might have helped the rest,) but even "the kings that sit upon the throne of David," that should have been like their father David, who was wise as an angel of God, shall be thus intoxicated. Their priests and prophets too, their false prophets, that pretended to guide them, were as indulgent of their lusts, and therefore were justly as much deprived of their senses, as any other. Nay, and all the inhabitants both of the land and of Jerusalem were as far gone as they. Whom God will destroy he infatuates.

2. That being giddy they should run ahead upon one another. The cup of the wine of the Lord's fury shall throw them not only into a lethargy, so that they shall not be able to help themselves or one another, but into a perfect frenzy, so that they shall do mischief to themselves and one another; ver. 14, "I will dash a man against his brother." Not only their drunken follies but their drunken frays shall help to ruin them. Drunken men are often quarrelsome, and upon that account they have woe and sorrow, Pr. xxiii. 29, 30. So their sin is their punishment; it was so here. God sent an evil spirit into families and neighbourhoods, as Jud. ix. 23, which made them jealous of, and spiteful towards, one another; so that the fathers and sons went together by the ears, and were ready to pull one another to pieces, which made them all an easy prey to the common enemy. This decree against them being gone forth, God saith, "I will not pity, nor spare, nor have mercy, but destroy them;" for they will not pity, nor have mercy, but destroy one another: see Hab. ii. 15, 16.

Secondly. Here is good counsel given, which if it were taken this desolation would be prevented. It is, in short, to humble themselves under the mighty hand of God. If they will hearken and give ear, this is that which God has to say to them, "Be not proud," ver. 15. This was one of the sins for which God had a controversy with them, ver. 9; let them mortify and forsake this sin, and God will let fall his controversy. "Be not proud;" that is, when God speaks to you by his prophets do not think yourselves too good to be taught; be not scornful, be not wilful; let not your hearts rise against the word, nor slight the messengers that bring it you. When God is coming forth against you in his providences, and by them he speaks, be not secure when he threatens, be not impatient when he strikes; for pride is at the bottom of both. It is the great God that has spoken, whose authority is incontestable, whose power is irresistible; therefore bow to what he saith, and be not proud, as you have been. They must not be proud; for,

1. They must advance God, and study how to do him honour; "Give glory to the Lord your God," and not to your idols; not to other gods. Give him glory by confessing your sins, owning yourselves guilty before him, and accepting the punishment of your iniquity, ver. 16. Give him glory by a sincere repentance and reformation. Then, and not till then, we begin to live as we should, and to some good purpose, when we begin to "give glory to the Lord our God;" to make his honour our chief end, and to seek it accordingly. Do this quickly, while your space to repent is continued to you; "before he cause darkness," before he bring his judgments upon you, which you will see no way of escaping. Note, Darkness will be the portion of those that will not repent, to give glory to God. When those that by the fourth vial were scorched with heat repented not to give glory to God, the next vial filled them with darkness, Rev. xvi. 9, 10. The aggravation of the darkness here threatened is, 1st. That their attempts to escape shall hasten their ruin; "Their feet shall stumble;" when they are making all the haste they can over "the dark mountains," and they shall fall, and be unable to get up again. Note, Those that think to outrun the judgments of God will find their road impassable; let them make the best of their way, they can make nothing of it; the judgments that pursue them will overtake them; their way is dark and slippery, Ps. xxxv. 6. And therefore before it comes to that extremity it is our wisdom to give glory to him, and so make our peace with him; to fly to his mercy, and then there will be no occasion to fly from his justice. 2nd. That their hopes of a better state of things will be disappointed; "While you look for light," for comfort and relief, he will "turn it into the shadow of death," which is very dismal and terrible; and make it gross darkness, like that of Egypt, when Pharaoh continued to harden his heart, which was darkness that might be felt. The expectation of impenitent sinners perisheth when they die, and think to have it satisfied.

2. They must abase themselves, and take shame to themselves. The prerogative of the king and queen will not exempt them from this, ver. 18, "Say to the king and queen," that, as great as they are, they must humble themselves by true repentance, and so give both glory to God and a good example to their subjects. Note, Those that are exalted above others in the world must humble themselves before God, who is higher than the highest, and to whom kings and queens are accountable. They must humble themselves and sit down; sit down and consider what is coming; sit down in the dust, and lament themselves. Let them humble themselves, for God will otherwise take an effectual course to humble them. "Your principalities shall come down," the honour and power by which you value yourselves, and in which you confide, "even the crown of your glory," your goodly or glorious crown. When you are led away captives, where will your principality, and all the badges of it, be then? Blessed be God there is a crown of glory, which those shall inherit who do humble themselves, that shall never come down.

Thirdly. This counsel is enforced by some arguments if they continue proud and unhumbled.

1. It will be the prophet's unspeakable grief; ver. 17, "If you will not hear it," will not submit to the word, but continue refractory, not only mine eye, but "my soul shall weep in secret places." Note, The obstinacy of people in refusing to hear the word of God will be a heart-breaking to their poor ministers, who know something of the terrors of the Lord, and the worth of souls; and are so far from desiring that they tremble at the thoughts of the death of sinners. His grief for it was undissembled, his soul wept; and void of affectation, for he chose to weep in secret places, where no eye saw him but his who is all eye. He would not only mingle his tears with his public preaching, but with his private devotions; nay, thoughts of their case would make him melancholy, and he would become a perfect recluse. It would grieve him, 1st. To see their sins unrepented of; "My soul shall weep for your pride," your haughtiness, and stubbornness, and vain confidence. Note, The sins of others should be matter of sorrow to us; we must mourn for that which we cannot mend, and mourn the more for it because we cannot mend it. 2nd. To see their calamity past redress and remedy; "Mine eyes shall weep sore," not so much because my relations, friends, and neighbours are in distress, but "because the Lord's flock," his people, and the sheep of his pasture, "are carried away captive." That should always grieve us most by which God's honour suffers, and the interest of his kingdom is weakened.

2. It will be their own inevitable ruin, ver. 19—21.

1st. The land shall be laid waste; "The cities of the south shall be shut up." The cities of Judah lay in the southern part of the land of Canaan; these shall be straitly besieged by the enemy, so that there shall be no going in and out; or, deserted by the inhabitants that there shall be none to go in and out. Some understand it of the cities of Egypt which was south from Judah; the places there, whence they expected succours, shall fail them, and they shall find no access to them.

2nd. The inhabitants shall be hurried away into a foreign country, there to live in slavery; "Judah shall be carried away captive." Some were already carried off, which they hoped might serve to answer the prediction, and that the residue should still be left. No, "it shall be carried away all of it;" God will make a full end with them, "it shall be wholly carried away." So it was in the last captivity under Zedekiah, because they repented not.

3rd. The enemy was now at hand that should do this; ver. 20, "Lift up your eyes." I see them upon their march, and you may if you will "behold them that come from the north," from the land of the Chaldeans; see how fast they advance, how fierce they appear. Upon this he addresseth himself to the king, or rather (because the pronouns are feminine) to the city or state. First. What will you do now with the people which is committed to your charge, and which you ought to protect? "Where is the flock that was given thee, thy beautiful flock?" Whither canst thou take them now for shelter? How can they escape to the river Euphrates, a distance of more than two hundred miles, a long time must have been taken up with the four journeys, and for this reason among others many have regarded the whole as a vision. Others, taking it as a real record, believe that the Hebrew Phrath here signifies, not the river Euphrates, but Ephrath or Ephratah, i.e., Bethlehem (Gen. xxxv. 19). Thus Fürst says, "It denotes Bethlehem lying upon a hill, with the clefts of rocks in its vicinity, where the prophet Jeremiah performed symbolical acts." In favour of this explanation Bochart and many since his time have written.

xiii. 9—11. The application of the foregoing parable, as we may term it, is given in these verses, from which we gather that the girdle is a symbol of Israel, and that its defilement, corruption, and rejection answer to Israel's varied experience.

xiii. 12—14. The general sense of this is plain: as surely as bottles are made for wine, so surely shall proud and wicked Israel these ravening wolves? Magistrates must look upon themselves as shepherds, and those that are under their charge as their flock, which they are intrusted with the care of, and must give an account of; they must take delight in them as their beautiful flock, and consider what to do for their safety in times of public danger. Masters of families that neglect their children, and suffer them to perish for want of a good education, and ministers that neglect their people, should think they hear God putting this question to them, "Where is the flock that was given thee to feed, that beauteous flock?" It is starved, it is left exposed to the beasts of prey. What account wilt thou give of them when the chief Shepherd shall appear? Secondly. What have you to object against the equity of God's proceedings? "What wilt thou say when he shall visit upon thee" the former days? Thou canst say nothing, but that "God is just in all that is brought upon thee." They that flatter themselves with hopes of impunity, what will they say? What a confusion will cover their faces when they shall find themselves deceived, and that God doth punish them? Thirdly. What thoughts will they now have of their own folly, in giving the Chaldeans such power over them, by seeking to them for assistance, and joining in league with them? Thus "thou hast taught them against thyself to be captains, and to become the head." Hezekiah began, when he shewed his treasures to the ambassadors of the king of Babylon, tempting him thereby to come and plunder him. Those that, having a God to trust to, court foreign alliances, and confide in them, do but make rods for themselves, and teach their neighbours how to become their masters. Fourthly. How will they bear the trouble that is at the door? "Shall not sorrows take thee as a woman in travail?" Sorrows which thou canst not escape or put off, extremity of sorrows; and in these respects more grievous than those of a woman in travail, that they were not expected before, and that there is no man-child to be born, the joy of which shall make them afterwards to be forgotten.

That passeth away by the wind of the wilderness.
25 This is thy lot, the portion of thy measures from me,

Because thou hast forgotten me, and trusted in false-26 Therefore will I discover thy skirts upon thy face,
That thy shame may appear.
27 I have seen thine adulteries, and thy neighings,
The lewdness of thy whoredom,
And thine abominations on the hills in the fields.
Woe unto thee, O Jerusalem!
Wilt thou not be made clean? when shall it once be?

Here is, First. Ruin threatened, as before, that the Jews shall go into captivity, and fall under all the miseries of beggary and bondage; shall be stripped of their clothes, their skirts discovered, for want of upper garments to cover them; and their heels made bare, for want of shoes, ver. 22. Thus they used to deal with prisoners taken in war, when they drove them into captivity, naked and barefooted, Isa. xx. 4. Being thus carried off into a strange country, they shall be scattered there, as the stubble that is blown away by the wind of the wilderness, and nobody is concerned to bring it together again, ver. 24. If the stubble escape the fire it shall be carried away by the wind. If one judgment do not the work, another shall, with those that by sin have made themselves as stubble. They shall be stripped of all their ornaments, and exposed to shame, as whores that are carted, ver. 26. They made their pride appear, but God will make their shame appear; so that those who have doated on them shall be ashamed of them.

Secondly. An inquiry made by the people into the cause of this ruin, ver. 22. Thou wilt say in thine heart, (and God knows how to give a proper answer to what men say in their hearts, though they do not speak it out; Jesus knowing their thoughts replied to them, Mat. ix. 4,) "Wherefore come these things upon me?" The question is supposed to come into the heart, 1. Of a sinner quarrelling with God, and refusing to receive correction. They could not see that they had done any thing which might justly provoke God to be thus angry with them. They durst not speak it out; but in their hearts they thus charged God with unrighteousness, as if he had laid upon them more than was meet. They seek for the cause of their calamities, when, if they had not been wilfully blind, they might easily have seen it. Or, 2. Of a sinner returning to God. If there come but a penitent thought into the heart at any time, saying, "What have I done?" (ch. viii. 6) wherefore am I in affliction? why doth God contend with me? God takes notice of it, and is ready by his Spirit to impress the conviction, that sin being discovered it may be repented of.

Thirdly. An answer to this inquiry. God will be justified when he speaks, and will oblige us to justify him; and therefore will set the sin of sinners in order before them. Do they ask, "Wherefore these things came upon them?" Let them know it is all long of themselves.

1. It is for the greatness of their iniquities, ver. 22. God doth not take advantage against them for small faults. No, the sins for which he now punisheth them are of the first rate, very heinous in their own nature, and highly aggravated. For 'the multitude of thine iniquity,' so it may be read. Sins of every kind, and often repeated and relapsed into. And some think we are more in danger from the multitude of our lesser sins than from the heinousness of our greater sins; of both we may say, "Who can understand his errors?"

2. It is for their obstinacy in sin. Their being so long accustomed to it that there is little hopes left of their being reclaimed from it; ver. 23, "Can the Ethiopian change his skin," that is by nature black, "or the leopard his spots," that are even woven into the skin? Dirt contracted may be washed off; but we cannot alter the natural colour of a hair, Mat. v. 36, much less of the skin; and so impossible is it, morally impossible, to reclaim and reform these people. 1st. They had been long accustomed to do evil; they were taught to do evil; they had been educated and brought up in sin; they had served an apprenticeship to it, and had all their days made a trade of it. It was so much their constant practice that it was become a second nature to them. 2nd. Their prophets therefore despaired of ever bringing them to do good. That was it they aimed at; they persuaded them to cease to do evil, and learn to do well, but could not prevail. They had been so long used to do evil, that it was next to impossible for them to repent, and amend, and begin to do good. Note, Custom in sin is a very great hindrance to conversion from sin. The disease that is inveterate is generally thought incurable. Those that have been long accustomed to sin have shaken off the restraints of fear and shame; their consciences are seared, the habits of sin are confirmed; it pleads prescription, and it is just with God to give those up to their own hearts' lusts that have long refused to give up themselves to his grace. Sin is the blackness of the soul, the deformity of it; it is its spot, the discolouring of it; it is natural to us, we were shapen in it, so that we cannot get clear of it by any power of our own; but there is an Almighty grace that is able to change the Ethiopian's skin, and that grace shall not be wanting to those that, in a sense of their need of it, seek it earnestly, and improve it faithfully.

3. It is for their treacherous departures from the God of truth, and dependences on lying vanities; ver. 25, "This is thy lot," to be scattered and driven away; this is "the portion of thy measures from me," the punishment assigned thee as by line and measure; this shall be thy share of the miseries of this world; expect it, and think not to escape it. It is "because thou hast forgotten me," the favours I have bestowed upon thee, and the obligations thou art under to me; thou hast no sense, no remembrance of these. Forgetfulness of God is at the bottom of all sin, as the remembrance of our Creator betimes is the happy and hopeful beginning of a holy life. And, having forgotten me, thou hast trusted in falsehood; in idols, in an arm of flesh, in Egypt and Assyria, in the self-flatteries of a deceitful heart. Whatever those trust to that forsake God they will find it a broken reed, a broken cistern.

4. It is for their idolatry, their spiritual whoredom, that sin which is of all other most provoking to the jealous God. Therefore they are exposed to a shameful calamity, ver. 26, because they have been guilty of a shameful iniquity, and yet are shameless in it; ver. 27, "I have seen thine adulteries;" thine inordinate fancy for strange gods, which thou hast been impatient for the gratification of, and hast even neighed after it; even "the lewdness of thy whoredoms," thine impudence and insatiableness in them; that is, thy eager worshipping of idols on the hills in the fields, upon the high places. This is that for which a woe is denounced against thee, "O Jerusalem;" nay, and many woes.

Fourthly. Here is an affectionate expostulation with them in the close upon the whole matter. Though it was adjudged next to impossible for them to be brought to do good, ver. 23, yet while there is life there is hope; and therefore still he reasons with them to bring them to repentance, ver. 27. 1. He reasons with them concerning the thing itself; "Wilt thou not be made clean?" Note, It is the great concern of those who are polluted by sin to be made clean by repentance and faith, and an universal reformation. The reason why sinners are not made clean is because they will not be made clean; and herein they act most unreasonably. "Wilt thou not be made clean?" Surely thou wilt at length be persuaded to "wash thee, and make thee clean," and so be wise for thyself. 2. Concerning the time of it; "When shall it once be?" Note, It is an instance of the wonderful grace of God that he desires the repentance and conversion of sinners, and thinks the time long till they are brought to it. But it is an instance of the wonderful folly of sinners that they put that off from time to time which is of absolute necessity, and which, if it be not done some time, they are certainly undone for ever. They do not say they will never be cleansed, but not yet; they will defer it to a more convenient season, but cannot tell us "when it shall once be."

CHAPTER XIV.

This chapter was penned upon occasion of a great drought, for want of rain. This judgment began in the latter end of Josiah's reign, but, as it should seem, continued in the beginning of Jehoiakim's; for lesser judgments are sent to give warning of greater coming, if not prevented by repentance. This calamity was mentioned several times before, but here in this chapter more fully. Here is, I. A melancholy description of it, ver. 1—6. II. A prayer to God to put an end to this calamity, and to return in mercy to their land, ver. 7—9. III. A severe threatening, that God would proceed in his controversy, because they proceeded in their iniquity, ver. 10—12. IV. The prophet's excusing the people, by laying the blame on their false prophets; and the doom passed both on the deceivers and the deceived, ver. 13—16. V. Directions given to the prophet, instead of interceding for them, to lament them; but his continuing notwithstanding to intercede for them, ver. 17—22.

THE word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah concerning the dearth.

They are black unto the ground;
And the cry of Jerusalem is gone up.

They came to the pits, and found no water;
They returned with their vessels empty;
They were ashamed and confounded,
And covered their heads.

For there was no rain in the earth,
The plowmen were ashamed,
They covered their heads.

They snuffed up the wind like dragons;
Their eyes did fail, because there was no grass.

become a vessel of wrath. The threatening that kings and people shall be intoxicated is metaphorical, and signifies that God will manifest his anger towards them, and leave them to be a prey to one another as well as to strangers. The uncompromising fidelity with which Jeremiah denounced the sins and follies of his nation, and proclaimed the coming judgments of the Lord, is in strict harmony with the strong imagery which he employed on many occasions.

xiii. 16. "The shadow of death" is a phrase agreeing with the one following it here, and rendered "gross darkness," i.e., "the deepest darkness."

xiii. 18. The king was perhaps Jehoiakim, who is mentioned in chap. xxii. 24. The word for "queen" more properly means a great lady, and is perhaps the queen-mother, mentioned in chap. xxii. 26. But it may signify the king's chief wife, the actual queen, as in 1 Kings xi. 19. In countries where polygamy is practised, such a

EASTERN WATER CARRIERS.—ver. 3.

The first verse is the title of the whole chapter. It doth indeed all concern the dearth; but much of it is the prophet's prayers concerning it; yet these are not unfitly said to be the word of the Lord which came to him concerning it; for every acceptable prayer is that which God puts into our hearts. Nothing is our word that comes to him but what is first his word that comes from him. In these verses we have,

First. The language of nature lamenting the calamity. When the heavens were as brass, and distilled no dews, the earth was as iron, and produced no fruits; and then what an universal grief and confusion was there!

1. The people of the land were all in tears. "Destroy all their vines and their fig-trees, and you cause all their mirth to cease," Hos. ii. 11, 12. All their joy fails with the joy of harvest, with that of their corn and wine; ver. 2, "Judah mourneth," not for the sin but for the trouble; for the withholding of the rain, not for the withdrawing of God's favour. "The gates thereof;" that is, all that go in and out at their gates, "languish," look pale, and grow feeble, for want of the necessary supports of life, and for fear of the farther fatal consequences of this judgment. The gates, through which supplies of corn formerly used to be brought into their cities, now look melancholy, when, instead of that, the inhabitants are departing through them to seek for bread in other countries. Even those that sit in the gates languish, "they are black unto the ground;" they go in black as mourners, and sit on the ground; as the poor beggars at the gates are black in the face for want of food, blacker than a coal, Lam. iv. 8. Famine is represented by a black horse, Rev. vi. 5. They fall to the ground through weakness, not being able to go along the streets. "The cry of Jerusalem is gone up," that is, of the inhabitants of Jerusalem; for the city is served by the field; or, of people from all parts of the country met at Jerusalem to pray for rain, so some. But I think it was rather the cry of their trouble, and the cry of their sin, than the cry of their prayer.

2. The great men of the land felt from this judgment; ver. 3, "The nobles sent their little ones to the water," perhaps their own children, having been forced to part with their servants, because they had not wherewithal to keep them, and being willing to train up their children, when they were little, to labour, especially in a case of necessity, as this was. We find Ahab and Obadiah, the king and the lord chamberlain of his household, in their own persons seeking for water in such a time of distress as this was, 1 Kin. xviii. 5, 6. Or rather, 'Their meaner ones,' their servants and small officers; these they sent to seek for water, which there is no living without, but there was none to be found; "they returned with their vessels empty," the springs were dried up when there was no rain to feed them; and then they, that is, their masters that sent them, "were ashamed and confounded" at the disappointment. They would not be ashamed of their sins, nor confounded at the sense of them, but were unhumbled under the reproofs of the word, thinking their wealth and dignity set them above repentance; but God took a course to make them ashamed of that which they were so proud of, when they found that even on this side hell their nobility would not purchase them a drop of water to cool their tongue. Let our reading the account of this calamity make us thankful for the mercy of water, that we may not by the feeling of the calamity be taught to value it. What is most needful is most plentiful.

3. The husbandmen felt most sensibly and immediately from it; ver. 4, "The ploughmen were ashamed," for the ground was so parched and hard that it would not admit the plough; even then when it was so chapped and cleft that it seemed as if it did not need the plough. They were ashamed to be idle, for there was nothing to be done, and therefore nothing to be expected. The sluggard that will not plough by reason of cold is not ashamed of his own folly; but the diligent husbandman, that cannot plough by reason of heat, is ashamed of his own affliction: see what an immediate dependence husbandmen have upon the Divine providence, which therefore they should always have an eye to, for they cannot plough or sow in hope, unless God water their furrows, Ps. lxv. 10.

4. The case even of the wild beasts was very piteous, ver. 5, 6. Man's sin brings those judgments upon the earth which make even the inferior creatures groan; and the prophet takes notice of this as a plea with God for mercy. Judah and Jerusalem have sinned; but the hinds and the wild asses, what have they done? The hinds are pleasant creatures, lovely and loving, and particularly tender of their young; and yet such is the extremity of the case, that, contrary to the instinct of their nature, they leave their young, even when they are newly calved, and most need them, to go seek for grass elsewhere; and if they can find none they abandon them, because not able to suckle them. It grieved not the hind so much that she had no grass for herself as that she had none for her young; which will shame those who spend that upon their lusts which they should preserve for their families. The hind, when she has brought forth her young, is said to have cast forth her sorrows, Job xxxix. 3, and yet she continues her cares; but, as it follows there, soon sees the good effect of them, for her young ones in a little while grow up, and trouble her no more, ver. 4. But here the great trouble of all is, that she has nothing for them. Nay, one would be sorry even for the wild asses, (though they are creatures that none have any great affection for,) for though the barren land is made their dwelling at the best, Job xxxix. 5, 6, yet even that is now made too hot for them, so hot, that they cannot breathe in it; but they get to the highest places they can, where the air is coolest, and snuff up the wind like dragons, like those creatures that, being naturally exceeding hot, are continually panting for breath. Their eyes fail, and so doth their strength, because there is no grass to support them. The tame ass that serves her owner is welcome to his crib, Isa. i. 3, and has her keeping for her labour; when the wild ass, that scorns the crying of the driver, is forced to live upon air, and is well enough served for not serving. He that will not labour let him not eat.

Secondly. Here is the language of grace, lamenting the iniquity, and complaining to God of the calamity. The people are not forward to pray, but the prophet here prays for them, and so excites them to pray for themselves, and puts words into their mouths, which they may make use of in hopes to speed, ver. 7—9. In this prayer,

1. Sin is humbly confessed. When we come to pray for the preventing or removing of any judgment, we must always acknowledge that we deserve it, and a thousand times worse. We cannot hope by extenuating the crime to obtain a mitigation of the punishment, but must acknowledge that "our iniquities testify against us." Our sins are witnesses against us, and true penitents see them to be so. They testify, for they are plain and evident, we cannot deny the charge; they testify against us, for our conviction; which tends to our present shame and confusion, and our future condemnation. They disprove and overthrow all our pleas for ourselves; and so not only accuse us, but answer against us. If we boast of our own excellences, and trust to our own righteousness, our iniquities testify against us, and prove us perverse. If we quarrel with God as dealing unjustly or unkindly with us in afflicting us, our iniquities testify against us that we do him wrong; "Our backslidings are many," and our revolts are great, whereby "we have sinned against thee;" too numerous to be concealed, for they are many; too heinous to be excused, for they are against thee.

2. Mercy is earnestly begged; "Though our iniquities testify against us," and against the granting of the favour which the necessity of our case calls for, yet "Do thou it." They do not say particularly what they would have done; but, as becomes penitents and beggars, they refer themselves to God; Do with us as thou thinkest fit, Jud. x. 15. Not, Do thou it in this way, or at this time, but "Do thou it for thy name's sake;" that is, Do that which will be most for the glory of thy name. Note, Our best pleas in prayer are those that are fetched from the glory of God's own name. Lord, do it that thy mercy may be magnified, thy promise fulfilled, and thine interest in the world kept up; we have nothing to plead in ourselves, but every thing in thee. There is another petition in this prayer, and it is a very modest one; ver. 9, "Leave us not," withdraw not thy favour and presence. Note, We should dread and deprecate God's departures from us more than the removal of any of all our creature comforts.

3. Their relation to God, their interest in him, and their expectations from him grounded thereupon, are most pathetically pleaded with him, ver. 8, 9.

1st. They look upon him as one they have reason to think should deliver them when they are in distress, yea, though their iniquities testify against them; for in him mercy hath often rejoiced against judgment. The prophet, like Moses of old, is willing to make the best he can of the case of his people; and therefore, though he must own that they have sinned many a great sin, Ex. xxxii. 31, yet he pleads, "Thou art the hope of Israel." God has encouraged his people to hope in him, in calling himself so often the God of Israel, and the Rock of Israel, and the Holy One of Israel, he hath made himself the Hope of Israel. He has given Israel his word to hope in, and caused them to hope in it; and there are those yet in Israel that make God alone their hope, and expect he will be their Saviour in time of trouble, and they look not for salvation in any other. Thou hast many a time been so, in the time of their extremity. Note, Since God is his people's all-sufficient Saviour, they ought to hope in him in their greatest straits; and since he is their alone Saviour, they ought to hope in him only. They plead likewise, "Thou art in the midst of us," we have the special tokens of thy presence with us, thy temple, thine ark, thine oracles; and "we are called by thy name," the Israel of God, and therefore we have reason to hope thou wilt not leave us; "We are thine, save us." Thy name is called upon by us, and therefore what evils we are under reflect dishonour upon thee, as if thou wast not able to relieve thine own. The prophet had often told the people that their profession of religion would not protect them from the judgments of God; yet here he pleads it with God, as Moses, Ex. xxxii. 11; even this may go far as to temporal punishments with a God of mercy; valeat quantum valere potest, —'let the plea avail as far as is proper.'

2nd. It therefore grieves them to think that he doth not appear for their deliverance; and, though they do not charge it upon him as unrighteous, they humbly plead it with him why he should be gracious,—for the glory of his own name. For otherwise he will seem, First. Unconcerned for his own people. What will the Egyptians say? They will say, Israel's hope and Saviour never minds them; he is become as a stranger in the land, that doth not at all interest himself in its interests; that his temple, which he called his rest for ever, is no more so, but he is in it "as a wayfaring man, that turns aside to tarry but for a night" in an inn, which he never inquires into the affairs of, nor is in any care about. Though God never is, yet he sometimes seems to be, as if he cared not what became of his church. Christ slept when his disciples were in a storm. Secondly. Incapable of giving them any relief. The enemies will say, Because the Lord was not able to bring his people to Canaan, he let them perish in the wilderness, Num. xiv. 16; so now they will say, that either his wisdom or his power fail him; that either he is as a man astonished, who, though he has the reason of a man, yet, being astonished, is quite at a loss, and at his wit's end; or, as a mighty man, that is overpowered by such as are more mighty, and therefore cannot save; though mighty, yet a man, and therefore his power limited. Either of these would be a most insufferable reproach to the Divine perfections. And therefore why is the God, that we are sure is in the midst of us, become as a stranger? Why doth the almighty God seem as if he were no more than a mighty man, who, when he is astonished, though he would, yet cannot save? It becomes us in prayer to shew ourselves concerned more for God's glory than for our own comfort. "Lord, what wilt thou do unto thy great name?"

10 Thus saith the LORD unto this people,
Thus have they loved to wander,
They have not refrained their feet, distinction would be quite intelligible. In support of the former view, appeal is made to 2 Kings xxiv. 8, but reference to verse 15 of that chapter shows that it is an open question.

xiii. 19. This scarcely means the cities of Judah generally, as Blayney thought, but those of the extreme south of Palestine. As Henderson well puts it, "Even those cities which lay farthest from the approaching enemy are represented as entirely deserted."

xiii. 21. This verse is peculiar, and especially in the second clause, which is translated in various ways: "for that thou hast taught them to be chiefs over thee at the head;" "for thou hast taught them to be chief princes over thee;" "since thou thyself hast accustomed them to thee as friends at thy head." We believe that the sense is this: Israel had shown the Assyrians the wealth and resources of the kingdom, and had practically taught and tempted the enemy to come and make Palestine a tributary to Chaldea. The reason why some translate the Hebrew word alluphim "captains,

Therefore the LORD doth not accept them;
He will now remember their iniquity,
And visit their sins.
11 Then said the LORD unto me,
Pray not for this people for their good.
12 When they fast, I will not hear their cry;
And when they offer burnt offering and an oblation, I will not accept them:
But I will consume them by the sword,
And by the famine, and by the pestilence.
13 Then said I, Ah, Lord GOD!
Behold, the prophets say unto them,
Ye shall not see the sword, neither shall ye have famine;
But I will give you assured peace in this place
14 Then the LORD said unto me,
The prophets prophesy lies in my name:
I sent them not, neither have I commanded them,
Neither spake unto them:
They prophesy unto you a false vision and divination,
And a thing of nought, and the deceit of their heart.
15 Therefore thus saith the LORD
Concerning the prophets that prophesy in my name, and I sent them not,
Yet they say, Sword and famine shall not be in this land;
By sword and famine shall those prophets be consumed,
16 And the people to whom they prophesy
Shall be cast out in the streets of Jerusalem
Because of the famine and the sword;
And they shall have none to bury them,
Them, their wives, nor their sons, nor their daughters:
For I will pour their wickedness upon them.

The dispute between God and his prophet in this chapter seems to be like that between the owner and the dresser of the vineyard, concerning the barren fig-tree, Lu. xiii. 7. The justice of the owner condemns it to be cut down, the clemency of the dresser intercedes for a reprieve. Jeremiah had been earnest with God in prayer to return in mercy to this people. Now here,

First. God overrules the plea which he had offered in their favours, and shews him that it would not hold. In answer to it thus he saith, "Concerning this people," ver. 10. He doth not say, Concerning my people, for he disowns them, because they had broken covenant with him. It is true they were called by his name, and had the tokens of his presence among them; but they had sinned, and provoked God to withdraw. This the prophet had owned, and hoped to obtain mercy for them, notwithstanding this, through intercession and sacrifice; therefore God here tells him,

1. That they were not duly qualified for a pardon. The prophet had owned their backslidings were many; and, though they were so, yet there was hopes for them if they returned; but this people shews no disposition at all to return. They have wandered, and they have loved to wander; their backslidings have been their choice and their pleasure, which should have been their shame and pain, and therefore they will be their ruin. They cannot expect God should take up his rest with them when they take such delight in going astray from him after their idols. It is not through necessity or inadvertency that they wander, but they love it. Sinners are wanderers from God; their wanderings forfeit God's favour; but it is their loving to wander that quite cuts them off from it. They were told what their wanderings would come to, that one sin would hurry them on to another, and all to ruin; and yet they have not taken warning, and refrained their feet. So far were they from returning to their God, that neither his prophets nor his judgments could prevail with them to give themselves the least check in a sinful pursuit. This is that for which God is now reckoning with them. When he denies them rain from heaven he is remembering their iniquity and visiting their sin; that is it for which their fruitful land is thus turned into barrenness.

2. That they had no reason to expect that the God they had rejected should accept them; no, not though they betook themselves to fasting and prayer, and put themselves to the expence of burnt offerings and sacrifice. "The Lord doth not accept them," ver. 10. "He takes no pleasure in them," so the word is; for what pleasure can the holy God take in those that take pleasure in his rivals, in any service, in any society rather than his. "When they fast," ver. 12, which is a proper expression of repentance and reformation; "when they offer a burnt offering and an oblation," which was designed to be an expression of faith in a Mediator, though their prayers be thus enforced, and offered up in those vehicles that used to be acceptable, yet, because they do not proceed from humble, penitent, and renewed hearts, but still they love to wander, therefore I will not hear their cry, be it never so loud; nor will I accept them; neither their persons nor their performances. It had been long since declared, that "the sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord," and those only are accepted that do well, Gen. iv. 7.

3. That they had forfeited all benefit by the prophet's prayers for them, because they had not regarded his preaching to them. This is the meaning of that repeated prohibition given to the prophet; ver. 11, "Pray not thou for this people for their good," as before, ch. xi. 14; vii. 16. This did not forbid him thus to express his good-will to them. Moses continued to intercede for Israel, after God had said, "Let me alone," Ex. xxxii. 10; but it forbade them to expect any good effect from it, as long as they turned away their ear from hearing the law. Thus was the doom of the impentitent ratified, as that of Saul's rejection was by that word to Samuel, "When wilt thou cease to mourn for Saul?" It therefore follows, ver. 12, "I will consume them," not only by this famine, but by the farther sore judgments of sword and pestilence; for God has many arrows in his quiver, and those that will not be convinced and reclaimed by one shall be consumed by another.

Secondly. The prophet offers another plea in excuse of the people's obstinacy; and it is but an excuse, but he was willing to say whatever their case would bear. It is this, that the prophets, who pretended a commission from heaven, imposed upon them, and flattered them with assurances of peace, though they went on in their sinful way, ver. 13. He speaks of it with lamentation; "Ah Lord God," the poor people seem willing to take notice of what comes in thy name; and there are those who in thy name tell them that they shall not see the sword or famine, and they say it as from thee, with all the gravity and confidence of prophets; 'I will continue you in this place, and will give you assured peace here, peace of truth.' I tell them the contrary, but I am one against many, and every one is apt to credit that which makes for them; therefore, Lord, pity and spare them, for their leaders cause them to err. This excuse had been of some weight if they had not had warning given them before of false prophets, and rules by which to discover them; so that if they were deceived it was purely their own fault. But this teacheth us, as far as we can with truth, to make the best of bad, and judge as charitably of others as their case will bear.

Thirdly. God not only overrules this plea, but condemns both the blind leaders and the blind followers to fall together into the ditch.

1. God disowns the flatteries; ver. 14, "They prophesy lies in my name." They had no commission from God to prophesy at all, "I neither sent them, nor commanded them, nor spake unto them." They never were employed to go on any errand at all from God, he never made himself known to them, much less by them to the people; never any word of the Lord came to them, no call, no warrant, no instructions, much less did he send them on this errand, to rock them asleep in security. No; men may flatter themselves, and Satan may flatter them, but God never doth. It is a false vision, and a thing of nought. Note, What is false and groundless is vain and worthless. The vision that is not true, be it never so pleasing, is good for nothing; it is the deceit of their heart, a spider's web spun out of their own bowels, and in it they think to shelter themselves; but it will be swept away in a moment, and prove a great cheat. They that oppose their own thoughts to God's word (God indeed saith so, but they think otherwise) walk in the deceit of their heart, and it will be their ruin.

2. He passeth sentence upon the flatterers, ver. 15. As for the prophets, who put this abuse upon the people, by telling them they shall have peace; and this affront upon God by telling them so in God's name, let them know that they shall have no peace themselves. They shall fall first by those very judgments, which they have flattered others with the hopes of an exemption from. They undertook to warrant people, that sword and famine should not be in the land; but it shall soon appear how little their warrants are good for, when they themselves shall be cut off by sword and famine. How should they secure others, or foretell peace to them, when they cannot secure themselves, nor have such a foresight of their own calamities as to get out of the way of them. Note, The sorest punishments await those who promise sinners impunity in their sinful ways.

3. He lays the flattered under the same doom, ver. 16. The people to whom they prophesy lies, and who willingly suffer themselves to be thus imposed upon, they shall die by sword and famine. Note, The unbelief of the deceived, with all the falsehood of the deceivers, shall not make the Divine threatenings of none effect. Sword and famine will come, whatever they say to the contrary; and those will be least safe that are most secure. Impenitent sinners will not escape the damnation of hell by saying they can never believe there is such a thing; but will feel what they will not fear. It is threatened that this people shall not only fall by sword and famine, but they shall be as it were hanged up in chains, as monuments of that Divine justice which they set at defiance; their bodies shall be cast out, even in the streets of Jerusalem, which of all places, one would think should be kept clear from such nuisances. There they shall lie unburied; their nearest relations, who should do them that last office of love, being either so poor that they cannot afford it, or so weakened with hunger that they are not able to attend it, or so overwhelmed with grief that they have no heart to it, or so destitute of natural affection that they will not pay them so much respect. Thus will God pour their wickedness upon them, that is, the punishment of their wickedness; the full vials of God's wrath shall be poured on them, to which they have made themselves obnoxious. Note, When sinners are overwhelmed with trouble, they must in it see their own wickedness poured upon them. This refers to the wickedness, both of the false prophets and of the people; the blind lead the blind, and both fall together into the ditch, where they will be miserable comforters one to another.

17 Therefore thou shalt say this word unto them;
Let mine eyes run down with tears night and day,
And let them not cease:
For the virgin daughter of my people is broken
With a great breach, with a very grievous blow
18 If I go forth into the field,
Then behold the slain with the sword!
And if I enter into the city,
Then behold them that are sick with famine!
Yea, both the prophet and the priest
Go about into a land that they know not.
19 Hast thou utterly rejected Judah?
Hath thy soul lothed Zion?
Why hast thou smitten us, and there is no healing for us?
We looked for peace, and there is no good;
And for the time of healing, and behold trouble!
20 We acknowledge, O LORD, our wickedness,
And the iniquity of our fathers:
For we have sinned against thee.
21 Do not abhor us, for thy name's sake,
Do not disgrace the throne of thy glory:
Remember, break not thy covenant with us chiefs, and princes," and others "friends," arises from the fact that it has both meanings. This very ambiguity is instructive, for the Jews found in the Chaldeans masters as well as friends.

xiii. 23. The first part of this verse is proverbial in form, and resembles sayings current in other ancient nations. Thus Pindar says, "Neither the loud-roaring lion nor the fiery fox can change their inborn disposition;" and Lucian, "Why do you fruitlessly wash the body of an Ethiopian? Forbear your art; you cannot bring the sun upon a dark night." It seems that the Cushites of Asia and of Africa were alike very dark-skinned.

xiv. 1. The word "dearth" is used for a time of scarcity, when provisions are high-priced or dear. The Hebrew term rather points to drought, or the want of rain; and this idea predominates in the sad but graphic picture which follows.

xiv. 3. "Little ones" may not be children here, but inferiors or subordinates, who are sent by their masters to fetch water.

22 Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain?
Or can the heavens give showers?
Art not thou he, O LORD our God?
Therefore we will wait upon thee:
For thou hast made all these things

The present deplorable state of Judah and Jerusalem is here made the matter of the prophet's lamentation, ver. 17, 18; and the occasion of his prayer and intercession for them, ver. 19; and I am willing to hope that the latter as well as the former is by Divine direction, and that these words, ver. 17, "Thus shalt thou say unto them," or concerning them, or in their hearing, refer to the intercession as well as to the lamentation, and then it amounts to a revocation of the directions given to the prophet not to pray for them, ver. 11. However, it is plain, by the prayers we find in these verses, that the prophet did not understand it as a prohibition, but only as a discouragement, like that, 1 Jno. v. 16, "I do not say he shall pray for that." Here,

First. The prophet stands weeping over the ruins of his country. God directs him to do so, that, shewing himself affected, he might if possible affect them with the foresight of the calamities that were coming upon them. Jeremiah must not only say it to himself, but to them too, "Let mine eyes run down with tears," ver. 17. Thus he must signify to them, that he certainly foresaw the sword coming, and another sort of famine, more grievous even than this which they were now groaning under; this was in the country for want of rain, that in the city through the straitness of the siege. The prophet speaks as if he already saw the miseries attending the descent which the Chaldeans made upon them; "The virgin daughter of my people," that is as dear to me as a daughter to her father, she "is broken with a great breach, with a very grievous blow," much greater and more grievous than any she has yet sustained; for, ver. 18, in the field multitudes lie dead that were slain by the sword, and in the city multitudes lie dying for want of food. Doleful spectacles! The prophets and the priests, the false prophets that flattered them with their lies, and the wicked priests that persecuted the true prophets, these are now expelled their country, and go about, either as prisoners and captives, whithersoever their conquerors lead them; or as fugitives and vagabonds, wherever they can find shelter and relief, in a land that they know not. Some understand it of the true prophets, Ezekiel and Daniel, that were carried to Babylon with the rest. The prophet's eyes must run down with tears day and night in the prospect of this, that the people might be convinced, not only that this woful day would infallibly come, and would be a very woful day indeed, but that he was far from desiring it, and would as gladly have brought them messages of peace as their false prophets, if he might but have had warrant from heaven to do it. Note, Because God, though he inflicts death on sinners, yet delights not in it, it becomes his ministers, though in his name they pronounce the death of sinners, yet sadly to lament it.

Secondly. He stands up to make intercession for them; for who knows but God will yet return and repent? While there is life there is hope and room for prayer. And though there were many among them who neither prayed themselves nor valued the prophet's prayers, yet there were some who were better affected, would join with him in his devotions, and set the seal of their Amen to them.

1. He humbly expostulates with God concerning the present deplorableness of their case, ver. 19. It was very sad, for, 1st. Their expectations from their God failed them. They thought he had avouched Judah to be his; but now it seems he hath utterly rejected it, and cast it off; will not own any relation to it, or concern for it. However, they thought Zion was the beloved of his soul, was his rest for ever; but now his soul even loathes Zion, loathes even the services there performed, for the sake of the sins there committed. 2nd. Then no marvel that all their other expectations failed them. They were smitten, and their wounds were multiplied, but there was no healing for them; they looked for peace, because there uses to come after a storm a calm, and fair weather after a long fit of wet, but there was no good; things went still worse and worse. They looked for a healing time, but could not gain so much as a breathing time. Behold trouble at the door, by which we hoped peace would enter. And is it so then? "Hast thou" indeed "rejected Judah?" Justly thou mightest. "Hath thy soul loathed Zion?" We deserve it should. But wilt thou not at length in wrath remember mercy?

2. He makes a penitent confession of sin, speaking that language which they all should have spoken, though but few did; ver. 20, We acknowledge our wickedness, the abounding wickedness of our land, and the iniquity of our fathers, which we have imitated, and therefore justly smart for. We know, we acknowledge, that we have sinned against thee, and therefore thou art just in all that is brought upon us; but because we confess our sins we hope to find thee faithful and just in forgiving our sins.

3. He deprecates God's displeasure, and by faith appeals to his honour and promise, ver. 21. His petition is, "Do not abhor us;" though thou afflict us, "do not abhor us;" though thy hand be turned against us, let not thy heart be so, nor let thy mind be alienated from us. They own God might justly abhor them, they had rendered themselves odious in his eyes; yet, when they pray, "Do not abhor us," they mean, receive us into favour again. "Let not thy soul loathe Zion," ver. 19. Let not our incense be an abomination. They appeal, 1st. To the honour of God, the honour of his Scriptures, by which he hath made himself known; his word, which he hath magnified above all his name. "Do not abhor us for thy name's sake," that name of thine by which we are called, and which we call upon. The honour of his sanctuary. Lord, do not abhor us, for that will disgrace the throne of thy glory; that is, the temple, which is called "a glorious high throne from the beginning," ch. xvii. 12. Let not that which has been the joy of the whole earth be made a hissing and an astonishment; we deserve to have disgrace put upon us, but let it not be so as to reflect upon thyself; let not the desolations of the temple give occasion to the heathen to reproach Him that used to be worshipped there, as if he could not or would not protect it, or as if the gods of the Chaldeans had been too hard for him. Note, Good men lay the credit of religion, and its profession in the world, nearer their hearts than any private interest or concern of their own; and those are powerful pleas in prayer which are fetched from thence, and great supports to faith. We may be sure God will not disgrace the throne of his glory on earth, nor eclipse the glory of his throne by one providence, but he will soon make it shine forth, and more brightly than before, by another. God will be no loser in his honour at the long run. 2nd. To the promise of God. Of this they are humbly bold to put him in mind; Remember thy covenant with us, and break not that covenant. Not that they had any distrust of his fidelity, or that they thought he needed to be put in mind of his promise to them, but what he had said he would plead with himself; they take the liberty to plead with him: "Then will I remember my covenant," Lev. xxvi. 42.

4. He professeth a dependence upon God for the mercy of rain, which they were now in the want of, ver. 22. If they have forfeited their interest in him as their God in covenant, yet they will not let go their hold as the God of nature. 1st. They will never make their application to the idols of the heathen, for that would be foolish and fruitless. "Are there any among the vanities of the Gentiles that can cause rain?" No; in a time of great drought in Israel, Baal, though all Israel was at his devotion in the days of Ahab, yet he could not relieve them; it was that God only who answered by fire that could answer by water too. 2nd. They will not terminate their regards in second causes, nor expect supply from nature only. "Can the heavens give showers?" No, not without orders from the God of heaven; for it is he that has the key of the clouds, that "opens the bottles of heaven, and waters the earth from his chambers." But, 3rd. All their expectation therefore is from him, and their confidence in him. "Art not thou he, O Lord our God," from whom we may expect succour, and to whom we must apply ourselves? And art not thou he that causeth rain and giveth showers? for thou hast made all these things; thou gavest them being, and therefore thou givest them law, and hast them all at thy command; thou madest that moisture in nature, which is in a continual circulation, to serve the intentions of providence, and thou directest it, and makest what use thou pleasest of it; "Therefore we will wait upon thee," and upon thee only; we will "ask of the Lord rain," Zec. x. 1. We will trust in him to give it us in due time, and be willing to tarry his time; it is fit we should, and it will not be in vain to do so. Note, The sovereignty of God should engage, and his all-sufficiency encourage, our attendance on him, and our expectations from him at all times.

CHAPTER XV.

When we left the prophet in the close of the foregoing chapter, so pathetically pouring out his prayer before God, we had reason to hope, that in this chapter we should find God reconciled to the land, and the prophet brought into a quiet composed frame; but to our great surprise we find it much otherwise as to both. I. Notwithstanding the prophet's prayers, God here ratifies the sentence given against the people, and abandons them to ruin, turning a deaf ear to all the intercessions made for them, ver. 1—9. II. The prophet himself, notwithstanding the satisfaction he had in communion with God, still finds himself uneasy and out of temper: 1. He complains to God of his continual struggle with his persecutors, ver. 10; 2. God assures him that he shall be taken under special protection, though there was a general desolation coming upon the land, ver. 11—14; 3. He appeals to God concerning his sincerity in the discharge of his prophetical office, and thinks it hard he should not have more of the comfort of it, ver. 15—18; 4. Fresh security is given him that, upon condition he continue faithful, God will continue his care of him, and his favour to him, ver. 19—21. And thus, at length, we hope he regained the possession of his own soul.

THEN said the LORD unto me,
Though Moses and Samuel stood before me,
Yet my mind could not be toward this people:
Cast them out of my sight, and let them go forth.
2 And it shall come to pass,
If they say unto thee, Whither shall we go forth?
Then thou shalt tell them, Thus saith the LORD;
Such as are for death, to death;
And such as are for the sword, to the sword;
And such as are for the famine, to the famine;
And such as are for the captivity, to the captivity.
3 And I will appoint over them four kinds, saith the LORD:
The sword to slay, and the dogs to tear,
And the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the earth,
To devour and destroy.
4 And I will cause them to be removed into all kingdoms of the earth,
Because of Manasseh the son of Hezekiah king of Judah,
For that which he did in Jerusalem.
5 For who shall have pity upon thee, O Jerusalem?
Or who shall bemoan thee?
Or who shall go aside to ask how thou doest?
6 Thou hast forsaken me, saith the LORD,
Thou art gone backward: [destroy thee;
Therefore will I stretch out my hand against thee, and I am weary with repenting.

I will bereave them of children, I will destroy my people,
Since they return not from their ways. [seas:

xiv. 6. The wild ass is now not found west of the Jordan. Here again "dragons" should be jackals, which are very keen-scented animals.

xiv. 8. Arundell says it is the custom in Asia Minor to reserve a chamber for travellers, who remain usually but one night.

xiv. 9. "Astonied" means stupefied, and the word here might be so rendered. The Greek is "asleep," which is wrong, as is the Syriac, "feeble."

xiv. 13—18. This passage ought to be viewed in conjunction with Ezek. xiv. 9, 10, where our version has, "And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet," &c. In the rest of the passage the false prophet and his followers are menaced with common punishment, as in the passage before us. There is, however, an apparent discrepancy: in Ezekiel God is the deceiver of the deceitful prophet; but in Jeremiah the false prophets lie when they use God's name, because he has not sent

We scarce find anywhere more pathetical expressions of Divine wrath against a provoking people than we have here in these verses. The prophet had prayed earnestly for them, and found some among them to join with him; and yet not so much as a reprieve was gained, or the least mitigation of the judgment; but this answer is given to the prophet's prayers, that the decree was gone forth, was irreversible, and would shortly be executed. Observe here,

First. What the sin was upon which this severe sentence was grounded. 1. It is in remembrance of a former iniquity; it is because of Manasseh, for that which he did in Jerusalem, ver. 4. What that was we are told, and that it was for that that Jerusalem was destroyed, 1 Kin. xxiv. 3, 4. It was for his idolatry, and "the innocent blood which he shed, which the Lord would not pardon." He is called the son of Hezekiah, because his relation to so good a father was a great aggravation of his sin, so far was it from being an excuse of it. The greatest part of a generation was worn off since Manasseh's time, yet his sin is brought into that account; as in Jerusalem's last ruin God brought upon it all the righteous blood shed on the earth, to shew how heavy the guilt of blood will light and lie somewhere, sooner or later, and that reprieves are not pardons. 2. It is in consideration of their present impenitency. See how their sin is described; ver. 6, "Thou hast forsaken me," my service, and thy duty to me; "Thou art gone backward," into the ways of contradiction, art become the reverse of what thou shouldest have been, and of what God by his law would have led thee forward to; and see how the impenitency is described, ver. 7, "They return not from their ways," the ways of their own hearts, into the ways of God's commandments again. There is mercy for those who have turned aside, if they will return. But what favour can they expect that persist in their apostacy?

Secondly. What the sentence is. It is such as speaks no less than an utter ruin.

1. God himself abandons and abhors them; "My mind cannot be towards them." How can it be thought that the holy God should have any remaining complacency in those that have such a rooted antipathy to him. It is not in a passion, but with a just and holy indignation, that he saith, "Cast them out of my sight," as that which is in the highest degree odious and offensive; "and let them go forth," for I will be troubled with them no more.

2. He will not admit any intercession to be made for them, ver. 1. "Though Moses and Samuel stood before me," by prayer or sacrifice to reconcile me to them, yet I could not be prevailed with to admit them into favour. Moses and Samuel were two as great favourites of Heaven as ever were the blessings of this earth, and were particularly famed for the success of their mediation between God and his offending people. Many a time they had been destroyed if Moses had not stood before him in the breach; and to Samuel's prayers they owe their lives, 1 Sam. xii. 19; yet even their intercessions should not prevail, no, not though they were now in a state of perfection, much less Jeremiah's, who was a man now subject to like passions as others. The putting of this as a case, Though they should stand before me, supposeth that they do not, and is an intimation that saints in heaven are not intercessors for saints on earth. It is the prerogative of the eternal Word to be the only mediator in the other world, whatever Moses, and Samuel, and others, were in this.

3. He condemns them all to one destroying judgment or other. When God casts them out of his presence, "Whither shall they go forth?" ver. 2. Certainly no whither to be safe or easy; but to be met by one judgment while they are pursued by another, till they find themselves surrounded with mischiefs on all hands, so that they cannot escape. "Such as are for death, to death;" by death here is meant the pestilence, Rev. vi. 8, for it is death without visible means. Those that "are for death to death," or "for the sword to the sword," that is, every man shall perish in that way that God hath appointed. The law that appoints the malefactor's death determines what death he shall die; or, he that is by his own choice for this judgment, let him take it, or for that, let him take it, but by the one or the other they shall all fall, and none shall escape. It is a choice like that which David was put to, and was thereby put into a great strait, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. Captivity is mentioned last, some think because the sorest judgment of all; it being both a complication and continuance of miseries. That of the sword is again repeated, ver. 3, and is made the first of another four frightful set of destroyers, which God will appoint over them; as officers over the soldiers, to do what they please with them. As those that escape the sword, yet shall be cut off by pestilence, famine, or captivity, so those that fall by the sword, yet Divine vengeance has not done with them, that pursues sinners on the other side of death. There shall be dogs to tear in the city, and fowls of the air, and wild beasts in the field to devour. And if there be any that think to outrun justice they shall be made the most public monuments of it: "They shall be removed into all kingdoms of the earth," ver. 1, like Cain, who, that he might be made a spectacle of horror to all, became a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth.

4. They shall fall without being relieved. Who can do any thing to help them when, 1st. God, even their own God, (so he had been,) appears against them? "I will stretch out my hand against thee," which notes a deliberate, determined stroke, which will reach far, and wound deep; ver. 6, "I am weary with repenting." It is a strange expression. They had carried themselves so provokingly, especially by their treacherous professions of repentance, that they had put even infinite patience itself to the stretch. God had oftentimes turned away his wrath, when it was ready to break forth against them, but now he will grant no more reprieves. Miserable is the case of those who have sinned so long against God's mercy, that at length they have sinned it away. 2nd. Their own country expels them, and is ready to spew them out, as it had done the Canaanites that were before them; for so it was threatened, Lev. xviii. 28, "I will fan them with a fan in the gates of the land," in their own gates, through which they shall be scattered; or "into the gates of the earth," that is, into the cities of all the nations about them. 3rd. Their own children, that should assist them when they speak with the enemy in the gate, shall be cut off from them, ver. 7, "I will bereave them of children," so that they shall have little hopes that the next generation will retrieve their affairs, for "I will destroy my people," and when the inhabitants are slain the land will soon be desolate. This melancholy article is enlarged upon, ver. 8, 9, where we have,

First. The destroyer brought upon them. When God has bloody work to do, he will find out bloody instruments to do it with. Nebuchadnezzar is here called, "a spoiler at noonday," not a thief in the night, that is afraid of being discovered, but one that without fear shall break through and destroy all the fences of rights and properties, and this in the face of the sun, and defiance of its light. 'I have brought against the mother a young man, a spoiler,' so some read it; for Nebuchadnezzar, when he first invaded Judah, was but a young man, in the first year of his reign. We read it, "I have brought upon them, even against the mother of the young men, a spoiler," that is, against Jerusalem, a mother city, that had a very numerous family of young men. Or, that invasion was in a particular manner terrible to those mothers who had many sons fit for war, who must now jeopard their lives in the high places of the field; and, being an unequal match for the enemy, would be likely to fall there, to the inexpressible grief of their poor mothers that had nursed them up with a deal of tenderness. And the same God that brought the spoiler upon them caused him to fall upon it, that is, upon the spoil delivered to him, suddenly, and by surprise, and then terrors come upon the city. The original is very abrupt, 'The city and terrors; O the city,' what a consternation will it then be in! O the terrors that shall then seize it! Then the city and terrors shall be brought together, that seemed at a distance from each other. 'I will cause to fall suddenly upon her' (that is, upon Jerusalem,) 'a watcher and terrors,' so Mr. Gataker reads it, for the word is used for a watcher, Dan. iv. 13, 23, and the Chaldean soldiers were called watchers, ch. iv. 16.

Secondly. The destruction made by this destroyer. A dreadful slaughter is here described. 1*st.* The wives are deprived of their husbands; "their widows are increased above the sand of the seas," so numerous are they now grown. It was promised that the men of Israel (for those only were numbered) should be as the sand of the sea for multitude, but now they shall be all cut off, and their widows shall be so. But observe, God saith, "They are increased to me." Though the husbands were cut off by the sword of his justice, their poor widows were gathered in the arms of his mercy, who has taken it among the titles of his honour to be the God of the widows. Widows are said to be taken into the number, the number of those whom God has a particular compassion and concern for. 2*nd.* The parents are deprived of their children. "She that has borne seven" sons, whom she expected to be the support and joy of her age now "languisheth" when she hath seen them all cut off by the sword in one day who had been many years her burthen and care. "She that had many children is waxen feeble," 1 Sam. ii. 5. See what uncertain comforts children are, and let us therefore rejoice in them, as though we rejoiced not. When the children are slain, the mother gives up the ghost, for her life was bound up in theirs; "Her sun is gone down while it was yet day;" she is bereaved of all her comforts then when she thought herself in the midst of the enjoyment of them. She is now ashamed and confounded to think how proud she had been of her sons, how fond of them, and how much she promised herself from them. Some understand by this languishing mother, Jerusalem lamenting the death of her inhabitants, as passionately as ever poor mother bewailed her children. Many are cut off already, and the residue of them, who have yet escaped, and it was hoped were reserved to be the seed of another generation, even them will I deliver to the sword before their enemies, as the condemned malefactor is delivered to the sheriff to be executed, saith the Lord, the judge of heaven and earth, who we are sure herein judgeth right, though the judgment seem severe.

5. They shall fall without being pitied; ver. 5, "For who shall have pity on thee, O Jerusalem?" When thy God hath cast thee out of his sight, and his compassions fail and are shut up from thee, neither thine enemies nor thy friends shall have any compassion for thee. They shall have no sympathy with thee, they shall not bemoan thee, or be sorry for thee, shall have no concern for thee, shall not go a step out of their way to ask how thou dost. For, 1st. Their friends who were expected to do these friendly offices, were all involved with them in the calamities, and had enough to do to bemoan themselves. 2nd. It was plain to all their neighbours that they had brought all this misery upon themselves by their obstinacy in sin, and they might easily have prevented it by repentance and reformation, which they were often in vain called to; and therefore "who can pity them? O Israel! thou hast destroyed thyself." Those will perish for ever unpitied, that might have been saved upon such easy terms, and would not. 3rd. God will thus complete their misery; he will set their acquaintance, as he did Job's, at a distance from them. And his hand, his righteous hand, is to be acknowledged in all the unkindnesses of our friends, as well as in all the injuries done us by our foes.

10 Woe is me, my mother,
That thou hast borne me a man of strife
And a man of contention to the whole earth!
I have neither lent on usury, nor men have lent to me
Yet every one of them doth curse me. [on usury;
11 The LORD said, Verily it shall be well with thy remnant;
Verily I will cause the enemy to entreat thee well
In the time of evil and in the time of affliction.
12 Shall iron break the northern iron and the steel?
13 Thy substance and thy treasures will I give to the spoil Without price, and that for all thy sins, even in all thy borders.
14 And I will make thee to pass with thine enemies
Into a land which thou knowest not: [upon you.
For a fire is kindled in mine anger, which shall burn

Jeremiah is now returned from his public work, and is retired into his closet. What passed between him and his God there we have an account of in these and the following verses, which he published afterwards to affect the people with the weight and importance of his messages to them. Here is,

First. The complaint which the prophet makes to God of the many discouragements he met with in his work, ver. 10.

1. He met with a great deal of contradiction and opposition. He was "a man of strife and contention to the whole land," so it might be read, rather than to "the whole earth," for his business lay only in that land; both city and country quarrelled with him, and set themselves against him, and said and did all they could to thwart him. He was a peaceable man, gave no provocation to any, nor was apt to resent the provocations given him, and yet a man of strife, that is, not a man striving, but a man striven with; he was for peace, but when he spake they were for war. And, whatever they pretended, that which was the real cause of their quarrels with them was his faithfulness to God and to their souls. He shewed them their sins that were working their ruin, and put them into a way to prevent that ruin, which was the greatest kindness he could do them; and yet this was it for which they were incensed against him, and looked upon him as their enemy. Even the Prince of Peace himself was thus a man of strife, a sign spoken against, continually enduring the contradiction of sinners against himself; and the Gospel of peace brings division, even to fire and sword, Mat. x. 34, 35; Lu. xii. 49, 51. Now this made Jeremiah very uneasy, even to a degree of impatience. He cried out, "Woe is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me;" as if it were his mother's fault that she bore him, and he had better never have been born, than be born to such an uncomfortable life; nay, he is angry that she had born him a man of strife, as if he had been fatally determined to this by the stars that were in the ascendant at his birth. If he had any meaning of this kind, doubtless it was very much his infirmity; we rather hope it was intended for no more but a pathetical lamentation of his own case them. If a false prophet deceives others, hoping for impunity, God will deceive him by involving him in punishment. Here the language is quite plain; the false prophet has no Divine commission.

xiv. 18. "Instead of enjoying security, luxury, and ease in their native land, the Jews, led away into captivity, would be exposed to all the perils and hardships of those who travel abroad in quest of gain. The deceivers and the deceived should have the like fate" (Henderson).

xiv. 22. "The vanities of the Gentiles" are their superstitions or their idols. The ancients believed that certain gods sent rain; some of the African tribes employ rain-makers; and some Romish saints have had similar powers ascribed to them.

xv. 4. It is scarcely correct to say, "I will cause them to be removed into all kingdoms." Nor can we translate with some others, "I will give them up to agitation in all the kingdoms." The sense is, "I will cause them to be a terror to all kingdoms," i.e., the Note, 1st. Even those who are most quiet and peaceable, yet, if they serve God faithfully, are often made men of strife. We can but follow peace, have the making only of one side of the bargain, and therefore can but, as much as in us lies, live peaceably. 2nd. It is very uncomfortable to those who are of a peaceable disposition to live among those that are continually picking quarrels with them. 3rd. Yet, if we cannot live so peaceably as we desire with our neighbours, we must not be so disturbed at it as thereby to lose the repose of our own minds, and put ourselves upon the fret.

2. He met with a great deal of contempt, contumely, and reproach. They every one of them cursed him; they branded him as a turbulent, factious man, as an incendiary, and a sower of discord and sedition. They ought to have blessed him, and to have blessed God for him; but they were arrived to such a pitch of enmity against God and his word, that for his sake they cursed his messenger, spoke ill of him, wished ill to him, did all they could to make him odious: they all did so; he had scarce one friend in Judah or Jerusalem that would give him a good word. Note, It is often the lot of the best of men to be put under the worst of characters; "So persecuted they the prophets." But one would be apt to suspect, that surely Jeremiah had given them some provocation, else he could not have lost himself thus; No, not the least, I have neither lent money nor borrowed money, have been neither creditor nor debtor, for so general is the signification of the words here. 1st. It is implied here, that those who deal much in the business of this world, are often involved thereby in strife and contention; meum et tuum,—'mine and thine,' are the great makebates; lenders and borrowers sue and are sued, and great dealers often get a deal of ill will. 2nd. It was an instance of Jeremiah's great prudence, and is written for our learning, that being called to be a prophet, he entangled not himself in the affairs of this life, but kept clear from them, that he might apply himself the more closely to the business of his profession, and might not give the least umbrage of suspicion that he aimed at secular advantages in it, nor any occasion to his neighbours to contend with him. He put out no money, for he was no usurer, nor, indeed, had any money to lend; he took up no money, for he was no purchaser, nor merchant, no spendthrift. He was perfectly dead to this world, and the things of it; a very little served to keep him; and we find, ch. xvi. 2, he had neither wife nor children to keep. And yet, 3rd. Though he carried himself thus discreetly, and so as one would have thought should have gained him a universal esteem, yet he lay under a general odium, through the iniquity of the times. Blessed be God, as bad as things are with us, they are not so bad but there are those with whom virtue has its praise; yet let not those who carry themselves most prudently think it strange if they have not the respect and esteem they deserve. "Marvel not, my brethren, if the world hate you."

Secondly. The answer which God gave to this complaint. Though there was in it a mixture of passion and infirmity, yet God graciously took cognizance of it, because it was for his sake that the prophet suffered reproach. In this answer,

1. God assures him that he should weather the storm, and be made easy at last, ver. 11. Though his neighbours quarrelled with him for what he did in the discharge of his office, yet God accepted him, and promised to stand by him. And it is in the original expressed in the form of an oath, If I take not care of thee, let me never be counted faithful; "Verily, it shall go well with thy remnant," that is, with the remainder of thy life, for so the word signifies. The residue of thy days shall be more comfortable to thee than those hitherto have been. 'Thy end shall be good,' so the Chaldee reads it. Note, It is a great and sufficient support to the people of God, that, how troublesome soever their way may be, it shall be well with them in their latter end, Ps. xxxvii. 37. They have still a remnant, a residue, something behind, and left in reserve, which will be sufficient to balance all their grievances, and the hope of it to make them easy. It should seem Jeremiah, besides the vexation that his people gave him, was uneasy at the apprehension he had of sharing largely in the public judgments which he foresaw coming; and though he mentioned not this, God replied to his thought of it, as to Moses, Ex. iv. 19. Jeremiah thought, if his friends were thus abusive to him, what would his enemies be? And God had thought fit to awaken in him an expectation of this kind, ch. xii. 5; but here he quiets his mind with this promise, "Verily, I will cause the enemy to entreat thee well in the time of evil," when all about thee shall be laid waste. Note, God has all men's hearts in his hands, and can turn those to favour his servants whom they were most afraid of. And the prophets of the Lord have often met with fairer and better treatment among open enemies than among those that call themselves his people. When we see trouble coming, and it looks very threatening, yet let us not despair, but hope in God, because it may prove better than likely. This promise was accomplished, when Nebuchadnezzar having taken the city charged the captain of the guard to be kind to Jeremiah, and let him have every thing he had a mind to, ch. xxxix. 11, 12. The following words, ver. 12, "Shall common iron break the northern iron and the steel?" or brass, being compared with the promise God made to Jeremiah, ch. i. 18, that he would make him an iron pillar and brazen walls, seem intended for his comfort. They were continually clashing with him, and were rough and hard as iron, but Jeremiah, being armed with power and courage from on high, is as northern iron, which is naturally stronger, and as steel, which is hardened by art, and therefore they shall not prevail against him; compare this with Eze. ii. 6, and iii. 8, 9. And he might the better bear their quarrelling with him when he was sure of the victory.

2. God assures him that his enemies and persecutors should be lost in the storm, should be ruined at last; and therein the word of God in his mouth should be accomplished, and he should be proved a true prophet, ver. 13, 14. God here turns his speech from the prophet to the people; and to them also ver. 12 may be applied, "Shall iron break the northern iron and the steel?" Shall their courage and strength, and the most hardy and vigorous of their efforts, be able to contest either with the counsel of God or with the army of the Chaldeans, which are as inflexible, as invincible, as the northern iron and the steel? Let them therefore hear their doom: "Thy substance and thy treasure will I give to the spoil," and that "without price;" the spoilers shall have it gratis, it shall be to them a cheap and easy prey. Observe, The prophet was poor, he neither lent nor borrowed, he had nothing to lose, neither substance nor treasure, and therefore the enemy will treat him well; cantabit vacuus coram latrone viator,—'the traveller that has no property about him, will congratulate himself when accosted by a robber.' But the people that had great estates in money and land would be slain for what they had, or the enemy, finding they had much, would use them hardly to make them confess more. And it is their own iniquity that herein corrects them; It is "for all thy sins, even in all thy borders;" all parts of the country, even those which lay most remote, had contributed to the national guilt, and all shall now be brought to account. Let not one tribe lay the blame upon another, but each take shame to themselves; It is "for all thy sins in all thy borders." Thus shall they stay at home till they see their estates ruined, and then they shall be carried into captivity, to spend the sad remains of a miserable life in slavery: "I will make thee to pass with thine enemies," that shall lead thee in triumph, "into a land that thou knowest not," and therefore canst expect to find no comfort in it. And all this is the fruit of God's wrath; It is "a fire kindled in mine anger, which shall burn upon you," and if not extinguished in time will burn eternally.

15 O LORD, thou knowest: remember me,
And visit me, and revenge me of my persecutors;
Take me not away in thy longsuffering:
Know that for thy sake I have suffered rebuke.
16 Thy words were found, and I did eat them; [heart:
And thy word was unto me the joy and rejoicing of mine
For I am called by thy name, O LORD God of hosts.
17 I sat not in the assembly of the mockers, nor rejoiced;
I sat alone because of thy hand:
For thou hast filled me with indignation.
18 Why is my pain perpetual,
And my wound incurable, which refuseth to be healed?
Wilt thou be altogether unto me as a liar,
And as waters that fail?
19 Therefore thus saith the LORD,
If thou return, then will I bring thee again,
And thou shalt stand before me:
And if thou take forth the precious from the vile,
Thou shalt be as my mouth:
Let them return unto thee;
But return not thou unto them. [wall:
20 And I will make thee unto this people a fenced brasen
And they shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail against thee:
For I am with thee to save thee
And to deliver thee, saith the LORD.
21 And I will deliver thee out of the hand of the wicked,
And I will redeem thee out of the hand of the terrible.

Here, as before, we have,

First. The prophet's humble address to God, containing a remonstrance both of his integrity and of the hardships he underwent notwithstanding. It is matter of comfort to us that, whatever ails us, we have a God to go to, before whom we may spread our case, and to whose omniscience we may appeal, as the prophet here, "O Lord, thou knowest." Thou dost know my sincerity, which men are resolved they will not acknowledge; thou dost know my distress, which men disdain to take notice of. Observe here,

1. What is it that the prophet prays for, ver. 15. 1st. That God would consider his case, and be mindful of him. "O Lord, remember me." Think upon me for good, 2nd. That God would communicate strength and comfort to him; Visit me, not only remember me, but let me know that thou rememberest me, that thou art nigh unto me. 3rd. That he would appear for him, against those that did him wrong, "Revenge me of my persecutors;" or rather, 'vindicate me from my persecutors.' Give judgment against them, and let thy judgment be executed so far as is necessary for my vindication, and to compel them to acknowledge that they have done me wrong; and farther a good man will not desire that God would revenge him. Let something be done to convince the world, that (whatever blasphemers say to the contrary) Jeremiah is a righteous man, and the God whom he serves is a righteous God. 4th. That he would yet spare him and continue him in the land of the living; Take me not away by a sudden stroke, but in thy longsuffering lengthen out my days. The best men will own themselves so obnoxious to God's wrath, that they are indebted to his patience for the continuance of their lives. Or, while thou exercisest long suffering towards my persecutors, let not them prevail to take me away. Though in a passion he complained of his birth, ver. 10; yet he desires here that his death might not be hastened; for life is sweet to nature; the life of a useful man is so to grace, "I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world."

2. What it is that he pleads with God for mercy and relief against his enemies, persecutors, and slanderers.

1st. That God's honour was interested in his case. "Know," and make it known, "that for thy sake I have suffered rebuke." Those that lay themselves open to reproach by their own fault and folly have great reason to bear it patiently, but no reason to expect that God should appear for them; but if it is for doing well that we suffer ill, and for righteousness' sake that we have all manner of evil said against us, we may hope that God will vindicate our honour with his own. To the same purpose, ver. 16, "I am called by thy name, O Lord of hosts;" it was for that reason that his enemies hated him, and therefore for that reason he promised himself that God would own him, and stand by him.

2nd. That the word of God which he was employed to preach to others he had experienced the power and pleasure of in his own soul, and therefore had the graces of the Spirit to qualify him for the Divine favour, as well as his gifts. We find some rejected of God, who yet could say, "Lord, we have prophesied in thy name." But Jeremiah could say more, ver. 16, "Thy words were found by me. He searched the Scriptures, diligently studied the law, and found that in it which was reviving to him; if we seek we shall find. Found for me; the words which he was to deliver to others were laid ready to his hand, were brought to him by inspiration; "and I did," not only taste them, but "eat them," received them entirely, conversed with them intimately, they were welcome to me, as food to one that is hungry. I entertained them, digested them, turned them in succum et sanguinem,—'into blood and spirits,' and was myself delivered into the mould of those truths which I was to deliver to others. The prophet was bidden to eat the roll, Eze. ii. 8; Rev. x. 9 "I did eat it," that is, as it follows, "it was to me the joy and rejoicing of my heart," nothing could be more agreeable. Understand it, First. Of the message itself he was to deliver. Though he was to foretell the ruin of his country, which was dear to him, and in the ruin of which he could not but have a deep share, yet all magnitude of their misfortunes shall fill all kingdoms with terror and dismay; or, the sight of them shall to all kingdoms seem dreadful. There are other places in which fear or terror means dreadful or shocking.

xv. 7. To fan with a fan here signifies to winnow with a winnowing instrument, called a fan, as in Matt. iii. 12.

xv. 8. The second clause is not clear, and two other versions of it are suggested in the margin: "Against the mother city a young man spoiling," and "against the mother and the young men." Sundry other explanations have been proposed, but on the whole we prefer the simplest: "I have brought to them—against the mother (i.e., metropolis)—a young warrior spoiling at noon-day." The young warrior was Nebuchadnezzar II., who marched against Jerusalem and took it. The Syriac has, "I have brought against the mothers and against the young men spoilers at noon-day." The Latin is thus represented by the Douay version: "I have brought in to them upon natural affections were swallowed up in zeal for God's glory; and even these messages of wrath, being Divine messages, were a satisfaction to him. He also rejoiced at first in hope that the people would take warning, and prevent the judgment. Or, Secondly. Of the commission he received to deliver this message. Though the work he was called to was not attended with any secular advantages, but, on the contrary, exposed him to contempt and persecution, yet, because it put him in a way to serve God, and do good, he took pleasure in it, was glad to be so employed; and it was his meat and drink to do the will of him that sent him, Jno. iv. 34. Or, Thirdly. Of the promise God gave him, that he would assist and own him in his work, ch. i. 8; he was satisfied in that, and depended upon it, and therefore hoped it should not fail him.

3rd. That he had applied himself to the discharge of his office with all possible gravity, and seriousness, and self-denial, though he had had of late but little satisfaction in it, ver. 17. First. It is his comfort that he had given up himself wholly to the business of his office, and had done nothing disagreeable to it; nothing either to divert himself from it, or disfit himself for it. He kept no unsuitable company; denied himself the use even of lawful recreations, abstained from every thing that looked like levity, lest thereby he should make himself mean, and less regarded. He sat alone, spent a deal of time in his closet, because of the hand of the Lord that was strong upon him to carry him on in his work; Eze. iii. 14, "For thou hast filled me with indignation," with such messages of wrath against this people as have made me always pensive. Note, It will be a comfort to God's ministers, when men despise them, if they have the testimonies of their consciences for them, that they have not by any vain foolish carriage made themselves despicable; that they have been dead not only to the wealth of the world, as this prophet was, ver. 10, but to the pleasures of it too, as here. But, Secondly. It is his complaint that he had had but little pleasure in his work. It was at first the rejoicing of his heart, but of late it had made him melancholy; so that he had no heart to sit in the meeting of those that make merry. He cared not for company, for indeed no company cared for him; he sat alone, fretting at the people's obstinacy, and the little success of his labours among them; this filled him with a holy indignation. Note, It is the folly and infirmity of some good people, that they lose much of the pleasantness of their religion by the fretfulness and uneasiness of their natural temper, which they humour and indulge, instead of mortifying it.

4th. He throws himself upon God's pity and promise in a very passionate expostulation; ver. 18, "Why is my pain perpetual," and nothing done to ease it? the wounds which my enemies are continually giving, both to my peace and to my reputation, incurable, and nothing done to retrieve either my comfort or my credit? I once little thought I should have been thus neglected; will the God that has promised me his presence "be to me as a liar?" The God on whom I depend, be to me "as waters that fail?" We are willing to make the best we can of it, and to take it as an appeal, First. To the mercy of God; I know he will not let the pain of his servant be perpetual, but he will ease it, will not let his wound be incurable, but he will heal it; and therefore I will not despair. Secondly. To his faithfulness, "Wilt thou be to me as a liar?" No, I know thou wilt not; God is not a man that he should lie. The fountain of life will never be to his people "as waters that fail."

Secondly. God's gracious answer to this address, ver. 19—21. Though the prophet betrayed much human frailty in his address, yet God vouchsafed to answer him with good words and comfortable words, for he knows our frame. Observe,

1. What God here requires of him as the condition of the farther favours he designed him. Jeremiah had done and suffered much for God, yet God is no debtor to him, but he is still upon his good behaviour. God will own him, But,

1st. He must recover his temper, and be reconciled to his work, and friends with it again, and not quarrel with it any more as he had done. He must return; must shake off these distrustful discontented thoughts and passions, and not give way to them; must regain the peaceable possession and enjoyment of himself, and resolve to be easy. Note, When we have stepped aside into any disagreeable frame or way, our care must be to return, and compose ourselves into a right temper of mind again; and then we may expect God will help us, if thus we endeavour to help ourselves.

2nd. He must resolve to be faithful in his work; for he could not any longer expect the Divine protection than he did approve himself so. Though there was no cause at all to charge Jeremiah with unfaithfulness, and God knew his heart to be sincere, yet God saw fit to give him this caution. Those that do their duty must not take it ill to be told their duty. In two things he must be faithful: First. He must distinguish between some and others of those he preached to. Thou must "take forth the precious from the vile." The righteous are the precious, be they never so mean and poor; the wicked are the vile, be they never so rich and great. In our congregations these are mixed, wheat and chaff in the same floor. We cannot distinguish them by name, but we must by character, and must give to each their portion, speaking comfort to precious saints, and terror to vile sinners; neither making the heart of the righteous sad, nor strengthening the hands of the wicked, Eze. xiii. 27, but rightly dividing the word of truth. Ministers must take those whom they see to be precious into their bosoms, and not sit alone as Jeremiah did; but keep up conversation with those they may do good to, and get good by. Secondly. He must closely adhere to his instructions, and not in the least vary from them, "Let them return to thee, but return not thou to them." That is, he must do the utmost he can in his preaching to bring people up to the mind of God; tell them they must at their peril comply with that. They that had flown off from him, that did not like the terms upon which God's favour was offered to them, "let them return to thee," and, upon second thoughts, come up to the terms, and strike the bargain. But "do not thou return to them," do not compliment them, or comply with them, nor think to make the matter easier to them than the word of God has made it. Men's hearts and lives must come up to God's law, and comply with that, for God's law will never come down to them, or comply with them.

2. What he here promiseth him upon the performance of these conditions. If he approve himself well,

1st. God will quiet his mind, and pacify the present tumult of his spirits. "If thou return, I will bring thee again;" will restore thy soul, as Ps. xxiii. 3. The best and strongest saints, if at any time they have gone aside out of the right way, and are determined to return, yet need the grace of God to bring them again.

2nd. God will employ him in his service as a prophet; work, which even in those bad times, had comfort and honour enough in it to be its own wages; "Thou shalt stand before me," to receive instructions from me, as a servant from his master, "and thou shalt be as my mouth," to deliver my messages to the people; as an ambassador is the mouth of the prince that sends him. Note, Faithful ministers are God's mouth to us; they are so to look upon themselves, and to speak God's mind, and as becomes the oracles of God; and we are so to look upon them, and to hear God speaking to us by them. Observe, If thou keep close to thine instructions, "thou shalt be as my mouth," not otherwise. So far, and no farther, God will stand by ministers, as they go by the written word; "Thou shalt be as my mouth," that is, what thou sayest shall be made good, as if I myself had said it: see Isa. xliv. 26; 1 Sam. iii. 19.

3rd. He shall have strength and courage to face the many difficulties he meets with in his work, and his spirit shall not fail again as now it doth; ver. 20, "I will make thee unto this people as a fenced brazen wall," which the storm batters, and beats violently upon, but cannot shake; "Return not thou to them," by any sinful compliances, and then trust thy God to arm thee by his grace with holy resolutions. Be not sneaking, and God will make thee daring. He had complained that he was made a man of strife; Expect that, saith God; "they shall fight against thee," they will still continue their opposition, "but they shall not prevail against thee," to drive thee off from thy work, or to cut thee off from the land of the living.

4th. He shall have God for his protector and mighty deliverer; "I am with thee to save thee." Those that have God with them have a Saviour with them, who hath wisdom and strength enough to deal with the most formidable enemy; and those that are with God, and faithful to him, he will deliver them, ver. 21, either from trouble or through it. They may perhaps fall into the hand of the wicked, and they may appear terrible to them; but God will rescue them out of their hands. They shall not be able to kill them, till they have finished their testimony; they shall not prevent their happiness. God will so deliver them, as to preserve them to his heavenly kingdom, 2 Tim. iv. 18; and that is deliverance enough. There are many things that appear very frightful that yet do not prove at all hurtful to a good man.

CHAPTER XVI.

In this chapter, I. The greatness of the calamity that was coming upon the Jewish nation is illustrated by prohibitions given to the prophet, neither to set up a house of his own, ver. 1—4, nor to go into the house of mourning, ver. 5—7, nor into the house of feasting, ver. 8, 9. II. God is justified in these severe proceedings against them, by an account of their great wickedness, ver. 10—13. III. An intimation is given of mercy in reserve, ver. 14, 15. IV. Some hopes are given that the punishment of the sin should prove the reformation of the sinners, and that they should return to God at length in a way of duty, and so be qualified for his returns to them in a way of favour, ver. 14—21.

THE word of the LORD came also unto me, saying,
2 Thou shalt not take thee a wife,
Neither shalt thou have sons or daughters in this place.
3 For thus saith the LORD
Concerning the sons and concerning the daughters that are born in this place,
And concerning their mothers that bare them,
And concerning their fathers that begat them in this land;
4 They shall die of grievous deaths;
They shall not be lamented; neither shall they be buried;
But they shall be as dung upon the face of the earth:
And they shall be consumed by the sword, and by famine;
And their carcases shall be meat
For the fowls of heaven, and for the beasts of the earth.
5 For thus saith the LORD,
Enter not into the house of mourning,
Neither go to lament nor bemoan them:
For I have taken away my peace from this people, saith the LORD,
Even lovingkindness and mercies.
6 Both the great and the small shall die in this land:
They shall not be buried, neither shall men lament for them,
Nor cut themselves, nor make themselves bald for them:
7 Neither shall men tear themselves for them in mourning,
To comfort them for the dead;
Neither shall men give them the cup of consolation to drink
For their father or for their mother.

CUP OF CONSOLATION AT A FUNERAL FEAST.

8 Thou shalt not also go into the house of feasting,
To sit with them to eat and to drink.
9 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Behold, I will cause to cease out of this place
In your eyes, and in your days, the mother of the young man a waster at noon-day." The Greek has, "I have brought against the mother young men, misery at noon-day." The Chaldee explains "mother" by crowd or multitude, which Calvin adopted.

xv. 12. Our version must be changed, the sense being, "Can one break iron, the iron of the north, and brass?" as Henderson renders it. All admit that "steel" should be brass or bronze, but some critics defend the rest of our common translation. The "iron of the north" (literally, "iron from the north") may have been steel, which was in use in Egypt at a very early date.

xv. 13. More literally, "Thy strength and thy wealth for a spoil will I give, not at a price, but on account of all thy sins, and in all thy borders:" God would give away, not sell, their power and riches in all their borders, because of their sins. It is the nation which is here personified and addressed.

xv. 14. There is another reading of the first verb, which requires

The voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness,
The voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride.

The prophet is here for a sign to the people; they would not regard what he said, let it be tried whether they will regard what he doth. In general, he must carry himself so in every thing as became one that expected to see his country in ruins very shortly. This he foretold, but few regarded the prediction; therefore he is to shew that he is himself fully satisfied in the truth of it. Others go on in their usual course; but he, in the prospect of these sad times is forbidden, and therefore forbears, marriage, mourning for the dead, and mirth. Note, Those that would convince others of, and affect them with, the word of God, must make it appear, even in the most self-denying instances, that they do believe it themselves, and are affected with it. Would we rouse others out of their security, and persaude them to sit loose to the world, we must ourselves be mortified to present things, and shew that we expect the dissolution of them.

First. Jeremiah must not marry, nor think of having a family, and being a housekeeper; ver. 2, "Thou shalt not take thee a wife," nor think of having "sons and daughters in this place;" not in the land of Judah, not in Jerusalem, not in Anathoth. The Jews, more than any people, valued themselves by their early marrying and their numerous offspring; but Jeremiah must live a bachelor, not so much in honour of virginity, as in diminution of it; by this it appears, that it was advisable and seasonable only in calamitous times, and times of present distress, 1 Cor. vii. 26; that it is so, is a part of the calamity. There may be a time when it will be said, "Blessed is the womb that bare not," Lu. xxiii. 29; and when we see such times at hand it is wisdom for all, especially for prophets, to keep themselves as much as may be from being "entangled with the affairs of this life," and encumbered with that which, the dearer it is to them, the more it will be the matter of their care, and fear, and grief at such a time. The reason here given is, because the fathers and mothers, the sons and the daughters, shall die of grievous deaths, ver. 3, 4; and those that have wives and children, 1. They will have such a clog upon them, that they cannot flee from those deaths. A single man may make his escape, and shift for his own safety, when he that has a wife and children can neither find means to convey them with him nor find in his heart to go and leave them behind him. 2. They will be in continual terror for fear of those deaths, and the more they have to lose by them the greater will the terror and consternation be, when death appears every where in its triumphant pomp and power. 3. The death of every child, and the aggravating circumstances of it, will be a new death to the patient. Better have no children, than have them brought forth and bred up for the murderer, Hos. ix. 13, 14, than see them live and die in misery. Death is grievous, but some deaths are more grievous than others, both to them that die, and to their relations that survive them; hence we read of "so great a death," 2 Cor. i. 10. Two things are used a little to palliate and alleviate the terror of death, as to this world, and to sugar the bitter pill, bewailing the dead, and burying them; but to make those deaths grievous indeed, these are denied; "They shall not be lamented," but shall be carried off, as if all the world were weary of them; nay, they shall "not be buried," but left exposed, as if they were designed to be monuments of justice. "They shall be as dung upon the face of the earth," not only despicable but detestable, as if they were good for nothing but to muck the ground; and being consumed, some by the sword, and some by famine, "their carcases shall be meat for the fowls of heaven, and the beasts of the earth." Will not any one say, better be without children than live to see them come to this. What reason have we to say, that all is vanity and vexation of spirit, when those creatures that we expect should be our greatest comforts may prove not only our heaviest cares, but our sorest crosses!

Secondly. Jeremiah must not go to the house of mourning upon occasion of the death of any of his neighbours or relations; ver. 5, "Enter thou not into the house of mourning." It was usual to condole those whose relations were dead, to bemoan them, to cut themselves, and make themselves bald, which it seems was commonly practised as an expression of mourning, though forbidden by the law, Deu. xiv. 1; nay, sometimes they did in a passion of grief tear themselves for them, ver. 6, 7, partly in honour of the deceased, (thus signifying that they thought there was a great loss of them,) and partly in compassion to the surviving relations, to whom the burthen will be made the lighter by their having sharers with them in their grief. They used to mourn with them, and so to comfort them for the dead, as Job's friends with him, and the Jews with Martha and Mary; and it was a friendly office to give them a cup of consolation to drink, to provide cordials for them, and press them earnestly to drink of them, for the support of their spirits, give wine to them that are of heavy heart, for their father or mother, that it may be some comfort to them to find that, though they have lost their parents, yet they have some friends left that have a concern for them. Thus the usage stood, and it was a laudable usage; it is a good work to others, as well as of good use to ourselves, to go to the house of mourning. It seems the prophet Jeremiah had been wont to abound in good offices of this kind, and it well became his character, both as a pious man and as a prophet; and one would think it should have made him better beloved among his people than it should seem he was. But now God bids him not lament the death of his friends as usual, for, 1. His sorrow for the destruction of his country in general must swallow up his sorrow for particular deaths. His tears must now be turned into another channel, and there is occasion enough for them all. 2. He had little reason to lament those who died now just before the judgments entered, which he saw at the door, but rather to think them happy who were seasonably taken away from the evil to come. 3. This was to be a type of what was coming, when there should be such an universal confusion, that all neighbourly, friendly offices should be neglected. Men shall be in deaths so often, and even dying daily, that they shall have no time, no room, no heart for the ceremonies that used to attend deaths; the sorrows shall be so ponderous as not to admit relief; and every one so full of grief for his own troubles that he shall have no thoughts of his neighbour's. All shall be mourners then, and no comforters; every one will find it enough to bear his own burthen; for, ver. 5, "I have taken away my peace from this people," that is, put a full period to their prosperity, deprived them of health, and wealth, and quiet, and friends, and every thing wherewith they might comfort themselves and one another. Whatever peace we enjoy, it is God's peace, it is his gift, and if he give quietness who then can make trouble? But if we make not a good use of his peace, he can and will take it away, and where are we then? Job xxxiv. 29. I will take "away my peace, even my lovingkindness and mercies," these shall be shut up and restrained, which are the fresh springs from which all their fresh streams flow, and then farewell all good. Note, Those have cut themselves off from all true peace that have thrown themselves out of the favour of God. All is gone when God takes away from us his lovingkindness and his mercies. Then it follows, ver. 6, 'Both the great and the small shall die," even "in this land," the land of Canaan, that used to be called the land of the living. God's favour is our life; take away that, and we die, we perish, we all perish.

Thirdly. Jeremiah must not go to the house of mirth, no more than to the house of mourning, ver. 8. It had been his custom, and it was innocent enough, when any of his friends made entertainments at their houses, and invited him to them, to go and sit with them, not merely to drink, but to eat and to drink, soberly and cheerfully. But now he must not take that liberty, 1. Because it was unseasonable and disagreeable to the providences of God that were concerning the land and nation; God called loud to weeping, and mourning, and fasting, he was coming forth against them in his judgments, and it was time for them to humble themselves. And it well became the prophet who gave them the warning to give them an example of taking the warning and complying with it, and so to make it appear he did himself believe it. Ministers ought to be examples of self-denial and mortification, and to shew themselves affected with those terrors of the Lord with which they desire to affect others; and it becomes all the sons of Zion to sympathise with her in her afflictions, and not to be merry when she is perplexed, Am. vi. 6. 2. Because he must thus shew the people what sad times were coming upon them. His friends wondered he would not meet them, as he used to do, in the house of feasting; but he lets them know it was to intimate to them that all their feasting would be at an end shortly; ver. 9, "I will cause to cease the voice of mirth." You shall have nothing to feast on, nothing to rejoice in, but be surrounded with calamities that shall mar your mirth, and cast a damp upon it. God can find ways to tame the most jovial. This shall be done in this place, in Jerusalem, that used to be the joyous city, and thought her joys were all secure to her; it shall be done in your eyes, in your sight, to be a vexation to you, who now look so haughty, look so merry; it shall be done in your day, you yourselves shall live to see it. The voice of praise they had made to cease by their iniquities and idolatries, and therefore justly God made to cease among them the voice of mirth and gladness. The voice of God's prophets was not heard, was not heeded among them, and therefore no longer shall the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride, of the songs that used to grace the nuptials, be heard among them: see ch. vii. 34.

10 And it shall come to pass, when thou shalt shew this people all these words, and they shall say unto thee, Wherefore hath the LORD pronounced all this great evil against us? or what is our iniquity? or what is our sin that we have committed against the LORD our God? 11 Then shalt thou say unto them,

Because your fathers have forsaken me, saith the LORD,
And have walked after other gods,
And have served them, and have worshipped them,
And have forsaken me, and have not kept my law;
12 And ye have done worse than your fathers;
For, behold, ye walk every one after the imagination of his evil heart,
That they may not hearken unto me:
13 Therefore will I cast you out of this land [fathers;
Into a land that ye know not, neither ye nor your
And there shall ye serve other gods day and night;
Where I will not shew you favour.

Here is, First. An inquiry made into the reasons why God would bring those judgments upon them; ver. 10, "When thou shalt shew this people all these words," the words of this curse, they will say unto thee, "Wherefore has the Lord pronounced all this great evil against us?" One would hope there were some among them that asked this question with an humble, penitent heart, desiring to know what was the sin for which God contended with them, that they might cast it away, and prevent the judgment; Shew us the Jonah that raiseth the storm, and we will throw it overboard. But it seems here to be the language of those who quarrelled at the word of God, and challenged him to shew what they had done which might deserve so severe a punishment. "What is our iniquity? and what is our sin?" What crime have we ever been guilty of proportionable to such a sentence? Instead of humbling and condemning themselves, they stand upon their own justification; and insinuate that God did them wrong in pronouncing this evil against them, and that he laid upon them more than was right, and they had reason to enter into judgment with God, Job xxxiv. 23. Note, It is amazing to see how hardly sinners are brought to justify God, and judge themselves when they are in trouble, and to own the iniquity and the sin that has procured them the trouble.

Secondly. A plain and full answer given to this inquiry. Do they ask the prophet why and for what reason God is thus angry with them? He shall not stop their mouths by telling them they may be sure there is a sufficient reason, the righteous God is never angry without cause, without good cause; but he must tell them particularly what is the cause, that they may be convinced and humbled, or at least that God may be justified. Let them know, then,

1. That God visited upon them the iniquities of their fathers; ver. 11, "Your fathers have forsaken me, and have not kept my law;" they shook off Divine institutions, and grew weary of them, they thought them too plain, too mean, and then they walked after other gods, whose worship was more gay and pompous; and, being fond of variety and novelty, they served them and worshipped them; and this was the sin which God had said, in the second commandment, he would visit upon their children, who kept up these idolatrous usages, because they received them by tradition from their fathers, 1 Pet. i. 18.

2. That God reckoned with them for their own iniquities, ver. 12. You have made your fathers' sin your own, and are become obnoxious to the punishment which in their days was deferred, for "you have done worse than your fathers." If they had made a good use of their fathers' reprieve, and had been led by the patience of God to repentance, they should have fared the better for it, and the judgment should have been prevented, the reprieve turned into a national pardon; but making an ill use of it, and being hardened by it in their sins, they fared the worse for it, and, the reprieve being expired, an addition was made to the sentence, and it was executed with the more severity. They were more impudent and obstinate in sin than their fathers, "walked every one after the imagination of his heart," made that their guide and rule, and were resolved to follow that, on purpose that they might not hearken to God and his prophets. They designedly suffer their own lusts and passions to be noisy, that they might us to translate, "I will make thee serve with thine enemies in a land," &c.

xv. 18. The latter clause must be otherwise rendered: "Thou art wholly unto me as a failing brook, waters which are not constant." "Liar" is quite wrong.

xvi. 2. "This place" here is equivalent to "this land" in the next verse. Jeremiah was not to marry, because of the woes which would befall his country.

xvi. 6. It would seem that notwithstanding the prohibitions of the law (Lev. xix. 27, 28), the Jews had adopted the custom, common among some other nations, of lacerating themselves and cutting off their hair in times of mourning. (See chap. xli. 5; xlvii. 5.)

xvi. 7, 8. The marginal rendering is better: "Neither shall men break bread for them in mourning." The allusion is to the practice of eating and drinking at funerals, which prevailed in various ancient nations, and is not yet altogether extinct.

drown the voice of their consciences. No wonder, then, that God has taken up this resolution concerning them, ver. 13, "I will cast you out of this land," this land of light, this valley of vision; since you will not hearken to me, you shall not hear me, you shall be hurried away, not into a neighbouring country, which you have formerly had some acquaintance and correspondence with, but into a far country, "a land that ye know not, neither you nor your fathers," in which you have no interest, nor can expect to meet with any comfortable society to be an allay to your misery. Justly were they banished into a strange land who doated upon strange gods, which neither they nor their fathers knew, Deu. xxxii. 17. Two things would make their case there very miserable, and both of them relate to the soul, the better part; the greatest calamities of their captivity were those which affected that and debarred that from its bliss: 1st. It is the happiness of the soul to be employed in the service of God, but "there shall ye serve other gods day and night," that is, you shall be in continual temptation to serve them, and perhaps compelled to do it by your cruel taskmasters; and when you are forced to worship idols you will be as sick of it as ever you were fond of it when it was forbidder you by your godly kings. See how God often makes men's sin their punishment, and fills the backslider in heart with his own ways. You shall have no public worship at all but the worship of idols, and then you will think with regret how you slighted the worship of the true God. 2nd. It is the happiness of the soul to have some tokens of the lovingkindness of God, but you shall go to a strange land, "where I will not shew you favour." If they had had God's favour, that would have made even the land of their captivity a pleasant land; but if they lie under his wrath the yoke of their oppression will be intolerable to them.

14 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That it shall no more be said, The LORD liveth,
That brought up the children of Israel out of the land of 15 But, The LORD liveth, [Egypt;
That brought up the children of Israel from the land of the north,
And from all the lands whither he had driven them:
And I will bring them again into their land
That I gave unto their fathers.
16 Behold, I will send for many fishers,
Saith the LORD, and they shall fish them;
And after will I send for many hunters,
And they shall hunt them from every mountain,
And from every hill, and out of the holes of the rocks.
17 For mine eyes are upon all their ways:
They are not hid from my face,
Neither is their iniquity hid from mine eyes.
18 And first I will recompense their iniquity and their sin
Because they have defiled my land, [double;
They have filled mine inheritance with the carcases
Of their detestable and abominable things.
19 O LORD, my strength, and my fortress,
And my refuge in the day of affliction, [earth,
The Gentiles shall come unto thee from the ends of the
And shall say, Surely our fathers have inherited lies,
And things wherein there is no profit. [vanity,
20 Shall a man make gods unto himself,
And they are no gods?
21 Therefore, behold, I will this once cause them to know,
I will cause them to know mine hand and my might;
And they shall know that my name is The LORD.

There is a mixture of mercy and judgment in these verses, and it is hard to know to which to apply some of the passages here, they are so interwoven, and some seem to look as far forward as the times of the Gospel.

First. God will certainly execute judgment upon them for their idolatries; let them expect it, for the decree is gone forth.

1. God sees all their sins, though they commit them never so secretly, and palliate them never so artfully; ver. 17, "Mine eyes are upon all their ways." They have not their eye upon God, have no regard to him, stand in no awe of him, but he has his eye upon them, neither they nor their sins are hid from his face, from his eyes Note, None of the sins of sinners either can be concealed from God or shall be overlooked by him, Pr. v. 21; Job xxxiv. 21; Ps. xc. 8.

2. God is highly displeased, particularly at their idolatries, ver. 18. As his omniscience convicts them, so his justice condemns them: "I will recompense their iniquity and their sin double:" not double to what it deserves, but double to what they expect, and to what I have done formerly. Or, I will recompense it abundantly; they shall now pay for their long reprieve, and the Divine patience they have abused. The sin for which God has a controversy with them is, their having defiled God's land with their idolatries, and not only alienated that which he was entitled to as his inheritance, but polluted that which he dwelt in with delight as his inheritance, and made it offensive to him, "with the carcases of their detestable things;" that is, the gods themselves which they worshipped, the images of which, though they were of gold and silver, were as loathsome to God as the stinking carcases of men or beasts are to us. Idols are carcases of detestable things; God hates them, and so should we. Or, the sacrifices which they offered to these idols, with which the land was filled, for they had high places in all the coasts and corners of it. This was the sin which above any other incensed God against them.

3. He will find out and raise up instruments of his wrath, that shall cast them out of their land, according to the sentence passed upon them; ver. 16, "I will send for many fishers and many hunters"—the Chaldean army, that shall have many ways of ensnaring and destroying them, by fraud as fishers, by force as hunters; they shall find them out wherever they are, and shall chase and closely pursue them to their ruin, shall discover them wherever they are hid in hills, or mountains, or holes of the rocks, and shall drive them out. God has various ways of prosecuting a people with his judgments, that avoid the convictions of his word. He has men at command fit for his purpose; he has them within call, and can send for them when he pleaseth.

4. Their bondage in Babylon shall be sorer and much more grievous than that in Egypt, their taskmasters more cruel, and their lives made more bitter; this is implied in the promise, ver. 14, 15, that their deliverance out of Babylon shall be more illustrious in itself, and more welcome to them, than that out of Egypt. Their slavery in Egypt came upon them gradually, and almost insensibly; that in Babylon came upon them at once, and with all the aggravating circumstances of terror. In Egypt they had a Goshen of their own, but none such in Babylon. In Egypt they were used as servants that were useful; in Babylon as captives that had been hateful.

5. They shall be warned, and God shall be glorified by these judgments brought upon them. These judgments have a voice, and speak aloud, 1st. Instruction to them. When God chastens them he teaches them. By this rod God expostulates with them; ver. 20, "Shall a man make gods to himself?" Will any man be so perfectly void of all reason and consideration as to think that a God of his own making can stand him in any stead? Will you ever again be such fools as you have been, to make to yourselves gods which are no gods, when you have a God whom you may call your own, who made you, and is himself the true and living God? 2nd. Honour to God, for he will be known by the judgments which he executeth. He will first recompense their iniquity, ver. 18, and then he will this once, ver. 21, this once for all; not by many interruptions of their peace, but this one desolation and destruction of it. Or, this once and no more "I will cause them to know my hand," the length and weight of my punishing hand, how far it can reach, and how deep it can wound. And "they shall know that my name is Jehovah," a God with whom there is no contending; that gives being to threatenings, and puts life into them as well as promises.

Secondly. Yet he hath mercy in store for them, intimations of which come in here for the encouragement of the prophet himself, and of those few among them that tremble at God's word. It was said with an air of severity, ver. 13, that God would banish them into a strange land; but, that thereby they might not be driven to despair, presently there follow words of comfort.

1. The days will come, the joyful days, when the same hand that dispersed them shall gather them again, ver. 14, 15. They are cast out, but they are not cast off, they are not cast away; they shall be brought up from the land of the north, the land of their captivity, where they are held with a strong hand, and from all the lands whither they are driven, and seemed to be lost and buried in the crowd. Nay, I will bring them again into their own land, and settle them there. As the foregoing threatenings agreed with what was written in the law, so doth this promise, Lev. xxvi. 44, "Yet will I not cast them away:" Deu. xxx. 4, "Thence will the Lord thy God gather thee." And the following words, ver. 16, may be understood as a promise; God will send for fishers and hunters, the Medes and Persians, that shall find them out in the countries where they are scattered, and send them back to their own land; or Zerubbabel and others of their own nation, who should fish them out and hunt after them, to persuade them to return, or whatever instruments the Spirit of God made use of to stir up their spirits to go up, which at first they were backward to. They began to nestle in Babylon, but, "as an eagle stirs up her nest and flutters over her young," so God did by them, Zec. ii. 7.

2. Their deliverance out of Babylon should upon some accounts be more illustrious and memorable than their deliverance out of Egypt was. Both were the Lord's doing, and marvellous in their eyes; both were proofs that the Lord liveth, and were to be kept in everlasting remembrance to his honour, as the living God, but the fresh mercy shall be so surprising, so welcome, that it shall even abolish the memory of the former. Not but that new mercies should put us in mind of old ones, and give us occasion to renew our thanksgivings for them, yet because we are tempted to think that the former days were better than these, and to ask, "Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of?" as if God's arm were waxen short, and to cry up the age of miracles above the latter ages, when mercies are wrought in a way of common providence; therefore we are allowed here comparatively to forget the bringing of Israel out of Egypt, as a deliverance outdone by that out of Babylon; that was done by might and power, this by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, Zec. iv. 6. In this there was more of pardoning mercy appearing than that, which is the most glorious branch of Divine mercy; for their captivity in Babylon had more in it of the punishment of sin than their bondage in Egypt; and therefore that which comforts Zion in her deliverance out of Babylon is this, that her iniquity is pardoned, Isa. xl. 2. Note, God glorifies himself, and we must glorify him, in those mercies that have no miracles in them as well as in those that have; and, though the favours of God to our fathers must not be forgotten, yet those to ourselves in our own day we must especially give thanks for.

3. Their deliverance out of captivity shall be accompanied with a blessed reformation, and they shall return effectually cured of their inclination to idolatry, which will complete their deliverance, and make it a mercy indeed. They had defiled their own land with their detestable things, ver. 18; but when they have smarted for so doing they shall come and humble themselves before God, ver. 19—21.

1st. They shall be brought to acknowledge that their God only is God indeed, for he is a God at need. My strength to support and comfort me, my fortress to protect and shelter me, and my refuge to whom I may flee in the day of affliction. Note, Need drives many to God who had set themselves at a distance from him. Those that slighted him in the day of their prosperity will be glad to flee to him in the day of their affliction.

2nd. They shall be quickened to return to him by the conversion of the Gentiles; "The Gentiles shall come to thee from the ends of the earth," and therefore shall not we come? Or, the Jews, who had by their idolatries made themselves as Gentiles, (so I rather understand it,) shall come to thee, by repentance and reformation, shall return to their duty and allegiance, even from the ends of the earth, from all the countries whither they were driven. The prophet comforts himself with the hope of this, and in a transport of joy returns to God the notice he had given him of it; "O Lord, my strength and my fortress," I am now easy, since thou hast given me a prospect of multitudes that "shall come to thee from the ends of the earth," both of Jewish converts and of Gentile proselytes. Note, Those that are brought to God themselves cannot but rejoice greatly to see others coming to him, coming back to him.

3rd. They shall acknowledge the folly of their ancestors, which it becomes them to do, when they were smarting for the sins of their ancestors; "Surely our fathers have inherited," not the satisfaction they promised themselves and their children, but "lies, vanity, and things wherein there is no profit;" we are now sensible that our fathers were cheated in their idolatrous worship, it did not prove what it promised, and therefore what have we to do any more with it? Note, It were well if the disappointment which some have met with in the xvi. 13. The word rendered "therefore" in this verse is quite different from that so translated in verse 14, and may have its ordinary meaning of "and." "Ye shall serve other gods day and night" signifies that they would do so continually. Some idolatrous rites were regularly practised by night, and very probably the phrase "day and night" is designedly used to include the nocturnal ceremonies.

xvi. 14. Here the word for "therefore" is by some translated "nevertheless" or "notwithstanding," which may be preferable. Verses 14 and 15 seem to be so introduced as to interrupt the current of thought, which is resumed in verse 16.

xvi. 16. Lowth, Clarke, and others have supposed that the invaders of Israel are called "fishers" and "hunters," because some would lie in wait for the people, and destroy them by secret wiles, and others would openly attack and pursue them by force. It is possible that this may explain the two figures, though the general idea may be that Israel should be attacked everywhere and in every way.

service of sin, and the pernicious consequences of it to them, might prevail to deter others from treading in their steps.

4th. They shall reason themselves out of their idolatry, and that reformation is likely to be sincere and durable which results from a rational conviction of the gross absurdity there is in sin. They shall argue thus with themselves, (and it is well argued,) ver. 20, "Should a man" be such a fool, be so perfectly void of the reason of a man, as to "make gods to himself," the creatures of his own fancy, the work of his own hands, when they are really no gods? Can a man be so besotted, so perfectly lost to human understanding, as to expect any Divine blessing or favour from that which pretends to no divinity, but what it first received from him?

5th. They shall herein give honour to God, and make it to appear that they know both his hand in his providence and his name in his word, and they are brought to know his name by what they are made to know of his hand, ver. 21. This once now at length they shall be made to know that which they would not be brought to know by all the pains the prophets took with them. Note, So stupid are we, that nothing less than the mighty hand of Divine grace, known experimentally, can make us kpow aright the name of God, as it is revealed to us.

4. Their deliverance out of captivity shall be a type and figure of the great salvation to be wrought out by the Messiah, who shall "gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad." And this is that which so far outshines the deliverance out of Egypt, as even to eclipse the lustre of it, and make it even to be forgotten. To this some apply that of the many fishers and hunters, the preachers of the Gospel, who were fishers of men, to inclose souls with the gospel net; to find them out in every mountain and hill, and secure them for Christ. Then the Gentiles came to God, some from the ends of the earth, and turned to the worship of him from the service of dumb idols.

CHAPTER XVII.

In this chapter, I. God convicts the Jews of the sin of idolatry, by the notorious evidence of the fact, and condemns them to captivity for it, ver. 1—4. II. He shews them the folly of all their carnal confidences, which should stand them in no stead, when God's time was to contend with them, and that this was one of the sins upon which his controversy with them was grounded, ver. 5—11. III. The prophet makes his appeal and address to God, upon occasion of the malice of his enemies against them, committing himself to the Divine protection, and begging of God to appear for him, ver. 12—18. IV. God by the prophet warns the people to keep holy the sabbath day, assuring them that if they did it should be the lengthening out of their tranquillity; but if not, God would, by some desolating judgment, assert the honour of his sabbaths, ver. 19—27.

THE sin of Judah is written with a pen of iron,
And with the point of a diamond:
It is graven upon the table of their heart,
And upon the horns of your altars; [groves
2 Whilst their children remember their altars and their
By the green trees upon the high hills.
3 O my mountain in the field, [spoil,
I will give thy substance and all thy treasures to the
And thy high places for sin, throughout all thy borders.
4 And thou, even thyself, shalt discontinue
From thine heritage that I gave thee;
And I will cause thee to serve thine enemies
In the land which thou knowest not:
For ye have kindled a fire in mine anger,
Which shall burn for ever.

The people had asked, ch. xvi. 10, "What is our iniquity, and what is our sin?" as if they could not be charged with any thing worth speaking of, for which God should enter into judgment with them; their challenge was answered there, but here we have a farther reply to it, in which,

First. The indictment is fully proved upon the prisoners, both the fact and the fault; their sin is too plain to be denied, and too bad to be excused, and they have nothing to plead either in extenuation of the crime or in arrest and mitigation of the judgment.

1. They cannot plead, Not guilty, for their sins are upon record in the book of God's omniscience, and their own consciences; nay, and they are obvious to the eye and observation of the world, ver. 1, 2. It is written before God in the most legible and indelible characters, and sealed among his treasures, never to be forgotten, Deu. xxxii. 34. It is written there "with a pen of iron, and with the point of a diamond;" what is so written will not be worn out by time, but is, as Job speaks, "graven in the rock for ever." Note, The sin of sinners is never forgotten till it is forgiven. It is ever before God, till by repentance it comes to be ever before us. "It is graven upon the table of their heart," their own consciences witness against them, and are instead of a thousand witnesses. What is graven on the heart, though it may be covered and closed up for a time, yet, being graven, it cannot be razed out, but will be produced in evidence when the books shall be opened. Nay, we need not appeal to the tables of the heart, perhaps they will not own the convictions of their consciences. We need go no farther for proof of the charge, than the horns of their altars, on which the blood of their idolatrous sacrifices was sprinkled, and perhaps the names of the idols to whose honour they were erected were inscribed. Their neighbours will witness against them, and all the creatures they have abused, by using them in the service of their lusts. To complete the evidence, their own children shall be witnesses against them; they will tell truth, when their fathers dissemble and prevaricate; they remember the altars and the groves to which their parents took them when they were little, ver. 2. It appears they were full of them, and acquainted with them betimes, they talk of them so frequently, so familiarly, and with so much delight.

2. They cannot plead that they repent, or are come to a better mind; no, as the guilt of their sin is undeniable, so their inclination to sin is invincible and incurable. In this sense many understand ver. 1, 2. Their sin is deeply engraven as with a pen of iron in the tables of their hearts; they have a rooted affection to it, it is woven into their very nature: their sin is dear to them, as that is of which we say it is engraven on our hearts. The bias of their minds is still as strong as ever towards their idols, and they are not wrought upon either by the word or rod of God to forget them, and abate their affection to them. It is written upon the horns of their altars, for they have given up their names to their idols, and resolve to abide by what they have done; they have bound themselves as with cords to the horns of their altars; and ver. 2 may be read fully to this sense: 'As they remember their children, so remember they their altars and their groves;' they are as fond of them, and take as much pleasure in them, as men do in their own children, and are as loath to part with them; they will live and die with their idols, and can no more forget them than a woman can forget her sucking child.

Secondly. The indictment being thus fully proved, the judgment is affirmed, and the sentence ratified, ver. 3, 4; forasmuch as they are thus wedded to their sins, and will not part with them,

1. They shall be made to part with their treasures, and those shall be given into the hands of strangers. Jerusalem is God's mountain in the field, it was built on a hill in the midst of a plain; all the treasures of that wealthy city will God give to the spoil. Or, 'My mountains with the fields, thy wealth and all thy treasures will I expose to spoil;' both the products of the country and the stores of the city shall be seized by the Chaldeans. Justly are men stripped of that which they have served their idols with, and have made the food and fuel of their lusts. My mountain, (so the whole land was, Ps. lxxviii. 54, Deu. xi. 11,) you have turned into your high places for sin, have worshipped your idols upon the high hills, ver. 2, and now they shall be given for a spoil in all your borders. What we make for a sin God will make for a spoil; for what comfort can we expect in that wherewith God is dishonoured?

2. They shall be made to part with their inheritance, with their real estates as well as personal, and shall be carried captives into a strange land; ver. 4, "Thou, even thyself," or, thou thyself, and those that are in thee, all the inhabitants, "shall discontinue from thy heritage that I gave thee." God owns it was their heritage, and he gave it them, they had an unquestionable title to it, which was an aggravation of their folly in throwing themselves out of the possession of it. It is through thyself, (so some read it,) through thine own default, that thou art disseized. Thou shalt discontinue or intermit the occupation of thy land. The law appointed them to let their land rest (it is the word here used) one year in seven, Ex. xxiii. 11. They did not observe that law, and now God would compel them to let it rest. The land shall enjoy her sabbaths, Lev. xxvi. 34, and yet it shall be no rest to them, they shall serve their enemies in a land they know not. Observe, 1st. Sin works a discontinuance of our comforts, and deprives us of the enjoyment of that which God has given us. Yet, 2nd. A discontinuance of the possession is not a defeasance of the right, but it is intimated that upon their repentance they shall recover possession again. For the present "ye have kindled a fire in mine anger," which burns so hot, that it seems as if it would burn for ever; and so it will unless you repent, for it is the anger of an everlasting God fastening upon immortal souls; and who knows the power of that anger?

5 Thus saith the LORD;
Cursed be the man that trusteth in man,
And maketh flesh his arm,
And whose heart departeth from the LORD.
6 For he shall be like the heath in the desert,
And shall not see when good cometh;
But shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness
In a salt land and not inhabited.
7 Blessed is the man that trusteth in the LORD,
And whose hope the LORD is.
8 For he shall be as a tree planted by the waters,
And that spreadeth out her roots by the river,
And shall not see when heat cometh,
But her leaf shall be green;
And shall not be careful in the year of drought,
Neither shall cease from yielding fruit.
9 The heart is deceitful above all things,
And desperately wicked: who can know it?
10 I the LORD search the heart,
I try the reins,
Even to give every man according to his ways,
And according to the fruit of his doings.
11 As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not;
So he that getteth riches, and not by right,
Shall leave them in the midst of his days,
And at his end shall be a fool.

It is excellent doctrine that is preached in these verses, and of general concern and use to us all, and it doth not appear to have any particular reference to the present state of Judah and Jerusalem. The prophet's sermons were not all prophetical, but some of them practical; yet this discourse, which probably we have here only the heads of, would be of singular use to them by way of caution, not to misplace their confidence in the day of their distress. Let us all learn what we are taught here.

First. Concerning the disappointment and vexation they will certainly meet with that depend upon creatures for success and relief when they are in trouble; ver. 5, 6, "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man." God pronounceth him cursed for the affront he thereby puts upon him; or, cursed, that is, miserable, is the man that doth so, for he leans upon a broken reed, which will not only fail him, but will run into his hand and pierce it. Observe, 1. The sin here condemned. It is trusting in man; putting that confidence in the wisdom and power, the kindness and faithfulness of men, which should be placed in those attributes of God only; making our applications to men, and raising our expectations from them as principal agents, whereas they are but instruments in the hand of Providence. It is making flesh the arm we stay upon, the arm we work with, and with which we hope to work our point; the arm under which we shelter ourselves, and on which we depend for protection. God is his people's arm, Isa. xxxiii. 2. We must not think to make any creature to be that to us which God has undertaken to be. Man is called flesh, to shew the folly of those that make him their confidence. He is flesh, that is, weak and xvi. 18. The words rendered "the carcases of their detestable and abominable things" denote the dead bodies of the sacrifices offered to detestable and abominable idols. Not only did they sacrifice to the heathen gods, but they offered unclean animals and others not commanded by the law, yea, their very sons and daughters. Another translation deserving attention has been adopted by some modern critics: "They have polluted my land with the carcases of their abominations, and they have filled mine inheritance with their detestable things." The new translation involves a change in the pointing of the Hebrew text, but this is no fatal objection to it.

xvi. 21. The terms "mine hand and my might" may be explained, with Dr. Henderson, of the severe afflictions to be suffered by Israel.

xvii. 1. "A pen of iron" was not, like our ordinary steel pen, intended for writing with ink, but was like the Latin stylus, a sort of graver for scratching or indenting an inscription upon a piece of lead, feeble, as flesh without bones or sinews, that has no strength at all in it; he is inactive as flesh without spirit, which is a dead thing; he is mortal and dying as flesh, which soon putrefies and corrupts, and is continually wasting. Nay, he is false and sinful, and has lost his integrity, so his being flesh signifies, Gen. vi. 3. 2. The great malignity there is in this sin. It is the departure of the evil heart of unbelief from the living God. They that trust in man perhaps draw nigh to God with their mouth, and honour him with their lips, they call him their hope, and say they trust in him; but really their heart departeth from him; they distrust him, despise him, and decline a correspondence with him. Cleaving to the cistern is leaving the fountain, and is resented accordingly. 3. The fatal consequences of this sin. He that puts a confidence in man puts a cheat upon himself; for, ver. 6, "He shall be like the heath in the desert," a sorry shrub, the product of barren ground, sapless, and useless, and worthless; his comforts shall all fail him, and his hopes be blasted; he shall wither, be dejected in himself, and trampled on by all about him. When good comes he shall not see it, he shall not share in it; when the times mend, they shall not mend with him, but he "shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness;" that is, his expectations shall be continually frustrated; when others have a harvest, he shall have none. They that trust to their own righteousness and strength, and think they can do well enough without the merit and grace of Christ, thus make flesh their arm, and their souls cannot prosper in graces or comforts; they can neither produce the fruits of acceptable services to God nor reap the fruits of saving blessings from him; they dwell in a dry land.

Secondly. Concerning the abundant satisfaction which they have, and will have, that make God their confidence, that live by faith in his providence and promise, that refer themselves to him and his conduct at all times, and repose themselves in him and his love in the most unquiet times, ver. 7, 8. Observe, 1. The duty required of us. To trust in the Lord, to do our duty to him, and then depend upon him to bear us out in doing it; when creatures and second causes either deceive or threaten us, either are false to us or fierce against us, to commit ourselves to God as all-sufficient, both to make up the want of those that fail us and to protect us from those that set upon us. It is to make the Lord our hope, his favour the good we hope for, and his power the strength we hope in. 2. The comfort that attends the doing of this duty. He that doth so "shall be as a tree planted by the waters," a choice tree, about which great care has been taken to set it in the best soil, so far from being like the heath in the wilderness; like a tree that spreads out her roots, and thereby is firmly fixed, spreads them out by the rivers, whence it draws abundance of sap; which notes both the establishment and the comfort which they have that make God their hope; they are easy, they are pleasant, and enjoy a continual security and serenity of mind. A tree thus planted, thus watered, shall not see when heat comes, that is, shall not sustain any damage by the most scorching heats of summer; it is so well moistened from its roots, that it shall be sufficiently guarded against drought. Those that make God their hope, 1st. They shall flourish in credit and comfort, like a tree that is always green, whose leaf doth not wither; they shall be cheerful to themselves, and beautiful in the eyes of others. Those who thus give honour to God by giving him credit, God will put honour upon them, and make them the ornament and delight of the places where they live, as green trees are. 2nd. They shall be fixed in an inward peace and satisfaction; "shall not be careful in a year of drought," when there is want of rain, for, as it has seed in itself, so it has its moisture. Those that make God their hope have enough in him to make up the want of all creature comforts. We need not be solicitous about the breaking of a cistern, as long as we have the fountain. 3rd. They shall be fruitful in holiness, and in all good works. They that trust in God, and by faith derive strength and grace from him, shall not cease from yielding fruit, they shall still be enabled to do that which will redound to the glory of God, the benefit of others, and their own account.

Thirdly. Concerning the sinfulness of man's heart, and the Divine inspection it is always under, ver. 9, 10. It is folly to trust in man, for he is not only frail, but false and deceitful. We are apt to think we trust in God, and are entitled to the blessings here promised to them that do so. But this is a thing about which our own hearts deceive us as much as any thing. We think we trust in God when really we do not, as appears by this, that our hopes and fears rise or fall according as second causes smile or frown. But it is true in general,

1. There is that wickedness in our hearts which we ourselves are not aware of, and do not suspect to be there; nay, it is a common mistake among the children of men to think themselves, their own hearts at least, a great deal better than really they are. "The heart," that is, the conscience of man in his corrupt and fallen state, "is deceitful above all things;" it is subtle and false, it is apt to supplant, (so the word properly signifies,) it is that from which Jacob had his name, a supplanter. It calls evil good, and good evil; puts false colours upon things, and cries peace to those to whom peace doth not belong. When men say in their hearts, that is, suffer their hearts to whisper to them, that either there is no God, or he doth not see, or he will not require, or they shall have peace,—though they go on; in these and a thousand the like suggestions the heart is deceitful; it cheats men into their own ruin, and this will be the aggravation of it, that they are self-deceivers, self-destroyers. Herein "the heart is desperately wicked," it is deadly, it is desperate. The case is bad indeed, and in a manner deplorable and past relief, if the conscience, which should rectify the errors of the other faculties, is itself a mother of falsehood and a ringleader in the delusion. What will become of a man if that in him which should be the candle of the Lord give a false light, if God's deputy in the soul, that is intrusted to support his interests, betrays them? Such is the deceitfulness of the heart, that we may truly say, "Who can know it?" Who can describe how bad the heart is? We cannot know our own hearts, not what they will do in an hour of temptation, (Hezekiah did not, Peter did not;) not what corrupt dispositions there are in them, nor in how many things they have turned aside; who can understand his errors? Much less can we know the hearts of others, or have any dependence upon them. But,

2. Whatever wickedness there is in the heart, God sees it and knows it, is perfectly acquainted with it, and apprised of it; "I the Lord search the heart." This is true of all that is in the heart, all the thoughts of it, the quickest, and those that are most carelessly overlooked by ourselves; all the intents of it, the closest, and those that are most artfully disguised and industriously concealed from others. Men may be imposed upon, but God cannot. He not only searcheth the heart with a piercing eye, but he tries the reins, to pass a judgment upon what he discovers, to give every thing its true character and due weight. He tries as the gold is tried, whether it be standard or no; as the prisoner is tried, whether he be guilty or no. And this judgment he makes of the heart is in order to his passing judgment upon the man; it is "to give to every man according to his ways," according to the desert and the tendency of them; life to those that walked in the ways of life, and death to those that persisted in the paths of the destroyer; "and according to the fruit of his doings," the effect and influence his doings have had upon others; or according to what is settled by the word of God to be the fruit of men's doings, blessings to the obedient and curses to the disobedient. Note, Therefore God is judge himself, and he alone, because he and none but he knows the hearts of the children of men. It is true especially of all the deceitfulness and wickedness of the heart, all its corrupt devices, desires, and designs: God observes and discerns them; and, which is more than any man can do, he judgeth of the overt act by the heart. Note, God knows more evil by us than we do by ourselves, which is a good reason why we should not flatter ourselves, but always stand in awe of the judgment of God.

Fourthly. Concerning the curse that attends wealth unjustly gotten. Fraud and violence had been reigning crying sins in Judah and Jerusalem; now the prophet would have those who had been guilty of these sins, and were now stripped of all they had, to read their sin in their punishment, ver. 11, "He that gets riches, and not by right," though he may make them his hope, he shall never have joy of them. Observe, It is possible that those who use unlawful means to get wealth may succeed therein, and prosper for a time; and it is a temptation to many to defraud and oppress their neighbours, when there is money to be got by it. He that has got treasures by vanity and a lying tongue may hug himself in his success, and say, I am rich, nay, and I am innocent too, Hos. xii. 8, but he "shall leave them in the midst of his days," they shall be taken from him or he from them; God shall cut him off with some surprising stroke then when he said, "Soul, take thine ease, thou hast goods laid up for many years," Lu. xii. 19, 20. He shall leave them to he knows not whom, and not be able to take any of his riches away with him. It intimates what a great vexation it is to a worldly man at death that he must leave his riches behind him, and justly may it be a terror to those that got them unjustly; for, though the wealth will not follow them to another world, the guilt will, and the torment of an everlasting, "Son, remember," Lu. xvi. 25. Thus, "at his end he shall be a fool," a Nabal, whose wealth did him no good, which he had so sordidly hoarded, when his heart became dead as a stone. He was a fool all along; sometimes perhaps his own conscience told him so, but at his end he will appear to be so. Those are fools indeed that are fools in their latter end; and so multitudes will prove who were cried up as wise men, that did well for themselves, Ps. xiix. 13, 18. They that get grace will be wise in their latter end, will have the comfort of it in death, and the benefit of it to eternity, Pr. xix. 20; but they that place their happiness in the wealth of the world, and right or wrong will be rich, will rue the folly of it when it is too late to rectify the fatal mistake. This is like "the partridge that sits on eggs and hatcheth them not," but either they are broken, as Job xxxix. 15, or stolen, as Isa. x. 4, or they become addled; some sort of fowl there was well known among the Jews whose case this commonly was. The rich man takes a great deal of pains to get an estate together, and sits brooding upon it, but never has any comfort or satisfaction in it. His projects to enrich himself by sinful courses miscarry, and come to nothing. Let us, therefore, be wise in time; what we get, to get it honestly; and what we have, to use it charitably; that we may lay up in store a good foundation, and be wise for eternity.

12 A glorious high throne from the beginning
Is the place of our sanctuary.
13 O LORD, the hope of Israel,
All that forsake thee shall be ashamed, [earth,
And they that depart from me shall be written in the
Because they have forsaken the LORD, the fountain of living waters 14 Heal me, O LORD, and I shall be healed;
Save me, and I shall be saved:
For thou art my praise.
15 Behold, they say unto me,
Where is the word of the LORD? let it come now.
16 As for me, I have not hastened from being a pastor to follow thee:
Neither have I desired the woeful day; thou knowest:
That which came out of my lips was right before thee.
17 Be not a terror unto me:
Thou art my hope in the day of evil
18 Let them be confounded that persecute me, but let not me be confounded:
Let them be dismayed, but let not me be dismayed:
Bring upon them the day of evil,
And destroy them with double destruction.

Here, as often before, we have the prophet retired for private meditation, and alone with God. Those ministers that would have comfort in their work must be much so. In his converse here with God and his own heart he takes the liberty which devout souls sometimes use in their soliloquies, to pass from one thing to another, without tying themselves too strictly to the laws of method and coherence.

First. He acknowledgeth the great favour of God to his people in setting up a revealed religion among them, and dignifying them with Divine institutions; ver. 12, "A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary." The temple at Jerusalem, where God manifested his special presence, where the lively oracles were lodged, where the people paid their homage to their sovereign, and whither they fled for refuge in distress, was the place of their sanctuary. That was a glorious high throne: it was a throne of holiness, that made it truly glorious; it was God's throne, that made it truly high. Jerusalem is called the city of the great king, not only Israel's king, but the king of the whole earth, so that it might be justly deemed the metropolis, or royal city, of the world. It was from the beginning so, from the first projecting of it by David and building of it by Solomon, 2 Chr. ii. 9. It was the honour of Israel that God set up such a glorious throne among them. 'As the glorious and high throne,' namely, that is heaven, 'is the place of our sanctuary,' so some read it. Note, All good men have a high value and veneration for the ordinances of God, and reckon the place of the sanctuary a glorious high throne. Jeremiah mentions this here, either as a plea with God for mercy to their land, in honour of the throne of his glory, ch. xiv. 21, or as an aggravation of the sin of his people in forsaking God, though his throne was among them, and so profaning his crown and the place of his sanctuary.

Secondly. He acknowledgeth the righteousness of God in abandoning those to ruin that forsook him, and revolted from their allegiance to him, ver. 13.

wood, or other material fitted for the purpose of perpetuating a record. "The point of a diamond" was harder and sharper than one of iron, and was adapted for inscribing anything upon the most enduring substances. Because such things were used for lasting documents, they are spoken of as the things which had registered Israel's sin on the altars and on the hearts of the people. The "table" was the tablet, plate, or other surface upon which the writing was executed. The general thought appears to be that the Hebrews had engraven their evil practices upon their memories, and had em blazoned them before their eyes; or, in Dr. Blayney's words, "Idolatry was indelibly fixed in their affections and memory, as much as if it had been engraved with instruments capable of making the strongest and most durable impression upon their hearts, as upon a writing tablet, and upon their altars, so as to be for ever present before their eyes." The next verse altogether favours this view.

xvii. 2. What our translators here call "groves" were most

He speaks it to God, as subscribing both to the certainty and equity of it; "O Lord, the hope of" those in "Israel" that adhere to thee, "all that forsake thee shall be ashamed." They must of necessity be so, for they forsake thee for lying vanities, which will deceive them and make them ashamed; they will be ashamed, for they shame themselves; they will justly be put to shame, for they have forsaken him who alone can keep them in countenance when troubles come. 'Let them be ashamed,' so some read it; and so it is a pious imprecation of the wrath of God upon them, or of petition for his grace to make them penitently ashamed. "They that depart from me," that is, from the word of God which I have preached, they do in effect depart from God, as those that return to God are said to return to the prophet, ch. xv. 19. 'They that depart from thee,' (so some read it,) they "shall be written in the earth;" they shall soon be blotted out, as that is which is written in the dust; they shall be trampled upon and exposed to contempt; they belong to the earth, and shall be numbered among earthly people, that lay up their treasure on earth, and whose names are not written in heaven. And they deserve to be thus written with the fools in Israel, that their folly may be made manifest unto all, because they have "forsaken the Lord, the fountain of living waters," that is, spring waters, and that for broken cisterns. Note, God is to all that are his a fountain of living waters. There is a fulness of comfort in him, an overflowing, everflowing fulness, like that of a fountain; it is always fresh, and clear, and clean, like spring water, while the pleasures of sin are puddle waters. They are free to it; it is not a fountain sealed; they deserve, therefore, to be condemned, as Adam, to red earth, to which by the corruption of their nature they are allied, because they have forsaken the garden of the Lord, which is so well watered. They that depart from God are written in the earth.

Thirdly. He prays to God for healing saving mercy for himself. If the case of those be so miserable that depart from God, let me always draw nigh to him, Ps. lxxiii. 27, 28; and in order to that, "Lord, heal me and save me," ver. 14. Heal my backslidings, my bent to backslide, and save me from being carried away by the strength of the stream, to forsake thee. He was wounded in spirit with grief upon many accounts; Lord, heal me with thy comforts, and make me easy. He was continually exposed to the malice of unreasonable men; Lord, save me from them, and let me not fall into their wicked hands. Heal me, that is, sanctify me by thy grace; save me, that is, bring me to thy glory. All that shall be saved hereafter are sanctified now; unless the disease of sin be purged out, the soul cannot live. To enforce this petition he pleads, 1. The firm belief he had of God's power; "Heal thou me, and then I shall be healed;" the cure will certainly be wrought if thou undertake it; it will be a thorough cure, and not a palliative one. Those that come to God to be healed ought to be abundantly satisfied in the all-sufficiency of their physician. Save me, and then I shall certainly be saved, be my dangers and enemies never so threatening. If God holds us up we shall live; if he protect us we shall be safe. 2. The sincere regard he had to God's glory; "For thou art my praise," and for that reason I desire to be healed and saved, "that I may live and praise thee," Ps. cxix. 175. Thou art he whom I praise, and the praise due to thee I never gave to another. Thou art he whom I glory in and boast of, for on thee do I depend. Thou art he that furnisheth me with continual matter for praise, and I have given thee the praise of the favours already bestowed upon me. 'Thou shalt be my praise,' so some read it; heal me and save me, and thou shalt have the glory of it; "My praise shall be continually of thee," Ps. lxxi. 6, and lxxix. 13.

Fourthly. He complains of the infidelity and daring impiety of the people to whom he preached. It greatly troubled him, and he shews before God this trouble, as the servant that had slights put upon him by the guests he was sent to invite, "came and shewed his Lord these things." He had faithfully delivered God's message to them, and what answer has he to return to him that sent him? Why, ver. 15, "Behold, they say unto me, Where is the word of the Lord? Let it come now," Isa. v. 19. They bantered the prophet, and made a jest of that which he delivered with the greatest seriousness. 1. They denied the truth of what he said; If that be the word of the Lord which thou speakest to us, where is it? why is it not fulfilled? Thus the patience of God was impudently abused, as a ground to question his veracity. 2. They defied the terror of what he said; Let God Almighty do his worst, let all he has said come to pass, we shall do well enough, the lion is not so fierce as he is painted, Am. v. 18. Lord, to what purpose is it to speak to men that will neither believe nor fear?

Fifthly. He appeals to God concerning his faithful discharge of the office to which he was called, ver. 16. The people did all they could to make him weary of his work, to exasperate him and make him uneasy, and to tempt him to prevaricate and alter his message, for fear of displeasing them; but, Lord, saith he, thou knowest I have not yielded to them. 1. He kept constant to his work. His office, instead of being his credit and protection, exposed him to reproach, contempt, and injury; and yet, saith he, "I have not hastened from being a pastor after thee;" I have not overrun my work, nor sued for a discharge or a quietus. Prophets were pastors to the people, to feed them with the good word of God; but they were to be pastors after God, and all ministers must be so, according to his heart, ch. iii. 15, to follow him, and the directions and instructions he gives. Such a pastor Jeremiah was; and, though he met with as much difficulty and discouragement as ever any man did, yet he did not fly off as Jonah did, nor desire to be excused from going any more on God's errands. Note, Those that are employed for God, though their success answer not their expectation, yet they must not therefore throw up their commission, but continue to follow God, though the storm be in their faces. 2. He kept up his affection to the people. Though they were very abusive to him, he was compassionate to them: "I have not desired the woful day." The day of the accomplishment of his prophecies would be a woful day indeed to Jerusalem, and therefore he deprecated it and wished it might never come; though as to himself it would be the avenging of him upon his persecutors and the proving of him a true prophet, which they had questioned, ver. 15, and upon those accounts he might be tempted to desire it. Note, God doth not, and therefore ministers must not, desire the death of sinners, but rather that they may turn and live. Though we warn of the woful day, we must not wish for it, but rather weep because of it, as Jeremiah did. 3. He kept close to his instructions. Though he might have curried favour with the people, or at least have avoided their displeasure, if he had not been so sharp in his reproofs and severe in his threatenings, yet he would deliver his message faithfully; and that he had done so was a comfort to him; Lord, "thou knowest that which came out of my lips was right before thee," that is, it exactly agreed with what I had received from thee, and therefore thou art reflected upon in their quarrelling with me. Note, If what we say and do be right before God, we may easily despise the reproaches and censures of men; it is a small thing to be judged of their judgment.

Sixthly. He humbly begs of God that he would own him and protect him, and carry him on cheerfully in that work to which God had so plainly called him, and he had so sincerely devoted himself. Two things he here desires:

1. That he might have comfort in serving the God that sent him; ver. 17, "Be not thou a terror to me." Surely more is implied than is expressed; Be thou a comfort to me, and let thy favour rejoice my heart and encourage me, when my enemies do all they can to terrify me and either to drive me from my work or make me drive on heavily in it. Note, The best have that in them which might justly make God a terror to them, as he was for some time to Job, ch. vi. 4; to Asaph, Ps. lxxvii. 3; to Heman, Ps. lxxxviii. 15. And this is that which good men, "knowing the terrors of the Lord," dread and deprecate more than any thing; nay, whatever frightful accidents might befal them, or how formidable soever their enemies may appear to them, they can do well enough, so long as God is not a terror to them. He pleads, "Thou art my hope," and then nothing else is my fear, no, not "in the day of evil," when it is most threatening, most pressing. My dependence is upon thee, and therefore be not a terror to me. Note, Those that by faith make God their confidence shall have him for their comfort in the worst of times, if it be not their own fault. If we make him our trust we shall not find him our terror.

2. That he might have courage in dealing with the people to whom he was sent, ver. 18. They persecuted him, who should have entertained and encouraged him; Lord, saith he, let them be confounded, that is, let them be overpowered by the convictions of the word, and made ashamed of their obstinacy, or else let the judgments threatened be at length executed upon them; but let not me be confounded, let not me be terrified by their menaces, so as to betray my trust. Note, God's ministers have work to do which they need not to be either ashamed or afraid to go on in, but they do need be helped by the Divine grace to go on in it without shame or fear. Jeremiah had not desired the woful day upon his country in general, but as to his persecutors, in a just and holy indignation at their malice he prays, "Bring upon them the day of evil," in hopes the bringing it upon them might prevent the bringing of it upon the country; if they were taken away the people would be better, therefore "destroy them with a double destruction," that is, let them be utterly destroyed, root and branch, and let the prospect of that destruction be their present confusion. This the prophet prays, not at all that he might be avenged, nor so much that he might be eased, but that the Lord may be known by the judgments which he executeth.

19 Thus said the LORD unto me; Go and stand in the gate of the children of the people, whereby the kings of Judah come in, and by the which they go out, and in all the gates of Jerusalem; 20 And say unto them, Hear ye the word of the LORD, ye kings of Judah, and all Judah, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, that enter in by these gates: 21 Thus saith the LORD; Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the sabbath day, nor bring it in by the gates of Jerusalem; 22 Neither carry forth a burden out of your houses on the sabbath day, neither do ye any work, but hallow ye the sabbath day, as I commanded your fathers. 23 But they obeyed not, neither inclined their ear, but made their neck stiff, that they might not hear, nor receive instruction.

24 And it shall come to pass,
If ye diligently hearken unto me, saith the LORD,
To bring in no burden through the gates of this city on the sabbath day,
But hallow the sabbath day, to do no work therein;
25 Then shall there enter into the gates of this city
Kings and princes sitting upon the throne of David,
Riding in chariots and on horses,
They, and their princes,
The men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem:
And this city shall remain for ever.
26 And they shall come from the cities of Judah,
And from the places about Jerusalem,
And from the land of Benjamin, and from the plain,
And from the mountains, and from the south,
Bringing burnt offerings, and sacrifices,
And meat offerings, and incense,
And bringing sacrifices of praise, unto the house of the [LORD.
27 But if ye will not hearken unto me
To hallow the sabbath day, and not to bear a burden,
Even entering in at the gates of Jerusalem on the sabbath day;
Then will I kindle a fire in the gates thereof,
And it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem,
And it shall not be quenched.

These verses are a sermon concerning sabbath sanctification; it is a word which the prophet received from the Lord, and was ordered to deliver in the most solemn, public manner to the people; for they were sent not only to reprove sin, and to press obedience in general, but they must descend to particulars. This message concerning the sabbath probably was sent in the days of Josiah, for the furtherance of that work of reformation which he set on foot, probably images of Ashtoreth, or portions of trees regarded as her emblems. If separate images are understood, they were doubtless suspended upon the green trees, and not "by" them, as our version suggests.

xvii. 6. Instead of "heath" some, and perhaps all who are familiar with the productions of Bible lands, say that a sort of juniper is intended here. Dr. Robinson, the traveller, observes that the Arabic name for this juniper is still almost identical with the name used by Jeremiah. Dr. Tristram calls attention to the same fact, and remarks that there is no true "heath" in Palestine south of the Lower Lebanon. With reference to the expression, "a salt land," it is only necessary to say that in many places lands pervaded by salt are to be found.

xvii. 11. The words "as the partridge sitteth on eggs, and batcheth them not," are not a good translation. Henderson renders them "as the partridge sitteth on eggs which it hath not laid," and all the promises here, ver. 25, 26, are such as I think we scarce find, when things came nearer to the extremity. This message must be proclaimed in all the places of concourse, and therefore in the gates, not only because through them people were continually passing and repassing, but because in them they kept their courts, and laid up their stores. It must be proclaimed (as the king or queen is usually proclaimed) at the court gate first, the gate by which the kings of Judah use to come in and go out, ver. 19. Let them be told their duty first, particularly this duty; for, if sabbaths be not sanctified as they should be, the rulers of Judah are to be contended with; so they were, Neh. xiii. 17, for they are certainly wanting in their duty. He must also preach it in all the gates of Jerusalem. It is a matter of great and general concern, therefore let all take notice of it. Let the kings of Judah hear the word of the Lord, for, as high as they are, he is above them; and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for, as mean as they are, he takes notice of them, and of what they say and do on sabbath days. Observe,

First. How the sabbath is to be sanctified, and what is the law concerning it, ver. 21, 22. 1. They must rest from their worldly employments on the sabbath day, must do no servile work. They must bear no burthen into the city, or out of it; into their houses, or out of them; neither husbandmen's burthens of corn carried in, nor muck carried out; nor tradesmen's burthens of wares or merchandizes imported or exported. There must not a loaded horse, or cart, or waggon, be seen on the sabbath day, either in the streets or in the roads. The porters must not ply on that day, nor must the servants be suffered to fetch in provisions or fuel. It is a day of rest, and must not be made a day of labour, unless in case of necessity. 2. They must apply themselves to that which is the proper work and business of the day; "Hallow ye the sabbath;" that is, consecrate it to the honour of God, and spend it in his service and worship; and it is in order to this that worldly business must be laid aside, that we may be entire for, and intent upon, that work, which requires and deserves the whole man. 3. They must herein be very circumspect; "Take heed to yourselves," watch against every thing that borders upon the profanation of the sabbath. Where God is jealous, we must be cautious. "Take heed to yourselves," for it is at your peril if you rob God of that part of your time which he has reserved to himself. 'Take heed to your souls,' so the word is. In order to the right sanctifying of sabbaths, we must look well to the frame of our spirits, and have a watchful eye upon all the motions of the inward man. Let not the soul be burthened with the cares of this world on sabbath days, but let that be employed, even all that is within us, in the work of the day. And, 4. He refers them to the law, the statute in this case made and provided. This is no new imposition upon you, but is what "I commanded your fathers;" it is an ancient law, it was an article of the orignal contract; nay, it was a command to the patriarchs.

Secondly. How the sabbath had been profaned, ver. 23. Your fathers were required to keep holy the sabbath day, "but they obeyed not;" they "hardened their necks" against this as well as other commands that were given them. This is mentioned to shew that there needed a reformation in this matter, and that God had a just controversy with them for the long transgression of this law which they had been guilty of. They hardened their necks against this command, that they might not hear and receive instruction concerning other commands. Where sabbaths are neglected, all religion sensibly goes to decay.

Thirdly. What blessings God had in store for them, if they would make conscience of sabbath sanctification. Though their fathers had been guilty of the profanation of the sabbath, they should not only not smart for it, but their city and nation should recover its ancient glory, if they would keep sabbaths better, ver. 24—26. Let them take care to hallow the sabbath, and do no work therein; and then, 1. The court shall flourish. Kings in succession, or the many branches of the royal family at the same time, all as great as kings, with other the princes that sit upon the thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David, Ps. cxxii. 5, shall ride in great pomp through the gates of Jerusalem, some in chariots, and some on horses, attended with a numerous retinue of the men of Judah. Note, The honour of the government is the joy of the kingdom, and the support of religion would contribute greatly to both. 2. The city shall flourish. Let there be a face of religion kept up upon Jerusalem, by sabbath sanctification, that it may answer its title, the holy city, and then it shall remain for ever, shall for ever be inhabited, so the word may be rendered; it shall not be destroyed and dispeopled, as it is threatened to be. Whatever supports religion tends to establish the civil interests of a land. 3. The country shall flourish. The cities of Judah, and the land of Benjamin, shall be replenished with vast numbers of inhabitants, and those abounding in plenty, and living in peace, which will appear by the multitude and value of their offerings which they shall present to God. And by this the flourishing of a country may be judged of, what doth it do for the honour of God? Those that starve their religion, either they are poor, or are in a fair way to be so. 4. The church shall flourish. Meat offerings and incense, and sacrifices of praise, shall be brought to the house of the Lord, for the maintenance of the service of that house, and the servants that attend it. God's institutions shall be conscientiously observed; no sacrifices and incense shall be offered to idols, and alienated from God, but every thing shall go in the right channel. They shall have both occasion and hearts to bring sacrifices of praise to God. This is made an instance of their prosperity. Then a people truly flourish, when religion flourisheth among them. And this is the effect of sabbath sanctification. When that branch of religion is kept up, other instances of it are kept up likewise; but when that is lost, devotion is lost either in superstition or profaneness. It is a true observation which some have made, that the streams of all religion run either deep or shallow, according as the banks of the sabbath are kept up or neglected.

Fourthly. What judgments they must expect would come upon them, if they persisted in the profanation of the sabbath; ver. 27, "If ye will not hearken to me" in this matter, to keep the gates shut on sabbath days, so that there may be no unnecessary entering in, or going out on that day,—if you will break through the inclosure of the Divine law, and lay that day in common with other days,—know that God will kindle a fire in the gates of your city; intimating, that it shall be kindled by an enemy besieging the city, and assaulting the gates, and who shall take this course to force their entrance. Justly will those gates be fired that are not used, as they ought to be, to shut out sin, and to keep people in to an attendance on their duty. This fire shall devour even the palaces of Jerusalem, where the princes and nobles dwell, who did not use their power and interest as they ought to have done, to keep up the honour of God's sabbaths; but it shall not be quenched till it has laid the whole city in ruins. This was fulfilled by the army of the Chaldeans, ch. lii. 13. The profanation of the sabbath is a sin for which God has often contended with a people by fire.

CHAPTER XVIII.

In this chapter we have, I. A general declaration of God's ways in dealing with nations and kingdoms; that he can easily do what he will with them, as easily as the potter can with the clay, ver. 1—6. But that he certainly will do what is just and fair with them; if he threaten their ruin, yet, upon their repentance, he will return in mercy to them; and when he is coming towards them in mercy nothing but their sin will stop the progress of his favours, ver. 7—10. II. A particular demonstration of the folly of the men of Judah and Jerusalem, in departing from their God to idols, and so bringing ruin upon themselves, notwithstanding the fair warnings given them, and God's kind intentions towards them, ver. 11—17. III. The prophet's complaint to God of the base ingratitude, and unreasonable malice of his enemies, persecutors, and slanderers, and his prayers against them, ver. 18—23.

THE word which came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Arise, and go down to the potter's house, and there I will cause thee to hear my words. 3 Then I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the wheels. 4 And the vessel that he made of clay was marred in the hand of the potter: so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to make it. 5 Then the word of the LORD came to me, saying,

6 O house of Israel, cannot I do with you
As this potter? saith the LORD.
Behold, as the clay is in the potter's hand,
So are ye in mine hand, O house of Israel.
7 At what instant I shall speak concerning a nation, and concerning a kingdom,
To pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy it;
8 If that nation, against whom I have pronounced,
Turn from their evil,
I will repent of the evil that I thought to do unto them.
9 And at what instant I shall speak concerning a nation and concerning a kingdom,
To build and to plant it;
10 If it do evil in my sight, that it obey not my voice,
Then I will repent of the good, wherewith I said I would benefit them.

The prophet is here sent to the potter's house, (he knew where to find it,) not to preach a sermon, as before, to the gates of Jerusalem, but to prepare a sermon, or rather, to receive it ready prepared. Those needed not to study their sermons that had them, as he had this, by immediate inspiration. "Go to the potter's house," and observe how he manageth his work, "and there I will cause thee," by silent whispers, "to hear my words." There thou shalt receive a message to be delivered to the people. Note, Those that would know God's mind must observe his appointments, and attend there where they may hear his word. The prophet was never disobedient to the heavenly vision, and therefore went to the potter's house, ver. 3, and took notice how "he wrought his work upon the wheels," just as he pleased, with a great deal of ease, and in a little time. And, ver. 4, when a lump of clay, that he designed to form into one shape, either proved too stiff, or had a stone in it, or some way or other came to be "marred in his hand," he presently turned it into another shape; if it will not serve for a vessel of honour, it will serve for a vessel of dishonour, just as seems good to the potter. It is probable Jeremiah knew well enough how the potter wrought his work, and how easily he threw it into what form he pleased; but he must go and observe it now, that, having the idea of it fresh in his mind, he might the more readily and distinctly apprehend that truth which God designed thereby to represent to him, and might the more intelligently explain it to the people. God used similitudes by his servants the prophets, Hos. xii. 10, and it was requisite they should themselves understand the similitudes they used. Ministers will make a good use of their converse with the business and affairs of this life, if they learn thereby to speak more plainly and familiarly to people about the things of God, and to expound Scripture comparisons. For they ought to make all their knowledge some way or other serviceable to their profession. Now let us see what the message is which Jeremiah receives, and is intrusted with the delivery of, at the potter's house. While he looks carefully upon the potter's work, God darts into his mind these two great truths, which he must preach to the house of Israel:

First. That God hath both an incontestable authority and an irresistible ability to form and fashion kingdoms and nations as he pleaseth, so as to serve his own purposes. "Cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the Lord," refers to the ancient idea that the partridge stole from others the eggs which filled her nest. Scott thinks it doubtful whether the partridge is meant, so does Boothroyd. Jarchi thinks it should be the cuckoo; Bochart supposes the woodcock or the snipe is meant. Amid so much diversity of opinion, it is safest to rely on the best recent authorities, who generally agree that the partridge is meant. Its nests are very often robbed of the eggs by men who use them as food; and most likely the text alludes to plundering the nest.

xvii. 13. The phrase "written in the earth" has been illustrated by reference to the Oriental practice of writing upon the ground, or upon sand. They had been at great pains to secure a permanent and conspicuous record of their sins (verse 1), but they themselves would leave no enduring memorial, any more than if their names had been scrawled in the dust. Some change of the translation seems needed to connect verses 12 and 13, and we may render them, "A throne of glory, high from the beginning, the place of our sanctuary, the

ver. 6. Have not I as absolute a power over you in respect both of might and right? Nay, God has a clearer title to a dominion over us than the potter has over the clay, for he only gives it its form, whereas we have both matter and form from God. "As the clay is in the potter's hand" to be moulded and shaped as he pleases, "so are ye in my hand." This intimates, 1. That God has an incontestable sovereignty over us, is not debtor to us, may dispose of us as he thinks fit, and is not accountable to us; and it would be as absurd for us to dispute this as for the clay to quarrel with the potter. 2. That it is a very easy thing with God to make what use he pleaseth of us, and what changes he pleaseth with us, and we cannot resist him. One turn of the hand, one turn of the wheel, quite alters the shape of the clay, makes it a vessel, unmakes it, new makes it. Thus are our times in God's hand, and not in our own, and it is in vain for us to strive with him. It is spoken here of nations; the most politic, the most potent, are what God is pleased to make them, and no other: see this explained by Job, ch. xii. 23, "He increaseth the nations and destroyeth them; he enlargeth the nations, and straiteneth them again;" Ps. cvii. 33, &c.; and compare Job xxxiv. 29, "All nations before God are as the drop of the bucket," soon wiped away; "or the small dust of the balance," soon blown away, Isa. xl. 15, and therefore no doubt as easily managed as the clay by the potter. 3. That God will not be a loser by any, in his glory, at long run; but if he be not glorified by them he will be glorified upon them. If the potter's vessel be marred for one use, it shall serve for another. Those that will not be monuments of mercy shall be monuments of justice; "The Lord has made all things for himself, yea, even the wicked for the day of evil," Pr. xvi. 4. God formed us out of the clay, Job xxxiii. 6. Nay, and we are still as clay in his hands, Isa. lxiv. 8. And has not he the same power over us that the potter has over the clay? Rom. ix. 21. And are not we bound to submit, as the clay, to the potter's wisdom and will? Isa. xxix. 15, 16; xlv. 9.

Secondly. That in the exercise of this authority and ability he always goes by fixed rules of equity and goodness. He dispenseth favours indeed in a way of sovereignty, but never punisheth by arbitrary power. "High is his right hand," yet he rules not with a high hand, but as it follows there, "Justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne," Ps. lxxxix. 13, 14. God asserts his despotic power, and tells us what he might do, but at the same time assures us he will act as a righteous and merciful judge.

1. When God is coming against us in ways of judgment, we may be sure it is for our sins, which shall appear by this, that national repentance will stop the progress of the judgments; ver. 7, 8, "If God speak concerning a nation, to pluck up" its fences that secure it, and so lay it open; its fruit-trees that adorn and enrich it, and so leave it desolate; to pull down its fortifications, that the enemy may have liberty to enter in; its habitations, that the inhabitants may be under a necessity of going out, and so destroy it as either a vineyard or a city is destroyed;—in this case, if that nation take the alarm, and repent of their sins, and reform their lives, turn every one from his evil way, and return to God, God will graciously accept them, will not proceed in his controversy, will return in mercy to them, and, though he cannot change his mind; he will change his way, so that it may be said, he "repents him of the evil he said he would do to them." Thus often, in the time of the judges, when the oppressed people were penitent people, still God raised them up saviours; and when they turned to God their affairs presently took a new turn. It was Nineveh's case, and we wish it had oftener been Jerusalem's: see 2 Chr. vii. 14. It is an undoubted truth, that a sincere conversion from the evil of sin, will be an effectual prevention of the evil of punishment; and God can as easily raise up a penitent people from their ruins, as the potter can make anew the vessel of clay, when it was marred in his hand.

2. When God is coming towards us in ways of mercy, if any stop be given to the progress of that mercy, it is nothing but sin that gives it; ver. 9, 10, "If God speak concerning a nation, to build and to plant it," that is, to advance and establish all the true interests of it, it is his husbandry, and his building, 1 Cor. iii. 9; and if he speak in favour of it, it is done, it is increased, it is enriched, it is enlarged, its trade flourisheth, its government is settled in good hands, and all its affairs prosper, and its enterprises succeed. But if this nation, which God is thus loading with benefits, "do evil in his sight, and obey not his voice;" if it lose its virtue, and become debauched and profane; if religion grow into contempt, and vice get to be fashionable, and so be kept in countenance and reputation, and there be a general decay of serious godliness among them; then God will turn his hand against them, will pluck up what he was planting, and pull down what he was building, ch. xlv. 4. The good work that was in the doing shall stand still, and be let fall; and what favours were farther designed shall be withheld, and this is called his "repenting of the good wherewith he said he would benefit them," as he changed his purpose concerning Eli's house, 1 Sam. ii. 30, and hurried Israel back into the wilderness, when he had brought them within sight of Canaan. Note, Sin is the great mischief-maker between God and a people. It forfeits the benefit of his promises, and spoils the success of their prayers. It defeats his kind intentions concerning them, Hos. vii. 1, and baffles their pleasing expectations from him. It ruins their comforts, prolongs their grievances, brings them into straits, and retards their deliverances, Isa. lix. 1, 2.

11 Now therefore go to, speak to the men of Judah,
And to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, saying,
Thus saith the LORD;
Behold, I frame evil against you,
And devise a device against you:
Return ye now every one from his evil way,
And make your ways and your doings good.
12 And they said, There is no hope:
But we will walk after our own devices,
And we will every one do the imagination of his evil heart.
13 Therefore thus saith the LORD;
Ask ye now among the heathen,
Who hath heard such things:
The virgin of Israel hath done a very horrible thing.
14 Will a man leave the snow of Lebanon which cometh from the rock of the field?
Or shall the cold flowing waters that come from another place be forsaken?
15 Because my people hath forgotten me, they have burned incense to vanity,
And they have caused them to stumble in their ways from the ancient paths,
To walk in paths, in a way not cast up;
16 To make their land desolate, and a perpetual hissing;
Every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished, and wag his head.
17 I will scatter them as with an east wind before the enemy;
I will shew them the back, and not the face, in the day of their calamity.

These verses seem to be the application of the general truths laid down in the foregoing part of the chapter to the nation of the Jews and their present state.

First. God was now speaking concerning them, to pluck up, and to pull down, and to destroy; for it is that part of the rule of judgment that their case agrees with, ver. 11. Go and tell them, saith God, "Behold, I frame evil against you, and devise a device against you." Providence, in all its operations, is plainly working towards your ruin. Look upon your carriage towards God, and you cannot but see that you deserve it; look upon his dealings with you, and you cannot but see that he designs it. He frames evil, as the potter frames the vessel, so as to answer the end.

Secondly. He invites them by repentance and reformation to meet him in the way of his judgments, and so to prevent his farther proceedings against them; "Return ye now every one from his evil ways," that so, according to the rule before laid down, God may turn from the evil he had purposed to do unto you, and that providence, which seemed to have been framed like a vessel on the wheel against you, shall presently be thrown into a new shape, and the issue shall be in favour of you. Note, The warnings of God's word, and the threatenings of his providence, should be improved by us as strong inducements to us to reform our lives; in which it is not enough to turn from our evil ways, but we must make our ways and our doings good, conformable to the rule, to the law.

Thirdly. He foresees their obstinacy, and their perverse refusal to comply with this invitation, though it tended so much to their own benefit; ver. 12, "They said, There is no hope." If we must not be delivered unless we return from our evil ways, we may even despair of ever being delivered, for we are resolved "we will walk after our own devices." It is to no purpose for the prophets to say any more to us, to use any more arguments, or press the matter any farther, we will have our way whatever it costs us; "we will do every one the imagination of his own evil heart," and will not be under the restraint of the Divine law. Note, That which ruins sinners is affecting to live as they list. They call it liberty to live at large, whereas for a man to be a slave to his lusts is the worst of slaveries. See how strangely some men's hearts are hardened by the deceitfulness of sin, that they will not so much as promise amendment; nay, they set the judgments of God at defiance; We will go on with our own devices, and let God go on with his, and we will venture the issue.

Fourthly. He upbraids them with the monstrous folly of their obstinacy, and their hating to be reformed. Surely never were people guilty of such an absurdity, never any that pretended to reason acted so unreasonably; ver. 13, "Ask ye among the heathen," even those that had not the benefit of Divine revelation, no oracles, no prophets, as Judah and Jerusalem had, yet even among them, "Who hath heard such a thing?" The Ninevites, when thus warned, turned from their evil ways. Some of the worst of men, when they are told of their faults, especially when they begin to smart for them, will at least promise reformation, and say they will endeavour to mend. But "the virgin of Israel" bids defiance to repentance, is resolved to go on frowardly, whatever conscience and providence say to the contrary, and thus "hath done a very horrible thing." She should have preserved herself pure and chaste for God, who had espoused her to himself; but she has alienated herself from him, and refuseth to return to him. Note, It is a horrible thing, enough to make one tremble to think of it, that those who have made their condition sad by sinning should make it desperate by refusing to reform. Wilful impenitency is the grossest self-murder, and that is a horrible thing, which we should abhor the thought of. He shews their folly in two things:

1. In the nature of the sin itself that they were guilty of. They forsook God for idols, which was the most horrible thing that could be, for they perfectly put a cheat upon themselves, ver. 14, 15. Will a thirsty traveller leave the snow, that being melted runs down from the mountains of Lebanon, and, passing over the rock of the field, flows in clear, clean, crystal streams; will he leave these, pass these by, and think to mend himself with some dirty puddle water? Or, "shall the cold flowing waters that come from any other place be forsaken" in the heat of summer? No; when men are parched with heat and drought, and meet with cooling, refreshing streams, they will make use of them, and not turn their backs upon them. The margin reads it, 'Will a man that is travelling the road leave my fields, which are plain and level, for a rock that is rough and hard, or for the snow of Lebanon, which, lying in great drifts, makes the road impassable?' 'Or shall the running waters be forsaken for the strange cold water?' No; in these things men know when they are well, and will keep so: they will not leave a certainty for an uncertainty. But "my people hath forgotten me," ver. 15, hath quitted a fountain of living waters for broken cisterns; they have burned incense to idols that are as vain as vanity itself, that are not what they pretend to be, nor can perform what is expected from them. They had not the common wit of travellers, but even their leaders caused them to err, and they were content to be misled. 1st. They left the ancient paths, which were appointed by the Divine law, which had been walked in by all the saints, which was therefore the right way to their journey's end, a safe way, and being well tracked was both easy to hit and easy to walk in. But when they were advised to keep to the good old way they positively said they would not, ch. vi. 16. 2nd. They chose bypaths. They walked in a way not cast up, not in the highway, the king's highway, in which they might travel safely, and which would certainly lead them to their right end, but in a dirty way, a rough way, a way in which they could not but stumble. Such was the way of idolatry, such is the way of all iniquity; it is a false way, it is a way of stumblingblocks, and yet this way they chose to walk in, and lead others in.

2. In the mischievous consequences of it. Though the thing itself had been ill they might have had some excuse for it if they could have promised themselves any good out of it; but the direct tendency of it was "to make their land desolate," and consequently themselves miserable, (for so the inhabitants expectation of Israel, O Lord, all who forsake thee," &c. Dr. Henderson similarly joins the two verses.

xvii. 16. Though it is obscure, the translation of the first clause is intended to mean, "I have not hastily ceased to act as a pastor or shepherd following thee."

xvii. 19. The gate of the children of the people, by which the kings go in and out, will be the chief gate of the city; perhaps that now called the Jaffa gate.

xvii. 26. The burnt-offerings were the animals intended as such; the sacrifices were the sin-offerings; the meat-offerings were what are called unbloody sacrifices, as peace-offerings; sacrifices of praise were thank-offerings. The enumeration of localities from which these should be brought is very exact. "The plain" was the shephelah or low land towards the Mediterranean; "the mountains" was the hilly region of Judah; "the south" was the Negeb or south and south-western part of Palestine.

must needs be if their country be laid waste,) and both themselves and their land "a perpetual hissing." Those deserve to be hissed that have fair warning given them and will not take it. "Every one that passeth by" their land shall make his remarks upon it, and "shall be astonished and wag his head," some admiring, others commiserating, others triumphing in the desolations of a country that had been the glory of all lands. They shall wag their heads in derision, upbraiding them with their folly in forsaking God and their duty, and so pulling this misery upon their own heads. Note, Those that revolt from God will justly be made the scorn of all about them; and having reproached the Lord will themselves be a reproach. Their land being made desolate in pursuance of their destruction, it is threatened, ver. 17, "I will scatter them as with an east wind," which is fierce and violent, by it they shall be hurried to and fro before the enemy, and find no way open to escape. They shall not only flee before the enemy,—that they may do, and yet make an orderly retreat,—but they shall be scattered, some one way and some another. And that which completes their misery is, "I will shew them the back, and not the face in the day of their calamity." Our calamities may be easily borne if God look towards us, and smile upon us when we are under them, if he countenance us and shew us favour. But if he turn the back upon us, if he shew himself displeased, if he be deaf to our prayers, and refuse us his help, if he forsake us, leave us to ourselves, and stand at a distance from us, we are quite undone. "If he hide his face, who then can behold him?" Job xxxiv. 29. Herein God would deal with them as they had dealt with him, ch. ii. 27; "They have turned their back unto me, and not their face." It is a righteous thing with God to shew himself strange to those in the day of their trouble who have shewed themselves rude and undutiful to him in their prosperity. This will have its full accomplishment in that day, when God will say to those that, though they have been professors of piety, yet were workers of iniquity, "Depart from me, I know you not, nay, I never knew you."

18 Then said they,
Come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah;
For the law shall not perish from the priest,
Nor counsel from the wise,
Nor the word from the prophet
Come, and let us smite him with the tongue,
And let us not give heed to any of his words.
19 Give heed to me, O LORD,
And hearken to the voice of them that contend with me.
20 Shall evil be recompensed for good?
For they have digged a pit for my soul.
Remember that I stood before thee to speak good for them,
And to turn away thy wrath from them.
21 Therefore deliver up their children to the famine,
And pour out their blood by the force of the sword;
And let their wives be bereaved of their children, and be
And let their men be put to death; [widows;
Let their young men be slain by the sword in battle.
22 Let a cry be heard from their houses,
When thou shalt bring a troop suddenly upon them:
For they have digged a pit to take me,
And hid snares for my feet.
23 Yet, LORD, thou knowest all their counsel against me to Forgive not their iniquity, [slay me:
Neither blot out their sin from thy sight,
But let them be overthrown before thee;
Deal thus with them in the time of thine anger.

The prophet here, as sometimes before, brings in his own affairs, but very much for instruction to us.

First. See here what are the common methods of the persecutors. We may see this in Jeremiah's enemies, ver. 18.

1. They laid their heads together, to consult what they should do against him, both to be revenged on him for what he had said and to stop his mouth for the future. "They said, Come, and let us devise devices against Jeremiah." The enemies of God's people and ministers have been often very crafty themselves, and confederate with one another to do them mischief. What they cannot act to the prejudice of religion separately they will try to do in concert. "The wicked plotteth against the just." Caiaphas, and the chief priests and elders, did so against our blessed Saviour himself. The opposition which the gates of hell give to the kingdom of heaven is carried on with a great deal of cursed policy. God had said, ver. 11, "I devise a device against you;" and now, as if they resolved to be quits with him, and to outwit Infinite Wisdom itself, they resolve to devise devices against God's prophet, not only against his person, but against the word he delivered to them, which they thought, by their subtle management, to defeat. O the prodigious madness of those that hope to disannul God's counsel!

2. Herein they pretended a mighty zeal for the church, which they suggested was in danger if Jeremiah was tolerated to preach as he did. "Come," say they, let us silence and crush him, for "the law shall not perish from the priest;" the law of truth is in their mouths, Mal. ii. 6, and there we will seek it; the administration of ordinances according to the law is in their hands, and neither the one nor the other shall be wrested from them. "Counsel shall not perish from the wise;" the administration of public affairs shall always be lodged with the privy counsellors, and ministers of state, to whom it belongs. Nor shall the word perish from the prophets; they mean those of their own choosing, that prophesied to them smooth things, and flattered them with visions of peace. Two things they insinuated: 1st. That Jeremiah could not be himself a true prophet, but was a pretender, and an usurper; because he was neither commissioned by the priests nor concurred with the other prophets, whose authority therefore will be despised if he be suffered to go on. If Jeremiah be regarded as an oracle, farewell the reputation of our priests, our wise men, and prophets; but that must be supported, which is reason enough why he must be suppressed. 2nd. That the matter of his prophecies could not be from God, because it reflected sometimes upon the prophets and priests. He charged them with being the ringleaders of all the mischief, ch. v. 31; and deceiving the people, ch. xiv. 14; he had foretold that their heart should perish, and be astonished, ch. iv. 9; that "the wise men should be dismayed," ch. viii. 9, 10; that the priests and prophets should be intoxicated, ch. xiii. 13. Now this galled them more than anything else. Presuming upon the promise of God's presence with their priests and prophets, they could not believe he would ever leave them. The guides of the church must needs be infallible, and therefore he who foretold their being infatuated must be condemned as a false prophet. Thus, under colour of zeal for the church, have its best friends been run down.

3. They agreed to do all they could do to blast his reputation; "Come, let us smite him with the tongue," put him into an ill name, fasten an ill character upon him, represent him to some as despicable, and fit to be slighted; to others as dangerous, and fit to be prosecuted; to all as odious, and not fit to be tolerated. This was their device, fortiter calumniari, aliquid adhærebit,—'to throw the vilest calumnies at him, in hopes that some would stick;' to dress him up in bears' skins, otherwise they could not bait him. They who projected this, it is likely, were men of figure, whose tongue was no small slander, whose representations, though never so false, would be credited both by princes and people, to make him obnoxious to the justice of the one, and fury of the other. The scourge of such tongues will give not only smart lashes, but deep wounds; it is a great mercy therefore to be hid from it, Job v. 21.

4. To set others an example, they resolved they would not themselves regard any thing he said, though it appeared never so weighty, and never so well confirmed as a message from God; "Let us not give heed to any of his words;" for, right or wrong, they will look upon them to be his words, and not the words of God. What good can be done with those who hear the word of God with a resolution not to heed it or believe it? Nay,

5. That they may effectually silence him, they resolve to be the death of him; ver. 23, "All their counsel against me is to slay me." They hunt for the precious life; and a precious life indeed it was that they hunted for. Long was this Jerusalem's wretched character, Thou that killedst many of the prophets, and wouldest have killed them all.

Secondly. See here what is the common relief of the persecuted. This we may see in the course that Jeremiah took when he met with this hard usage; he presently applied himself to his God by prayer, and so gave himself ease.

1. He referred himself and his cause to God's cognizance, ver. 19. They would not regard a word he said, would not admit his complaints, or take any notice of his grievances, but "Lord," saith he, "do thou give heed to me." It is matter of comfort to faithful ministers that, if men will not give heed to their preaching, yet God will give heed to their praying. He appeals to God as an impartial judge that will hear both sides, as every judge ought to do. Do not only give heed to me, but "hearken to the voice of them that contend with me," hear what they have to say against me, and for themselves, and then make it to appear that thou sittest in the throne judging right. "Hear the voice of my contenders," how noisy and clamorous they are, how false and malicious all they say is, and let them be "judged out of their own mouth; cause their own tongues to fall upon them."

2. He complains of their base ingratitude to him; ver. 20, "Shall evil be recompensed for good?" And shall it go unpunished? Wilt not thou recompense me good for that evil? 2 Sam. xvi. 12. To render good for good is human, evil for evil is brutish, good for evil is Christian, but evil for good is devilish. It is so very absurd and wicked a thing that we cannot think but God will avenge it. See how great the evil was they did against him; they digged a pit for his soul; they aimed to take away his life, no less would satisfy them, and that not in a generous way, by an open assault, against which he might have an opportunity of defending himself, but in a base cowardly clandestine way they digged pits for him, which there was no fence against, Ps. cxix. 85. But see how great the good was which he had done for them; "Remember that I stood before thee to speak good for them." He had been an intercessor with God for them, had used his interest in heaven on their behalf, which was the greatest kindness they could expect from one of his character; Gen. xx. 7, "He is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee." This Moses often did for Israel, and yet they quarrelled with him, and sometimes spoke of stoning him. He did them this kindness when they were in imminent danger of destruction, and most needed it. They had themselves provoked God's wrath against them, and it was ready to break in upon them, but he stood in the gap, as Moses, Ps. cvi. 23, and turned away that wrath. Now, 1st. This was very base in them. Call a man ungrateful, and you can call him no worse. But it was not strange that they who had forgotten their God did not know their best friends. 2nd. It was very grievous to him, as the like was to David, Ps. xxxv. 13; cix. 4, "For my love they are my adversaries." And thus disingenuously do sinners deal with the great Intercessor, crucifying him afresh, and speaking against him on earth, while his blood is speaking for them in heaven: see Jno. x. 32. But, 3rd. It was a comfort to the prophet that, when they were so spiteful against him, he had the testimony of his conscience for him, that he had done his duty to them; and the same will be our rejoicing in such a day of evil. "The bloodthirsty hate the upright, but the just seek his soul," Pr. xxix. 10.

3. He imprecates the judgments of God upon them, not from a revengeful disposition, but in a prophetical indignation against their horrid wickedness, ver. 21—23. He prays, 1st. That their families might be starved for want of bread; "Deliver up the children to the famine," to the famine in the country for want of rain, and that in the city through the straitness of the siege. Thus let this iniquity of the fathers be visited upon the children. 2nd. That they might be cut off by the sword of war, which, whatever it was in the enemies' hand, would be in God's hand a sword of justice. 'Pour them out,' so the word is, 'by the hands of the sword,' let their blood be shed as profusely as water, "that their wives may be left childless and widows, their husbands being taken away by death," or, as some understand it, by the pestilence. Let "their young men," that are the strength of this generation, and the hopes of the next, "be slain by the sword in battle." 3rd. That the terrors and desolations of war might seize them suddenly, and by surprise, that thus their punishment might answer their sin; ver. 22, "Let a cry be heard from their houses," loud shrieks, "when thou shalt bring a troop of the Chaldeans suddenly upon them," to seize them and all they have, to make them prisoners, and their estates a prey; for thus they would have done by Jeremiah. They aimed to ruin him at once, ere he was aware; "They have digged a pit for me," as for a wild beast, and have hid snares for me as for some ravenous, noxious fowl. Note, They that think to ensnare others will justly be themselves ensnared in an evil time. 4th. That they may be dealt with according to the desert of this sin, which was without excuse; "Forgive not their iniquity, neither blot out their sin from thy sight;" that is, let them not escape the just punishment of it. Let them lie under all the miseries of those whose sins are unpardoned. 5th. That God's wrath against them might be their ruin; "Let xviii. 2—4. These verses clearly show that the potter's wheel was known among the Jews in Jeremiah's time. It is true that the word for "wheels" literally means "stones," but that is probably because the flat circular wheels of the potter were made of stone. There are in the Egyptian monuments representations which illustrate this passage. Rude earthen vessels are found at Jerusalem at a great depth below the surface; and the extent to which the manufacture was carried may be inferred from the fact that a place near the city was called the Potter's Field. Adam Clarke observes that the potter's wheel of to-day differs little from what it was three thousand years ago.

xviii. 14. Instead of the translation in the text, the marginal rendering is, "Will a man leave my fields for a rock, or for the snow of Lebanon? shall the running waters be forsaken for the strange cold waters?" Henderson's version is, "Shall the snow of Lebanon cease from the rock in the field? shall the compressed, cold-flowing them be overthrown before thee." This intimates that justice is in pursuit of them, that they endeavour to make escape from it, but in vain; they shall be made to stumble in their flight, and being overthrown they will certainly be overtaken. And then, Lord, in the time of thine anger do to them, (he doth not say what he would have done to them, but) do to them as thou thinkest fit, as thou usest to do with those whom thou art angry with; "Deal thus with them."

Now this is not written for our imitation. Jeremiah was a prophet, and by the impulse of the spirit of prophecy, in the foresight of the ruin certainly coming upon his persecutors, might pray such prayers as we may not; and if we think by his example to justify ourselves in such imprecations we know not what manner of spirit we are of. Our Master has taught us by his precept and pattern to bless them that curse us, and pray for them that despitefully use us; yet it is written for our instruction, and is of use to teach us, 1. That those who have forfeited the benefit of the prayers of God's prophets for them, may justly expect to have their prayers against them. 2. That persecution is a sin that fills the measure of a people's iniquity very fast, and will bring as sure and sore a destruction upon them as any other. 3. Those that will not be won upon by the kindness of God and his prophets will certainly at length feel the just resentments of both.

CHAPTER XIX.

The same melancholy theme is the subject of this chapter that was of those foregoing; the approaching ruin of Judah and Jerusalem for their sins: this Jeremiah had often foretold; here he has particularly full orders to do it again. I. He must set their sins in order before them, as he had often done, especially their idolatry, ver. 4, 5. II. He must describe the particular judgments which were now coming apace upon them for these sins, ver. 6—9. III. He must do this in the valley of Tophet, with great solemnity, and for some particular reasons, ver. 2, 3. IV. He must summon a company of the elders together to be witnesses of this, ver. 1. V. He must confirm this, and endeavour to affect his hearers with it, by a sign, which was the breaking of an earthen bottle, signifying that they should be dashed to pieces like a potter's vessel, ver. 10—13. VI. When he had done this in the valley of Tophet, he ratified it in the court of the temple, ver. 14, 15. Thus were all likely means tried to awaken this stupid senseless people to repentance, that their ruin might be prevented, but all in vain.

THUS saith the LORD, Go and get a potter's earthen bottle, and take of the ancients of the people, and of the ancients of the priests; 2 And go forth unto the valley of the son of Hinnom, which is by the entry of the east gate, and proclaim there the words that I shall tell thee, 3 And say, Hear ye the word of the LORD, O kings of Judah, and inhabitants of Jerusalem; Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring evil upon this place, the which whosoever heareth, his ears shall tingle. 4 Because they have forsaken me, and have estranged this place, and have burned incense in it unto other gods, whom neither they nor their fathers have known, nor the kings of Judah, and have filled this place with the blood of innocents; 5 They have built also the high places of Baal, to burn their sons with fire for burnt offerings unto Baal, which I commanded not, nor spake it, neither came it into my mind: 6 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD, that this place shall no more be called Tophet, nor The valley of the son of Hinnom, but The valley of slaughter. 7 And I will make void the counsel of Judah and Jerusalem in this place; and I will cause them to fall by the sword before their enemies, and by the hands of them that seek their lives: and their carcases will I give to be meat for the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth. 8 And I will make this city desolate, and an hissing; every one that passeth thereby shall be astonished and hiss because of all the plagues thereof. 9 And I will cause them to eat the flesh of their sons and the flesh of their daughters, and they shall eat every one the flesh of his friend in the siege and straitness, wherewith their enemies, and they that seek their lives, shall straiten them.

HUMAN SACRIFICE—FROM AN ETRUSCAN TOMB.—ver. 5.

The corruption of man having made it necessary that precept should be upon precept, and line upon line, so unapt are we to receive, and so very apt to let slip, the things of God, the grace of God has provided that there shall be accordingly precept upon precept, and line upon line; that those who are irreclaimable may be inexcusable. For this reason the prophet here is sent with a message to the same purpose with what he had often delivered, but with some circumstances that might make it the more taken notice of, a thing which ministers should study, for a little circumstance may sometimes be a great advantage, and they that would win souls must be wise.

First. He must take of the elders and chief men, both in church and state, to be his auditors and witnesses to what he said. "The ancients of the people, and the ancients of the priests," the most eminent men, both in the magistracy and in the ministry, that they might be faithful witnesses to record, as those, Isa. viii. 2. It is strange that these great men would be at the beck of a poor prophet, and obey his summons to attend him out of the city, they knew not whither, and they knew not why. But though the generality of the elders were disaffected to him, yet it is likely there were some few among them who looked upon him as a prophet of the Lord, and would pay this respect to the heavenly vision. Note, Persons of rank and figure have an opportunity of honouring God, by a diligent attendance on the ministry of the word and other Divine institutions, and they ought to think it an honour, and no disparagement to themselves, yea, though the circumstances be mean and despicable. It is certain the greatest of men are less than the least of the ordinances of God.

Secondly. He must go to the valley of the son of Hinnom, and deliver this message there; for the word of the Lord is not bound to any one place. As good a sermon may be preached in the valley of Tophet, as in the gate of the temple. Christ preached on a mountain, and out of a ship. This valley lay partly on the south side of Jerusalem; but the prophet's way to it was "by the entry of the east gate," ver. 2. The sun gate, so some render it, and suppose it to look not towards the sunrising, but the noon sun; the potter's gate, so some. This sermon must be preached in that place, in the valley of the son of Hinnom, 1. Because there they had been guilty of the vilest of their idolatries, the sacrificing of their children to Moloch, a horrid piece of impiety, which the sight of the place might serve to mind them of, and upbraid them with. 2. Because there they should feel the sorest of their calamities. There the greatest slaughter should be made among them; and, it being the common sink of the city, let them look upon it, and see what a miserable spectacle this magnificent city should be, when it should be all like the valley of Tophet. God bids him go thither, "and proclaim there the words that I shall tell thee" when thou comest thither; whereby it appears (as Mr. Gataker well observes) that God's messages many times were not revealed to the prophets before the very instant of time wherein they were to deliver them.

Thirdly. He must give general notice of a general ruin now shortly coming upon Judah and Jerusalem, ver. 3. He must, as those that make proclamation, begin with an 'Oyez,' "Hear ye the word of the Lord," though it be a terrible word, for you may thank yourselves if it be so. Both rulers and ruled must attend to it at their peril. The kings of Judah, that is, the king and his sons, the king and his princes and privy counsellors, they must hear the word of the King of kings, for, as high as they are, he is above them. The inhabitants of Jerusalem also must hear what God hath to say to them. Both princes and people have contributed to the national guilt, and must concur in the national repentance, or they will both share in the national ruin. Let them all know that the Lord of hosts, who is therefore able to do what he threatens, though he is the God of Israel; nay, because he is so, will therefore punish them in the first place for their iniquities, Am. iii. 2; he "will bring evil upon this place," that is, upon Judah and Jerusalem, so surprising and so dreadful, that whosoever hears it his ears shall tingle, hears the prediction of it, hears the report and representation of it; it shall make such an impression of terror upon him, that he shall still think he hears it sounding in his ears, and shall not be able to get it out of his mind. The ruin of Eli's house is thus described, 1 Sam. iii. 11; and of Jerusalem, 2 Kin. xxi. 12.

Fourthly. He must plainly tell them what their sins were for which God had this controversy with them, ver. 4, 5. Apostacy from God; "They have forsaken me." Abuse of the privileges of the visible church with which they had been dignified; they "have estranged this place." Jerusalem the holy city, the temple, the holy house, which were designed for the honour of God, and the support of his kingdom among men, they had alienated from those purposes, and (as some render the word) they had strangely abused. They had so polluted both with their wickedness that God had disowned both, and abandoned them to ruin. He chargeth them with an affection for, and the adoration of, false gods, such as "neither they nor their fathers have known," such as never had recommended themselves to their belief and esteem, by water be dried up?" Boothroyd has, "Will one leave the snow of Lebanon for the rock of the field? will men desert cool streams for strange waters?" Lowth suggests, "Shall one leave the moisture of the field (for) the snow-water of Lebanon? or shall the running waters be forsaken for the muddy waters?" The passage is very difficult, but the true sense seems to amount to this, that the snow will not forsake the rocky expanse of Lebanon, and that the cold running water will not turn from its course. The next verse shows how Israel had been perverse and faithless, to impress which idea this implied comparison is introduced. Of the translations given above, we have no hesitation in saying that Dr. Henderson's comes nearest to the prophet's meaning, and we add part of his note: "The idea conveyed by the passage is the constancy of the course of nature, with which is finely contrasted the inconstancy of the Jews, who, instead of faithfully cleaving to Jehovah as their covenant God, had forgotten his claims, departed from his service, and abandoned any acts of power or goodness done for them or their ancestors, as that God had abundantly done whom they forsook, yet they took them at a venture for their gods. Nay, being fond of change and novelty, they liked them the better for their being upstarts; and new fashions in religion were as graceful to their fancies as in other things. They also stand charged with murder, wilful murder, from malice prepense; They "have filled this place with the blood of innocents." It was Manasseh's sin, 2 Kin. xxiv. 4, "which the Lord would not pardon;" nay, as if idolatry and murder committed separately were not bad enough, and affront enough to God and man, they have put them together, have consolidated them into one complicated crime, that of burning their children in the fire to Baal, ver. 5; which was the most insolent defiance to all the laws both of natural and revealed religion that ever mankind was guilty of; and by it they openly declared, they loved their new gods better than ever they loved the true God, though they were such cruel taskmasters, that they required human sacrifices, inhuman I should call them, which the Lord Jehovah, whose all lives and souls are, never demanded from his worshippers, never spake of such a thing, nor came it into his mind: see ch. vii. 31.

Fifthly. He must endeavour to affect them with the greatness of the desolation that was coming upon them. He must tell them, as he had done before, ch. vii. 32, that this "valley of the son of Hinnom" shall acquire a new name, "the valley of slaughter," ver. 6; for, ver. 7, multitudes shall fall there by the sword, when either they sally out upon the besiegers and are repulsed, or attempt to make their escape and are seized. They shall fall before their enemies, who not only endeavour to make themselves masters of their houses and estates, but have such an implacable enmity to them that they seek their lives. They thirst after their blood, and when they are dead will not allow a cartel for the burying of the slain; but their carcases shall "be meat for the fowls of the heaven, and for the beasts of the earth." What a dismal place will the valley of Tophet be then! and as for those that remain within the city, and will not capitulate with the besiegers, they shall perish for want of food, when first they have eaten the flesh of their sons and daughters, and dearest friends, through the straitness wherewith their enemies shall straiten them, ver. 9. This was threatened in the law, as an instance of the extremity to which the judgments of God should reduce them, Lev. xxvi. 29; Deu. xxviii. 23; and was accomplished, Lam. iv. 10. And lastly, the whole city shall be desolate, the houses laid in ashes, the inhabitants slain, or taken prisoners; there shall be no resort to it, nor any thing in it but what looks rueful and horrid; so "that every one that passeth by shall be astonished," ver. 8; as he had said before, ch. xviii. 16. That place which holiness had made the joy of the whole earth, sin had made the reproach and shame of the whole earth.

Sixthly. He must assure them, that all their attempts to prevent and avoid this ruin, so long as they continued impenitent and unreformed, would be fruitless and vain; ver. 7, "I will make void the counsel of Judah and Jerusalem," that is, of the princes and senators of Judah and Jerusalem, "in this place," in the royal palace which lay on the south side of the city, not far from the place where the prophet now stood. Note, There is no fleeing from God's justice but by fleeing to his mercy. They that will not make good God's counsel, by humbling themselves under his mighty hand, God will make void their counsel, and blast their projects, which they think never so well concerted for their own preservation. There is no counsel or strength against the Lord.

10 Then shalt thou break the bottle in the sight of the men that go with thee, 11 And shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Even so will I break this people and this city, as one breaketh a potter's vessel, that cannot be made whole again: and they shall bury them in Tophet, till there be no place to bury. 12 Thus will I do unto this place, saith the LORD, and to the inhabitants thereof, and even make this city as Tophet: 13 And the houses of Jerusalem, and the houses of the kings of Judah, shall be defiled as the place of Tophet, because of all the houses upon whose roofs they have burned incense unto all the host of heaven, and have poured out drink offerings unto other gods. 14 Then came Jeremiah from Tophet, whither the LORD had sent him to prophesy; and he stood in the court of the LORD's house; and said to all the people, 15 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring upon this city and upon all her towns all the evil that I have pronounced against it, because they have hardened their necks, that they might not hear my words.

The message of wrath delivered in the foregoing verses is here enforced, that it might gain credit two ways:

First. By a visible sign. The prophet was to take along with him an earthen bottle, ver. 1; and when he had delivered his message, he was to break the bottle to pieces, ver. 10; and the same that were auditors of the sermon must be spectators of the sign. He compared this people in the chapter before to the potter's clay, which is easily marred in the making; but some might say, It is passed that with us, we have been made and hardened long since. And what though you be, saith he; the potter's vessel is as soon broken in the hand of any man as the vessel while it is soft clay is marred in the potter's hand; and its case in this respect much worse, that the vessel while it is soft clay, though it be marred, may be moulded again; but, after it is hardened, when it is broken, it can never be pieced again. Perhaps what they see will affect them more than what they only hear talk of; that is the intention of sacramental signs, and teaching by symbols was anciently used. In the explication of this sign, he must inculcate what he had before said, with a farther reference to the place where this was done, in the valley of Tophet.

1. As the bottle was easily, irresistibly, and irrecoverably broken, so shall Judah and Jerusalem be broken by the Chaldean army, ver. 11. They depended much upon the firmness of their constitution, and fixedness of their courage, which they thought hardened them like a vessel of brass; but the prophet shews all that did but harden them like a vessel of earth, which, though hard, is brittle, and sooner broken than that which is not so hard. Though they were made vessels of honour, still they were vessels of earth; and so they shall be made to know, if they dishonour God and themselves, and serve not the purposes for which they were made. It is God himself, who made them, that resolves to unmake them; "I will break this people, and this city," dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel, the doom of the heathen, Ps. ii. 9; Rev. ii. 27; but now Jerusalem's doom, Isa. xxx. 14. A potter's vessel, when once broken, "cannot be made whole again," cannot be cured, so the word is. The ruin of Jerusalem shall be an utter ruin; no hand can repair it but his that broke it; and if they return to him, though he has torn, he will heal.

2. This was done in Tophet, to signify two things: 1st. That Tophet should be the receptacle of the slain; 'They shall bury in Tophet, for want of room to bury elsewhere;' so some read it; and if they had had conveniences any where else, they would not have buried there, where all the filth of the city was carried. Or, as we read it, "They shall bury in Tophet, till there be no place to bury" any more there. They shall jostle for room to lay their dead; and a very little room will then serve those who, while they lived, laid house to house, and field to field. They that would be placed alone in the midst of the earth, while they were above ground, and obliged all about them to keep their distance, must lie with the multitude when they are under ground, for there are innumerable before them. 2nd. That Tophet should be a resemblance of the whole city; ver. 12, "I will make this city as Tophet." As they had filled the valley of Tophet with the slain, which they sacrificed to their idols; so God will fill the whole city with the slain, that shall fall as sacrifices to the justice of God. We read, 2 Kin. xxiii. 19, of Josiah's defiling Tophet, because it had been abused to idolatry; which he did, as should seem, ver. 14, by filling it with the bones of men; and, whatever it was before, from thenceforward it was looked upon as a detestable place. Dead carcases and other filth of the city was carried thither, and a fire continually kept there for the burning of it. This was the posture of that valley, when Jeremiah was sent thither to prophesy; and so execrable a place was it looked upon to be that, in the language of our Saviour's time, hell was called in allusion to it, Gehenna, the valley of Hinnom. Now, saith God, since that blessed reformation, when Tophet was defiled, did not proceed as it ought to have done, nor prove a thorough reformation; but, though the idols in Tophet were abolished and made odious, those in Jerusalem remained; therefore will I do with the city as Josiah did by Tophet, fill it with the bodies of men, and make it a heap of rubbish. Even the houses of Jerusalem, and those of the kings of Judah, the royal palaces not excepted, shall be defiled as the place of Tophet, ver. 13; and for the same reason, because of the idolatries that have been committed there. Since they will not defile them by a reformation, God will defile them by a destruction, because upon "the roofs of their houses they have burnt incense unto the host of heaven." The flat roofs of their houses were sometimes used by devout people as convenient places for prayer, Acts x. 9; and by idolaters they were used as high places, on which they sacrificed to strange gods, especially to the host of heaven,—the sun, moon, and stars, that there they might be so much nearer to them, and have a clearer and fuller view of them. We read of those that "worshipped the host of heaven upon the housetops," Zep. i. 5; and of "altars on the top of the upper chamber of Ahaz," 2 Kin. xxiii. 12. This sin upon the housetops brought a curse into the house, which consumed it, and made it a dunghill like Tophet.

Secondly. By a solemn recognition and ratification of what he had said, "in the court of the Lord's house," ver. 14, 15. The prophet returned from Tophet to the temple, which stood upon the hill over that valley, and there confirmed, and probably repeated, what he had said in the valley of Tophet, for the benefit of those who had heard it. What he had said he would stand to. Here, as often before, he both assures them of judgments coming upon them, and assigns the cause of them, which was their sin. Both these are here put together in a little compass, with a reference to all that had gone before. 1. The accomplishment of the prophecies is here the judgment threatened. The people flattered themselves with a conceit, that God would be better than his word, the threatening was but to frighten them, and keep them in awe a little; but the prophet tells them, they deceive themselves if they think so; for "thus saith the Lord of hosts," that is able to make his words good, "I will bring upon this city, and upon all her towns," all the lesser cities that belong to Jerusalem the metropolis, "all the evil that I have pronounced against it." Note, Whatever men may think to the contrary, the executions of providence will fully answer the predictions of the word; and God will appear as terrible against sin and sinners, as the Scripture makes him; nor shall the unbelief of men make either his promise or his threatening of none effect, or of less effect than it was thought to be of. 2. The contempt of the prophecies is here the sin charged upon them, as the procuring cause of this judgment. It is "because they have hardened their necks," and would not bow and bend them to the yoke of God's commands, would "not hear my words," that he would not heed them, and yield obedience to them. Note, The obstinacy of sinners in their sinful ways is altogether long of themselves. If their necks are hardened, it is their own act and deed, they have hardened them; if they are deaf to the word of God, it is because they have stopped their own ear. We have need therefore to pray, that God by his grace would deliver us 'from hardness of heart, and contempt of his word and commandment.'

CHAPTER XX.

plain dealing, as Jeremiah used in the foregoing chapter, one might easily foresee, if it did not convince and humble men, it would provoke and exasperate them; and so it did, for here we find, I. Jeremiah persecuted by Pashur, for preaching that sermon, ver. 1, 2. II. Pashur threatened for so doing, and the word which Jeremiah had preached confirmed, ver. 3—6. III. Jeremiah complaining to God concerning it, and the other instances of hard measure that he had since he began to be a prophet; and the grievous temptations he had struggled with, ver. 7—10; encouraging himself in God, lodging his appeal with him, not doubting but that he shall yet praise him by which it appears he had much grace, ver. 11—13; and yet peevishly cursing the day of his birth, ver. 14—18; by which it appears he had sad remainders of corruption in him too, and was a man subject to like passions as we are.

NOW Pashur the son of Immer the priest, who was also chief governor in the house of the LORD, heard that Jeremiah prophesied these things. 2 Then Pashur smote Jeremiah the prophet, and themselves to the worship of idols." Thus regarded, all is simple and natural.

xviii. 18. For "smite him with the tongue" Adam Clarke says we should render "on the tongue," because lying and false witness are still punished in Eastern countries by smiting the culprit on the mouth with a piece of leather, or by piercing the tongue. Others have proposed a similar explanation, and the Hebrew is capable of being translated in both ways.

xix. 1, 2. "Elders" would be better here than ancients, because most likely members of the Sanhedrim are meant, "lay and clerical," as we might express it. The valley of the son of Hinnom was close to the walls of Jerusalem. For "east gate" Boothroyd has "the gate Harsith," in which he follows several old versions. Our translators supposed it might mean "the sun gate;" but others, with more reason, explain it "pottery gate" or gate of potsherds. So far from being on the east, it was on the south of Jerusalem.

put him in the stocks that were in the high gate of Benjamin, which was by the house of the LORD. 3 And it came to pass on the morrow, that Pashur brought forth Jeremiah out of the stocks. Then said Jeremiah unto him, The LORD hath not called thy name Pashur, but Magor-missabib. 4 For thus saith the LORD, Behold, I will make thee a terror to thyself, and to all thy friends: and they shall fall by the sword of their enemies, and thine eyes shall behold it: and I will give all Judah into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall carry them captive into Babylon, and shall slay them with the sword. 5 Moreover I will deliver all the strength of this city, and all the labours thereof, and all the precious things thereof, and all the treasures of the kings of Judah will I give into the hand of their enemies, which shall spoil them, and take them, and carry them to Babylon. 6 And thou, Pashur, and all that dwell in thine house shall go into captivity: and thou shalt come to Babylon, and there thou shalt die, and shalt be buried there, thou, and all thy friends, to whom thou hast prophesied lies.

Here is, First. Pashur's unjust displeasure against Jeremiah, and the fruits of that displeasure, ver. 1, 2. This Pashur was a priest, and therefore one would think should have protected Jeremiah, who was of his own order, a priest too, and the more because he was a prophet of the Lord, whose interests the priests his ministers ought to consult. But this priest was a persecutor of him whom he should have patronised. He was the son of Immer; that is, he was of the sixteenth course of the priests, of which Immer, when these courses were first settled by David, was father, 1 Chr. xxiv. 14; as Zechariah was of the order of Abiah, Lu. i. 5. Thus this Pashur is distinguished from another of the same name, mentioned ch. xxi. 4, that was of the fifth course. This Pashur was chief governor in the temple; perhaps he was only so pro tempore,—'for a short period,' the course he was head of being now in waiting; or, he was suffragan to the high priest; or, perhaps captain of the temple, or of the guards about it, Acts iv. 1. This was Jeremiah's great enemy. The greatest malignity to God's prophets was found among those that professed sanctity, and concern for God and the church.

We cannot suppose that Pashur was any of those ancients of the priests that went with Jeremiah to the valley of Tophet, to hear him prophesy, unless it were with a malicious design to take advantage against him. But when he came into the courts of the Lord's house, it is probable he was himself a witness of what he said; and so it may be read, ver. 1, 'He heard Jeremiah prophesying these things.' As we read it, the information was brought him by others, whose examinations he took; he "heard that Jeremiah prophesied these things," and could not bear it; especially that he should dare to preach in the courts of the Lord's house, where he was chief governor, without his leave. When power in the church is abused, it is the most dangerous power of all other against it. Being incensed at Jeremiah, 1. He smote him, struck him with his hand, or staff of authority. Perhaps it was a blow intended only to disgrace him, like that which the high priest ordered to be given Paul, Acts xxiii. 2. He struck him on the mouth, and bade him hold his prating. Or, perhaps he gave him many blows, intended to hurt him; he beat him soundly, as a malefactor. It is charged upon the husbandmen, Mat. xxi. 35, that they beat the servants. The method of proceeding here was illegal. The high priest and the rest of the priests ought to have been consulted, Jeremiah's credentials examined, and the matter inquired into, whether he had an authority to say what he said. But these rules of justice are set aside, and despised as mere formalities: right or wrong Jeremiah must be run down. The enemies of piety would never suffer themselves to be bound by the laws of equity. 2. He "put him in the stocks." Some make it only a place of confinement; he imprisoned him. It rather seems to be an instrument of closer restraint than so, and intended to put him both to pain and shame. Some think it was a pillory for his neck and arms; others, as we, a pair of stocks for his legs. Whatever engine it was, he continued in it all night, and in a public place too, 'in the high gate of Benjamin, which was' in or 'by the house of the Lord;' probably a gate through which they passed between the city and the temple. Pashur intended thus to chastise him, that he might deter him from prophesying; and thus to expose him to contempt, and render him odious, that he might not be regarded if he did prophesy. Thus have the best men met with the worst treatment from this ungracious, ungrateful world; and the greatest blessings of their age have been counted as the offscouring of all things. Would it not raise a pious indignation to see such a man as Pashur upon the bench, and such a man as Jeremiah in the stocks? It is well there is another life after this, when persons and things will appear with another face.

Secondly. God's just displeasure against Pashur, and the tokens of that. On the morrow Pashur gave Jeremiah his discharge, brought him out of the stocks, ver. 3; it is likely he continued him there, in little-ease, as long as was usual to continue any in that punishment; and now Jeremiah has a message from God to him. We do not find that when he put him into the stocks he gave him any check for what he did, but quietly and silently submitted to the abuse; "when he suffered, he threatened not;" but when he brought him out of the stocks, then God put a word into the prophet's mouth, which would awaken his conscience, if he had any. For when the prophet of the Lord was bound the word of the Lord was not. What can we think Pashur aimed at in smiting and abusing Jeremiah? Whatever it is, we shall see, by what God saith to him, he is disappointed.

1. Did he aim to establish himself, and make himself easy, by silencing one that told him of his faults, and would be likely to lessen his reputation with the people? He shall not gain this point; for, 1st. Though the prophet should be silent, his own conscience shall fly in his face, and make him always uneasy. To confirm this he shall have a name given him, "Magor-missabib,"—'Terror round about,' or 'Fear on every side.' God himself shall give him this name, whose calling him so will make him so. It seems to be a proverbial expression, bespeaking a man not only in distress but in despair; not only in danger on every side, (that a man may be, and yet by faith may be in no terror, as David, Ps. iii. 6, xxvii. 3,) but in fear on every side; and that a man may be when there appears no danger. "The wicked flee when no man pursues," are in great fear where no fear is. This shall be Pashur's case; ver. 4, "Behold, I will make thee a terror to thyself;" that is, thou shalt be subject to continual frights, and thy own fancy and imagination shall create thee a constant uneasiness. Note, God can make the most daring sinner a terror to himself; and will find out a way to frighten those that frighten his people from doing their duty. And those that will not hear of their faults from God's prophets, that are reprovers in the gate, shall be made to hear of them from conscience, which is a reprover in their own bosoms that will not be daunted or silenced. And miserable is the man that is thus made a terror to himself. Yet this is not all; some are very much a terror to themselves, but they conceal it, and seem to others to be pleasant; but I will make thee a terror "to all thy friends;" thou shalt upon all occasions express thyself with so much horror and amazement that all thy friends shall be afraid of conversing with thee, and shall choose to stand aloof from thy torment. Persons in deep melancholy and distraction are a terror to themselves and all about them; which is a good reason why we should be very thankful so long as God continues to us the use of our reason and the peace of our consciences. 2nd. His friends whom he put a confidence in, and perhaps studied to oblige in what he did against Jeremiah, shall all fail him. God doth not presently strike him dead for what he did against Jeremiah, but lets him live miserably, like Cain in the land of shaking; in such a continual consternation as that wherever he goes he shall be a monument of Divine justice; and when it is asked, What makes this man in such a continual terror? it shall be answered, It is God's hand upon him for putting Jeremiah in the stocks. His friends, that should encourage him, shall all be cut off; they shall fall by the sword of the enemy, and his eyes shall behold it; which dreadful sight will increase his terror. 3rd. He shall find in the issue his terror is not causeless, but that Divine vengeance is waiting for him, ver. 6. He and his family shall go into captivity, even to Babylon; he shall neither die before the evil comes, as Josiah, nor live to survive it, as some did, but he shall die a captive, and shall in effect be buried in his chains, he and all his friends. Thus far is the doom of Pashur. Let persecutors read it and tremble; tremble to repentance before they be made to tremble to their ruin.

2. Did he aim to keep the people easy, to prevent the destruction that Jeremiah prophesied of, and by sinking his reputation to make his words fall to the ground? It is probable he did; for it appears by ver. 6 he did himself set up for a prophet, and told the people they should have peace; he prophesied lies to them, and because Jeremiah's prophecy contradicted his, and tended to awaken those whom he endeavoured to rock asleep in their sins, therefore he set himself against him. But could he gain this point? No; Jeremiah stands to what he hath said against Judah and Jerusalem, and God by his mouth repeats it. Men get nothing by silencing those who reprove and warn them, for the word will have its course; so it had here. 1st. The country shall be ruined; ver. 4, "I will give all Judah into the hand of the king of Babylon." It had long been God's own land; but he will now transfer his title to it to Nebuchadnezzar, he shall be master of the country, and dispose of the inhabitants; some to the sword, and some to captivity, as he pleaseth; but none shall escape him. 2nd. The city shall be ruined too, ver. 5. The king of Babylon shall spoil that, and carry all that is valuable in it to Babylon. First. He shall seize their magazines and military stores, here called the strength of this city, and turn those against them. These they trusted to as their strength; but what stead could they stand them in when they had thrown themselves out of God's protection, and he who was indeed their strength was departed from them? Secondly. He shall carry off all their stock in trade, their wares and merchandises, here called their labours, because it was what they laboured about, and got by their labour. Thirdly. He shall plunder their fine houses, and take away their rich furniture, here called their precious things, because they valued them, and set their hearts upon them so much. Happy they who have secured to themselves precious things in God's precious promises, which are out of the reach of soldiers. Fourthly. He shall rifle the exchequer, and take away the jewels of the crown, "and all the treasures of the kings of Judah." This was that instance of the calamity which was first of all threatened to Hezekiah long ago, as his punishment for shewing his treasures to the king of Babylon's ambassadors, Isa. xxxix. 6. The treasury they thought was their defence; but that betrayed them, and became an easy prey to the enemy.

7 O LORD, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived:
Thou art stronger than I, and hast prevailed:
I am in derision daily, every one mocketh me.
8 For since I spake,
I cried out, I cried violence and spoil;
Because the word of the LORD was made
A reproach unto me, and a derision, daily.
9 Then I said, I will not make mention of him,
Nor speak any more in his name.
But his word was in mine heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones,
And I was weary with forbearing, and I could not stay.
10 For I heard the defaming of many, fear on every side.
Report, say they, and we will report it.
All my familiars watched for my halting, saying,
Peradventure he will be enticed, and we shall prevail against him,
And we shall take our revenge on him.
11 But the LORD is with me as a mighty terrible one:
Therefore my persecutors shall stumble, and they shall not prevail:

xix. 4—6. This important passage describes in emphatic language the fearful and sanguinary rites which accompanied the worship of Baal. The "innocents" of verse 4 are most likely the "sons" or children of verse 5, where it is said they were offered as burnt-offerings. Some, however, as Scott, think the prophets and other good men who died by wicked hands are included. Jeremiah seems to refer only to idolatrous abuses.

xix. 13. The allusion to burning incense and offering libations to the planets upon the house-top points to a well-known custom of the Nabatæans, of whom Strabo says, "They honour the sun, erecting an altar upon the house-top, and daily make libations and burn incense on it."

xx. 2. According to Dr. Gill, Kimchi's father says the so-called stocks was an instrument made of two pieces of wood, in which the necks of prisoners were put; and some say it had besides two holes for the two hands to be put in. It is otherwise described as "an

They shall be greatly ashamed; for they shall not prosper:
Their everlasting confusion shall never be forgotten.
12 But, O LORD of hosts, that triest the righteous,
And seest the reins and the heart,
Let me see thy vengeance on them:
For unto thee have I opened my cause.
13 Sing unto the LORD, praise ye the LORD:
For he hath delivered the soul of the poor from the hand of evildoers.

Pashur's doom was to be a terror to himself. Jeremiah, even now, in this hour of temptation, is far from being so; and yet it cannot be denied but that he is here, through the infirmity of the flesh, at a mighty toss within himself. Good men are but men at the best; God is not extreme to mark what they say and do amiss, and therefore we must not be so, but make the best of it. In these verses it appears that upon occasion of the great indignity and injury that Pashur did to Jeremiah, there was a struggle in his breast between his graces and his corruptions. His discourse with himself and with his God upon this occasion was somewhat perplexed; let us try to methodize it.

First. Here is a sad representation of the wrong that was done him, and the affronts that were put upon him; and this representation no doubt was according to truth, and deserves no blame, but was very justly and very fitly made to him that sent him, and no doubt would bear him out. He complains,

1. That he was ridiculed and laughed at. They made a jest of every thing he said and did; and this cannot but be a great grievance to an ingenuous mind; ver. 7, 8, "I am in derision, I am mocked." They played upon him, and made themselves and one another merry with him, as if he had been a fool, good for nothing but to make sport. Thus he was continually, "I was in derision daily;" thus he was universally, "Every one mocks me;" the greatest so far forget their own gravity, and the meanest so far forget mine. Thus our Lord Jesus on the cross was reviled both by priests and people, and the revilings of each had their peculiar aggravation. And what was it that thus exposed him to contempt and scorn? It was nothing but his faithful and zealous discharge of his office, ver. 8. They could find nothing for which to deride him but his preaching; it was "the word of the Lord" that "was made a reproach." That for which they should have honoured and respected him, that he was intrusted to deliver the word of the Lord to them, was the very thing for which they reproached and reviled him. He never preached a sermon but, though he kept as close as possible to his instructions, they found something or other in it for which to banter and abuse him. Note, It is sad to think that, though Divine revelation be one of the greatest blessings and honours that ever was bestowed upon the world, yet it has been turned very much to the reproach of the most zealous preachers and believers of it. Two things they derided him for: 1st. The manner of his preaching. Since he spake he cried out. He had always been a lively, affectionate preacher, and since he began to speak in God's name he always spake as a man in earnest; he cried aloud, and did not spare, neither spared himself nor spared them to whom he preached; and this was enough for them to laugh at who hated to be serious. It is common for these that are unaffected with, and disaffected to, the things of God themselves, to ridicule those that are much affected with them. Lively preachers are the scorn of careless, unbelieving hearers. 2nd. The matter of his preaching. He cried, Violence and spoil. He reproved them for the violence and spoil which they were guilty of towards one another; and he prophesied of the violence and spoil which should be brought upon them as the punishment of that sin; for the former they ridiculed him as over precise, for the latter as over credulous; in both he was provoking to them, and therefore they resolved to run him down. This was bad enough, yet he complains farther,

2. That he was plotted against, and his ruin contrived. He was not only ridiculed as a weak man, but reproached and misrepresented as an ill man, and dangerous to the government. This he laments as his grievance, ver. 10. Being laughed at, though it touches a man in a point of honour, yet it is a thing that may be easily laughed at again; for, as it has been well observed, it is no shame to be laughed at, but to deserve to be so. But there were those that acted a more spiteful part, and with more subtlety. 1st. They spoke ill of him behind his back, when he had no opportunity of clearing himself, and were industrious to spread false reports concerning him. "I heard" at second hand "the defaming of many, fear on every side," 'of many Magor-missabibs,' so some read it, of many such men as Pashur was, and who may therefore expect his doom. Or, this was the matter of their defamation, they represented Jeremiah as a man that instilled fears and jealousies on every side into the minds of the people, and so made them uneasy under the government, and disposed them to a rebellion. Or, he perceived them so malicious against him, that he could not but be afraid on every side,—wherever he was he had reason to fear informers; so that they made him almost a Magor-missabib. These words are found in the original, verbatim,—'the same,' Ps. xxxi. 13, "I have heard the slander," or defaming, "of many; fear on every side." Jeremiah in his complaint chooseth to make use of the same words that David had made use of before him; that it might be a comfort to him to think that other good men had suffered the like abuses before him, and to teach us to make use of David's psalms with application to ourselves as there is occasion. Whatever we have to say we may from thence take with us words. See how Jeremiah's enemies contrived the matter; "Report, say they, and we will report it." They resolve to cast an odium upon him, and this is the method they take: let some very ill thing be said of him, which may render him obnoxious to the government, and though it be never so false we will second it, and spread it, and add to it; for the reproaches of good men lose nothing by the carriage. Do you that frame a story plausibly, or you that can pretend to some acquaintance with him, report it once, and we will all report it from you, in all companies that we come into. Do you say it, and we will swear it; do you set it a going, and we will follow it. And thus both are equally guilty, they that raise and they that propagate the false report. The receiver is as bad as the thief. 2nd. They flattered him to his face, that they might get something from him on which to ground an accusation; as the spies that came to Christ, feigning themselves to be just men, Lu. xx. 20; xi. 53, 54. His familiars, that he conversed freely with, and put a confidence in, watched for his halting, observed what he said,—which they could by any strained innuendo put an ill construction upon,—and carried it to his enemies. His case was very sad when those betrayed him whom he took to be his friends. They said among themselves, If we speak him fair and insinuate ourselves into his acquaintance, "peradventure he will be enticed" to own that he is in confederacy with the enemy, and a pensioner to the king of Babylon; or we shall wheedle him to speak some treasonable words, and then "we shall prevail against him, and take our revenge on him," for telling us of our faults, and threatening us with the judgments of God. Note, Neither the innocence of the dove, no, nor the prudence of the serpent to help it, can secure men from unjust censure and false accusation

Secondly. Here is an account of the temptation he was in under this affliction; his feet were almost gone, as the psalmist's, Ps. lxxiii. 2. And this is that which is most to be dreaded in affliction, being driven by it to sin, Neh. vi. 13.

1. He was tempted to quarrel with God for making him a prophet. This he begins with, ver. 7, "O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived;" this, as we read it, sounds very harsh. God's servants have always been ready to own that he is a faithful Master, and never cheated them; and therefore this is the language of Jeremiah's folly and corruption. If when God called him to be a prophet, and told him he would set him over the kingdoms, ch. i. 10, and make him a defenced city, he flattered himself with an expectation of having universal respect paid him as a messenger from heaven, and living safe and easy, and afterwards it proved otherwise, he must not say God had deceived him, but he had deceived himself, for he knew how the prophets before him had been persecuted, and had no reason to expect any better treatment. Nay, God had expressly told him, that all the princes, priests, and people of the land would fight against him, ch. i. 19; which he had forgot, else he would not have laid the blame on God thus. Christ thus told his disciples what opposition they should meet with, that they might not be offended, Jno. xvi. 1, 2. But the words may very well be read thus, 'Thou hast persuaded me, and I was persuaded;' it is the same word that is used, Gen. ix. 27, marg., 'God shall persuade Japheth;' and Pr. xxv. 15, "By much forbearance is a prince persuaded;" and Hos. ii. 14, "I will allure her." And this agrees best with what follows, "Thou art stronger than I," didst overpersuade me with argument; nay, didst overpower me by the influence of thy Spirit upon me, "and hast prevailed." Jeremiah was very backward to undertake the prophetical office; he pleaded that he was under age, and unfit for the service; but God overruled his pleas, and told him he must go, ch. i. 6, 7. Now, Lord, saith he, since thou didst put this office upon me, why dost thou not stand by me in it? Had I thrust myself upon it, I might justly have been in derision; but why am I so, when thou didst thrust me into it? It was Jeremiah's infirmity to complain thus of God, as putting a hardship upon him in calling him to be a prophet; which he would not have done had he considered the lasting honour thereby done him sufficient to balance the present contempt he was under. Note, As long as we see ourselves in the way of God and duty, it is weakness and folly, when we meet with difficulties and discouragements in it, to wish we had never set out in it.

2. He was tempted to quit his work, and give it over, partly because he himself met with so much hardship in it; and partly because those to whom he was sent, instead of being edified and made better, were exasperated and made worse; ver. 9, "Then I said," since by prophesying in the name of the Lord, I gain nothing to him or myself but dishonour and disgrace, "I will not make mention of him;" as my author for any thing I say, "nor speak any more in his name;" since my enemies do all they can to silence me, I will even silence myself, and speak no more, since I had as good speak to the stones as to them. Note, It is a strong temptation to poor ministers, to resolve they will preach no more, when they see their preaching slighted, and wholly ineffectual. But let people dread putting their ministers into this temptation. Let not their labour be in vain with us, lest we provoke them to say, They will take no more pains with us; and provoke God to say, They shall take no more. Yet let not ministers hearken to this temptation, but go on in their duty notwithstanding their discouragements, for this is the more thankworthy; and though Israel be not gathered, yet they shall be glorious.

Thirdly. Here is an account of his faithful adherence to his work, and cheerful dependence on his God notwithstanding.

1. He found the grace of God mighty in him to keep him to his business, notwithstanding the temptation he was in to throw it up. "I said" in my haste "I will speak no more in his name;" what I have in my heart to deliver I will stifle and suppress. But I soon found it "was in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones," which glowed inwardly, and must have vent; it was impossible to smother it. I was like a man in a burning fever, uneasy, and in a continual toss; "while I kept silence from good, my heart was hot within me;" it was pain and grief to me, and "I must speak that I may be refreshed," Job xxxii. 20; Ps. xxxix. 2, 3. "While I kept silence my bones waxed old," Ps. xxxii. 3. See the power of the spirit of prophecy in those that were acted by it; and thus will a holy zeal for God even eat men up, and make them forget themselves; "I believed, therefore have I spoken." Jeremiah was soon weary with forbearing to preach, and could not contain himself; nothing puts faithful ministers to so much pain as being silenced, nor to so much terror as silencing themselves. Their convictions will soon triumph over temptations of that kind: for "woe is unto me, if I preach not the Gospel" whatever it cost me, 1 Cor. ix. 16. And it is really a mercy to have the word of God thus mighty in us to overpower our corruptions.

2. He was assured of God's presence with him; which would be sufficient to baffle all the attempts of his enemies against him, ver. 11. They say, "We shall prevail against him," the day will undoubtedly be our own; but I am sure "they shall not prevail, they shall not prosper," I can safely set them all at defiance, for "the Lord is with me," is on my side, to take my part against them, (Rom. viii. 31,) to protect me from all their malicious designs upon me; he is with me to support me, and bear me up under the burthen which now presseth me down; he is with me to make the word I preach answer the end he designs, though not the end I desire; he "is with me as a mighty terrible one," to strike a terror upon them, and so overcome them. Note, Even that in God which is terrible is really comfortable to his servants that trust in him, for it shall be turned against those that seek to terrify his people. God's being a mighty God speaks him a terrible God to all those that take up arms against him, or any that like Jeremiah was commissioned by him. How terrible will the wrath of God be to those that think to daunt all about them, and will themselves be daunted by nothing! The most formidable enemies that act against us appear despicable when we see the Lord for us as a mighty terrible one, Neh. iv. 14. Jeremiah speaks now with a good assurance; If the Lord be with me, my persecutors shall stumble, so that when they pursue me they shall not overtake me, Ps. xxvii. 2; and then they shall be greatly ashamed of their impotent malice, and fruitless attempts. Nay, their everlasting confusion and infamy shall never be forgotten; they shall not forget it themselves, but it shall be to them a constant and lasting vexation, whenever they think of it; others shall not forget it, but it shall leave upon them an indelible reproach.

3. He appeals to God against them as a righteous Judge, and prays judgment upon his cause, ver. 12. He looks upon God as the God that tries the righteous, takes cognizance of them, and of every cause that they are interested in. He doth not judge in favour of them with partiality, but tries them; and finding they have right on their side, and their persecutors wrong them, and are injurious to them, he gives sentence for them. He that tries the righteous tries the unrighteous too, and he is very well qualified to do both; for he sees the reins and the heart, he certainly knows men's thoughts and affections, their aims and intentions, and therefore can pass an unerring judgment on their words and actions. Now this is the God, 1st. To whom the prophet here refers himself, and in whose court he lodgeth his appeal; "Unto thee have I opened my cause." Not but that God perfectly knew his cause, and all the instrument of torture, in which the neck, hands, and feet of prisoners were fastened, while the body was held in a bent or crooked posture, so as to cause great pain." There seems to have been attached to the high gate of Benjamin a sort of prison in which the stocks were placed. It was probably in the north wall of Jerusalem.

xx. 7. Instead of "O Lord, thou hast deceived me, and I was deceived," some older and more recent translators render, "O Lord, thou didst persuade me, and I was persuaded." Certainly our common version is not justified, although it is difficult to find terms exactly corresponding with the original. The Divine commission given to the prophet exposed him to derision and insult, and he expresses his disappointment and vexation. It does not appear that Jeremiah was promised exemption from the annoyances to which prophets in general were subject; he would therefore in no case be right in charging God with deceiving him. At the same time, the context proves that he was in a complaining mood.

merits of it without his opening; but the cause we commit to God we must spread before him: he knows it, but he will know it from us; and allows us to be particular in the opening of it, not to affect him, but to affect ourselves. Note, It will be an ease to our spirits, when we are oppressed and burthened, to open our cause to God, and pour out our complaint before him. 2nd. By whom he expects to be righted. "Let me see thy vengeance on them," such vengeance as thou thinkest fit to take for their conviction and my vindication; the vengeance thou usest to take on persecutors. Note, Whatever injuries are done us, we must not study to avenge ourselves, but must leave it to that God to do it to whom vengeance belongs, and who hath said, I will repay.

4. He greatly rejoiceth and praiseth God, in a full confidence that God would appear for his deliverance, ver. 13; so full is he of the comfort of God's presence with him, and the Divine protection he is under, and the Divine promise he has to depend upon, that in a transport of joy he stirs up himself and others to give God the glory of it; "Sing unto the Lord, praise ye the Lord." Here appears a great change with him, since he began this discourse; the clouds are blown over, his complaints all silenced, and turned into thanksgivings. He has now an entire confidence in that God whom, ver. 7, he was distrusting; stirs up himself to praise that name which, ver. 9, he was resolving no more to make mention of. It was the lively exercise of faith that made this happy change, that turned his sighs into songs, and his tremblings into triumphs. It is proper to express our hope in God by our praising him, and our praising of God by our singing to him. That which is the matter of the praise is, "He hath delivered the soul of the poor from the hands of the evil-doers;" he means especially himself, his own poor soul. He hath delivered me formerly, when I was in distress, and now of late out of the hand of Pashur, and he will continue to deliver me, 2 Cor. i. 10. He will deliver my soul from the sin that I am in danger of falling into, when I am thus persecuted; he hath delivered me from the hand of evil-doers, so that they have not gained their point, nor had their will. Note, Those that are faithful in well-doing need not fear those that are spiteful in evil-doing, for they have a God to trust to, who has well-doers under the hand of his protection, and evil-doers under the hand of his restraint.

14 Cursed be the day wherein I was born:
Let not the day wherein my mother bare me be blessed.
15 Cursed be the man who brought tidings to my father,
Saying, A man child is born unto thee;
Making him very glad.
16 And let that man be as the cities
Which the LORD overthrew, and repented not:
And let him hear the cry in the morning,
And the shouting at noontide;
17 Because he slew me not from the womb;
Or that my mother might have been my grave,
And her womb to be always great with me.
18 Wherefore came I forth out of the womb
To see labour and sorrow,
That my days should be consumed with shame?

What is the meaning of this? Doth there proceed out of the same mouth blessing and cursing? Could he that said so cheerfully, ver. 13, "Sing unto the Lord, praise ye the Lord," say so passionately, ver. 14, "Cursed be the day wherein I was born?" How shall we reconcile these? What we have in these verses, I suppose the prophet records to his own shame, as he had recorded that in the foregoing verses to God's glory. It seems to be a relation of the toss he had been in while he was in the stocks, out of which by faith and hope he had recovered himself, rather than a new temptation which he afterwards fell into; and it should come in like that of David, Ps. xxxi. 22, "I said in my haste, I am cut off;" which is also implied, Ps. lxxvii. 7. When grace has got the victory, it is good to remember the struggles of corruption, that we may be ashamed of ourselves and our own folly; may admire the goodness of God in not taking us at our word, and may be warned by it to double our guard upon our spirits another time. See here how strong the temptation was which the prophet by Divine assistance got the victory over, and how far he yielded to it, that we may not despair, if we through the weakness of the flesh be at any time thus tempted. Let us see here,

First. What the prophet's language was in this temptation. 1. He fastened a brand of infamy upon his birthday, as Job did in a heat; ch. iii. 1, "Cursed be the day wherein I was born." It was an ill day to me, ver. 14, because it was the beginning of sorrows, and an inlet to all this misery. It is a wish that he had never been born; Judas in hell has reason to wish so, Mat. xxvi. 24. But no man on earth has reason to wish so, because he knows not but he may yet become a vessel of mercy, much less has any good man reason to wish so. Whereas some keep their birthday in the return of the year with gladness, we will look upon his birthday as a melancholy day, and will solemnize it with sorrow, and will have it looked upon as an ominous day. 2. He wished ill to the messenger that brought his father the news of his birth, ver. 15. It made his father very glad to hear that he had a child born, (perhaps it was his first-born,) especially that it was a manchild, for then, being of the family of the priests, he might live to have the honour of serving God's altar; and yet he is ready to curse the man that brought the tidings, when perhaps the father to whom they were brought gave him a gratuity for it. Here Mr. Gataker well observes, 'That parents are often much rejoiced at the birth of their children, when, if they did foresee what misery they are born to, they would rather lament over them than rejoice in them.' He is very free and very fierce in the curses he pronounces upon the messenger of his birth; ver. 16, "Let him be as the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, which the Lord utterly overthrew, and repented not;" that is, did not in the least mitigate or alleviate their misery. "Let him hear the cry" of the invading, besieging enemy "in the morning," as soon as he is stirring; then let him take the alarm, and by noon let him hear their shouting for victory; and thus let him live in constant terror. 3. He is angry that the fate of the Hebrews' children in Egypt was not his, that he was not slain from the womb, that his first breath was not made his last, and that he was not strangled as soon as he came into the world, ver. 17. He wisheth the messenger of his birth had been better employed, and had been his murderer; nay, that his mother of whom he was born, had been to her great misery always with child of him; and so the womb in which he was conceived would have served without more ado as a grave for him to be buried in; and Job intimates a near alliance and resemblance between the womb and the grave, Job i. 21, "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither." 4. He thinks his present calamities sufficient to justify these passionate wishes; ver. 18, "Wherefore came I forth out of the womb" where I lay hid, was not seen, was not hated, where I lay safe and knew no evil, "to see" all this "labour and sorrow;" nay, to have my days consumed with shame, to be continually vexed and abused; not only to have my life spent in trouble, but wasted and worn away by trouble?

Secondly. What use we may make of this. It is not recorded for our imitation, and yet we may learn good lessons from it. 1. See the vanity of human life, and the vexation of spirit that attends it; if there were not another life after this, we should be tempted many a time to wish we had never known this, for our few days here are full of trouble. 2. See the folly and absurdity of sinful passion, how unreasonably it talks when it is suffered to ramble. What nonsense is it to curse a day—to curse a messenger for the sake of his message! What a brutish, barbarous thing for a child to wish his own mother had never been delivered of him! see Isa. xlv. 10. We can easily see the folly of it in others, and should take warning from thence to suppress all such intemperate heats and passions in ourselves, to stifle them at first, and not suffer these evil spirits to speak. When the heart is hot, let the tongue be bridled, Ps. xxxix. 1, 2. 3. See the weakness even of good men, who are but men at the best; see how much those who think they stand are concerned to take heed lest they fall; and to pray daily, Father in heaven, "lead us not into temptation."

CHAPTER XXI.

It is plain the prophecies of this book are not placed here in the same order that they were preached; for there are chapters after this which concern Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, and Jeconiah, who all reigned before Zedekiah, in whose reign the prophecy of this chapter bears date. Here is, I. The message which Zedekiah sent to the prophet, to desire him to inquire of the Lord for them, ver. 1, 2. II. The answer which Jeremiah in God's name sent to that message, in which he, 1. Foretells the certain and inevitable ruin of the city, and the fruitlessness of their attempts for its preservation, ver. 3—7; 2. He adviseth the people to make the best of bad, by going over to the king of Babylon, ver. 8—10; 3. He adviseth the king and his family to repent and reform, ver. 11, 12, and not to trust to the strength of their city, and grow secure, ver. 13, 14.

THE word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, when king Zedekiah sent unto him Pashur the son of Melchiah, and Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah the priest, saying, 2 Enquire, I pray thee, of the LORD for us; for Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon maketh war against us; if so be that the LORD will deal with us according to all his wondrous works, that he may go up from us. 3 Then said Jeremiah unto them, Thus shall ye say to Zedekiah: 4 Thus saith the LORD God of Israel; Behold, I will turn back the weapons of war that are in your hands, wherewith ye fight against the king of Babylon, and against the Chaldeans, which besiege you without the walls, and I will assemble them into the midst of this city. 5 And I myself will fight against you with an outstretched hand and with a strong arm, even in anger, and in fury, and in great wrath. 6 And I will smite the inhabitants of this city, both man and beast: they shall die of a great pestilence. 7 And afterward, saith the LORD, I will deliver Zedekiah king of Judah, and his servants, and the people, and such as are left in this city from the pestilence, from the sword, and from the famine, into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of those that seek their life: and he shall smite them with the edge of the sword; he shall not spare them, neither have pity, nor have mercy.

Here is, First. A very humble decent message which king Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah the prophet when he was in distress. It is indeed charged upon this Zedekiah that he "humbled not himself before Jeremiah the prophet, speaking from the mouth of the Lord," 2 Chr. xxxvi. 12; he did not always humble himself as he did sometimes, never humbled himself till necessity forced him to it; he humbled himself so far as to desire the prophet's assistance, but not so far as to take his advice or be ruled by him. Observe,

1. The distress which king Zedekiah was now in. Nebuchadrezzar made war upon him, not only invaded the land, but besieged the city, and had now actually invested it. Note, Those that put the evil day far from them, will be the more terrified when it comes upon them. And they who before slighted God's ministers may then perhaps be glad to court an acquaintance with them.

2. The messengers he sent, Pashur and Zephaniah, one of the fifth course of the priests, the other of the twenty-fourth, 1 Chr. xxiv. 9, 18. It was well that he sent persons of rank, but it had been better if he had desired a personal conference with the prophet, which no doubt he might easily have had if he would so far have humbled himself. Perhaps these priests were no

xx. 10. Here the verb "enticed" is the same as that which is rendered "deceived" in verse 7. Here also we think it means that he would be exposed, or that he would expose himself, to the assaults of his adversaries. His "familiars" were his acquaintances or professed friends.

xx. 14—18. It will be seen at once how closely this passage resembles one in Job (chap. iii. 3, &c.), and consequently it has often been suggested that Jeremiah had Job's words in mind when he wrote. Ewald thinks these verses should come between the sixth and seventh, and other critics have made other suggestions respecting them. Some have even fancied that they are the words of Pashur. But since all copies and ancient versions have the passage as we have, it is undesirable to propose any alteration in regard to it.

xxi. 1. On this chapter Dr. Henderson says, "Venema, Rosenmüller, and Maurer are of opinion that this chapter properly comes in between chapters xxxvii. and xxxviii., and, indeed, a comparison of its better than the rest, and yet, when they were commanded by the king, they must carry a respectful message to the prophet, which was both a mortification to them, and an honour to Jeremiah. He had rashly said, ch. xx. 18, "My days are consumed with shame," and yet here we find that he lived to see better days than those were when he made that complaint; now he appears in reputation. Note, It is folly to say when things are bad with us, they will be always so. It is possible that those that are despised may come to be respected, and it is promised that those who honour God he will honour, and those who have afflicted his people shall bow to them, Isa. lx. 14.

3. The message itself; "Inquire, I pray thee, of the Lord for us," ver. 2. Now the Chaldean army was got into their borders, into their bowels, they were at length convinced that Jeremiah was a true prophet, though loath to own it, and brought too late to it; under this conviction they desire him to stand their friend with God, believing him to have that interest in heaven which none of their other prophets had, that had flattered them with hopes of peace. They now employ Jeremiah, 1st. To consult the mind of God for them; "Inquire of the Lord for us," ask him what course we shall take in our present strait; for the measures we have hitherto taken are all broken. Note, Those that will not take the direction of God's grace how to get clear of their sins, would yet be glad of the directions of his providence, how to get clear of their troubles. 2nd. To seek the favour of God for them. So some read it, Entreat the Lord for us; be an intercessor for us with God. Note, Those that slight the prayers of God's people and ministers when they are in prosperity may perhaps be glad of an interest in them when they come to be in distress: "Give us of your oil." The benefit they promise themselves is, "It may be the Lord will deal with us now according to the wondrous works he wrought for our fathers, that the enemy may raise the siege, and go up from us." Observe, First. All their care is to get rid of their trouble, not to make their peace with God, and be reconciled to him; that our enemy may go up from us, not that our God may return to us. Thus Pharaoh, Ex. x. 17, "Entreat the Lord that he may take away this death." Secondly. All their hope is that God hath done wondrous works formerly, in the deliverance of Jerusalem, when Sennacherib besieged it, at the prayer of Isaiah, so we are told, 2 Chr. xxxii. 20, 21. And who can tell but he may destroy these besiegers (as he did those) at the prayer of Jeremiah? But they did not consider how different the character of Zedekiah and his people was from that of Hezekiah and his people. Those were days of general reformation and piety; these, of general corruption and apostacy. Jerusalem is now the reverse of what it was then. Note, It is folly to think that God should do for us while we hold fast our iniquity as he did for those that held fast their integrity.

Secondly. A very startling, cutting reply, which God, by the prophet, sent to that message. If Jeremiah had been to have answered the message of himself, we have reason to think he would have returned a comfortable answer, in hopes their sending such a message was an indication of some good purposes in them, which he would be glad to make the best of, for he did not desire the woful day. But God knows their hearts better than Jeremiah doth, and sends them an answer which hath scarce one word of comfort in it. He sends it them in the name of "the Lord God of Israel," ver. 4, to intimate to them that, though God allowed himself to be called the God of Israel, and had done great things for Israel formerly, and had still great things in store for Israel, pursuant to his covenants with them, yet this should stand the present generation in no stead, who were Israelites in name only, and not indeed, any more than God's dealings with them should cut off his relation to Israel as their God. It is here foretold,

1. That God will render all their endeavours for their own security fruitless and ineffectual, ver. 4. I will be so far from teaching your hands to war, and putting an edge upon your swords, that I will "turn back the weapons of war that are in your hand," when you sally out upon the besiegers to beat them off, so that they shall not give the stroke you design; nay, they shall recoil into your own faces, and be turned upon yourselves. Nothing can make for those who have God against them.

2. That the besiegers shall in a little time make themselves masters of Jerusalem, and of all its wealth and strength. "I will assemble them in the midst of this city," that are now surrounding it. Note, If that place which should have been a centre of devotion be made a centre of wickedness, it is not strange if God make it a rendezvous of destroyers.

3. That God himself will be their enemy, and then I know not who can befriend them, no, not Jeremiah himself; ver. 5, I will be so far from protecting you, as I have done formerly in a like case, that "I myself will fight against you." Note, Those who rebel against God may justly expect that he will make war upon them. And that, 1st. With the power of a God, which is irresistibly victorious. I will fight against you "with an outstretched hand," which will reach far, and "with a strong arm," which will strike home, and wound deep. 2nd. With the displeasure of a God, which is indisputably righteous. It is not a correction in love, but an execution in anger, and in fury, and in great wrath; it is upon a sentence sworn in wrath, against which there will lie no exception. And it will soon be found what a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God.

4. That those who for their own safety decline sallying out upon the besiegers, and so avoid their sword, yet shall not escape the sword of God's justice; ver. 6, I will smite those that abide in the city, (so it may be read,) both man and beast; both the beasts that are for food and those that are for service in war, foot and horse, they shall die of a great pestilence, which shall rage within the walls, while the enemies are encamped about them. Though Jerusalem's gates and walls may for a time keep out the Chaldeans, they cannot keep out God's judgments. His arrows of pestilence can reach those that think themselves safe from other arrows.

5. That the king himself, and all the people that escape the sword, famine and pestilence, shall fall into the hands of the Chaldeans, who shall cut them off in cold blood, ver. 7. They shall not spare them, nor have pity on them. Let not them expect to find mercy with men that have forfeited God's compassions, and shut themselves out from his mercy. Thus was the decree gone forth, and then to what purpose was it for Jeremiah to inquire of the Lord for them?

8 And unto this people thou shalt say, Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I set before you the way of life, and the way of death. 9 He that abideth in this city shall die by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence: but he that goeth out, and falleth to the Chaldeans that besiege you, he shall live, and his life shall be unto him for a prey. 10 For I have set my face against this city for evil, and not for good, saith the LORD: it shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire. 11 And touching the house of the king of Judah, say, Hear ye the word of the LORD; 12 O house of David, thus saith the LORD; Execute judgment in the morning, and deliver him that is spoiled out of the hand of the oppressor, lest my fury go out like fire, and burn that none can quench it, because of the evil of your doings. 13 Behold, I am against thee, O inhabitant of the valley, and rock of the plain, saith the LORD; which say, Who shall come down against us? or who shall enter into our habitations? 14 But I will punish you according to the fruit of your doings, saith the LORD: and I will kindle a fire in the forest thereof, and it shall devour all things round about it.

FIRE IN THE PRAIRIES.

By the civil message which the king sent to Jeremiah, it appeared that both he and the people began to have a respect for him, which it had been Jeremiah's policy to make some advantage of for himself; but the reply which God obligeth him to make is enough to crush that little respect they begin to have for him, and to exasperate them against him more than ever. Not only the predictions in the foregoing verses were provoking, but the prescriptions in these verses. For here,

First. He adviseth the people to surrender, and desert to the Chaldeans, as the only means left them to save their lives, ver. 8—10. This counsel was very displeasing to those who were flattered by their false prophets into a desperate resolution to hold out to the last extremity, trusting to the strength of their walls and courage of their soldiery to keep out the enemy, or to their foreign aids to raise the siege. The prophet assures them the city "shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon," and he shall not only plunder it, but "burn it with fire,"—for God himself hath "set his face against this city for evil, and not for good;" to lay it waste, and not to protect it; for evil which shall have no good mixed with it, no mitigation or merciful alloy,—and therefore, if you would make the best of bad, you must beg quarter of the Chaldeans, and surrender prisoners of war. In vain did Rabshakeh persuade the Jews to do this while they had God for them, Isa. xxxvi. 16; but it was the best course they could take now God was against them. Both the law and the prophets had often set before them life and death in another sense; life, if they obey the voice of God; death, if they persist in disobedience, Deu. xxx. 19. But they had slighted that life which would have made them truly happy, to upbraid them with which the prophet here useth the same expression, ver. 8, "Behold, I set before you the way of life, and the way of death," which speaks not as that, a fair proposal, but a melancholy dilemma, advising them of two evils to choose the least; and that lesser evil, a shameful and wretched captivity, is all contents with what we read in the first and second verses of the latter chapter scarcely leaves any room to doubt of the correctness of this hypothesis. What is here more fully related is there simply referred to the historical narrative. The occasion of the message sent by Zedekiah to the prophet was the temporary raising of the siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, in order to meet the Egyptian army which had come to its relief." The reader should turn to chapter xxxviii.

xxi. 2. The name of Nebuchadnezzar here is in the Hebrew Nebuchadrezzar, as it is in various other places. The same difference occurs in the Greek form of the word, and it is found that Nebuchadrezzar conforms most nearly to the cuneiform inscriptions. Professor Rawlinson explains the native form, Nabu-ku-duri-utsur, to mean, "Nebo is the protector against misfortune." Fürst explains it "self-ruling head by Nebo;" but while we doubt the accuracy of his view, we can only say that the word points to some attribute of the life now left for them to propose to themselves. He that abides in the city, and trusts to that to secure him, shall certainly die either by the sword without the walls or famine or pestilence within. But he that can so far bring down his spirit, and quit his vain hopes, as to go out and fall to the Chaldeans, his "life shall be given him for a prey," that is, he shall save his life, but with much difficulty and hazard, as a prey is taken from the mighty. It is an expression like that, "He shall be saved, yet so as by fire." He shall escape but very narrowly. Or, he shall have such a surprising joy and satisfaction, in escaping with his life from such a universal destruction, as shall equal theirs that divide the spoil. They thought to have made a prey of the camp of the Chaldeans, as their ancestors did of that of the Assyrians, Isa. xxxiii. 23, but they will be sadly disappointed; if by yielding at discretion they can but save their lives, that is all the prey they must promise themselves. Now one would think this advice from a prophet in God's name should have gained some credit with them, and been universally followed; but, for aught appears, there were few or none that took it: so wretchedly were their hearts hardened to their destruction.

Secondly. He adviseth the king and princes to reform and make conscience of the duty of their place. Because it was the king that sent the message to him, in the reply there shall be a particular word for the house of the king, not to compliment or court them, that was no part of a prophet's business, no, not when they did him the honour to send to him, but to give them wholesome counsel; ver. 11, 12, "Execute judgment in the morning," do it carefully and diligently. Those magistrates that would fill up their place with duty had need rise betimes. Do it quickly, and do not delay to do justice upon appeals made to you, and tire out poor petitioners, as you have done. Do not lie in your beds in a morning, to sleep away the debauch of the night before; nor spend the morning in pampering the body, as those princes, Eccl. x. 16, but spend it in the despatch of business. You would be delivered out of the hand of those that distress you, and expect that therein God should do you justice; see then that you do justice to those that apply themselves to you, and "deliver them out of the hand of their oppressors, lest my fury go out like fire" against you in a particular manner, and you fare worst, who think to escape best, because of the evil of your doings. Now, 1. This intimates that it was their neglect to do their duty that brought all this desolation upon the people. It was the evil of their doings that kindled the fire of God's wrath. Thus plainly doth he deal even with the house of the king; for those that would have the benefit of a prophet's prayers must thankfully take a prophet's reproofs. 2. This directs them to take the right method for a national reformation. The princes must begin and set a good example, and then the people will be invited to reform. They must use their power for the punishment of wrong, and then the people will be obliged to reform. He minds them that they are the house of David, and therefore should tread in his steps, who executed judgment and justice to his people. 3. This gives them some encouragement to hope that there may yet be a lengthening of their tranquillity, Dan. iv. 27. If any thing will recover their state from the brink of ruin this will.

Thirdly. He shews them the vanity of all their hopes, so long as they continued unreformed, ver. 13, 14. Jerusalem is an inhabitant of the valley, guarded with mountains on all sides, which were their natural fortifications, making it difficult for an army to approach them; it is a rock of the plain, which made it difficult for an enemy to undermine them. These advantages of their situation they trusted to more than to the power and promise of God. And thinking their city by these means to be impregnable, they set the judgments of God at defiance, saying, "Who shall come down against us?" None of our neighbours dare make a descent upon us; or, if they do, "Who shall enter into our habitations?" They had some colour for this confidence, for it appears to have been the sense of all their neighbours that no enemy could force his way into Jerusalem, Lam. iv. 12. But those are least safe that are most secure. God soon shews the vanity of that challenge, "Who shall come down against us?" when he saith, ver. 13, "Behold, I am against thee." They had indeed by their wickedness driven God out of their city, when he would have tarried with them as a friend; but they could not by their bulwarks keep him out of their city when he came against them as an enemy. "If God be for us, who can be against us?" but if he be against us, who can be for us to stand us in any stead? Nay, he comes against them not as an enemy, that may lawfully, and with some hope of success, be resisted; but as a judge, that cannot be resisted, for he saith, ver. 14, "I will punish you," by due course of law, "according to the fruit of your doings," that is, according to the merit of them, and the direct tendency of them. That shall be brought upon you which is the natural product of sin. Nay, he will not only come with the anger of an enemy, and the justice of a judge, but with the force of a consuming fire, which has no compassion, as a judge sometimes has, nor spares any thing combustible that comes in its way. Jerusalem is become a forest, in which God will kindle a fire that shall consume all before it; for our God is himself a consuming fire, and who is able to stand in his sight when once he is angry?

CHAPTER XXII.

Upon occasion of the message sent in the foregoing chapter to the house of the king, we have here recorded some sermons which Jeremiah preached at court, in some preceding reigns, that it might appear they had had fair warning long before that fatal sentence was pronounced upon them, and were yet in a way to have prevented it. Here is, I. A message sent to the royal family, as it should seem in the reign of Jehoiakim, relating partly to Jehoahaz, who was carried away captive into Egypt, and partly to Jehoiakim, who succeeded him, and was now upon the throne. The king and princes are exhorted to execute judgment, and are assured that if they did so, the royal family should flourish, but otherwise it should be ruined, ver. 1—10; Jehoahaz, called here Shallum, is lamented, ver. 10—12; Jehoiakim is reproved and threatened, ver. 13—19. II. Another message sent them in the reign of Jehoiakim, alias Jeconiah, the son of Jehoiakim; he is charged with an obstinate refusal to hear, threatened with destruction, and it is foretold that in him Solomon's house should fail, ver. 20—30.

THUS saith the LORD; Go down to the house of the king of Judah, and speak there this word,

2 And say,
Hear the word of the LORD, O king of Judah,
That sittest upon the throne of David,
Thou, and thy servants, and thy people
That enter in by these gates:

3 Thus saith the LORD;
Execute ye judgment and righteousness,
And deliver the spoiled out of the hand of the oppressor:
And do no wrong, do no violence
To the stranger, the fatherless, nor the widow,
Neither shed innocent blood in this place.

4 For if ye do this thing indeed,
Then shall there enter in by the gates of this house
Kings sitting upon the throne of David,
Riding in chariots and on horses,
He, and his servants, and his people.

HEADS AND TRAPPINGS OF ROYAL HORSES—FROM THE ASSYRIAN MARBLES.

5 But if ye will not hear these words,
I swear by myself, saith the LORD,
That this house shall become a desolation.

6 For thus saith the LORD unto the king's house of Judah;
Thou art Gilead unto me, and the head of Lebanon:
Yet surely I will make thee a wilderness,
And cities which are not inhabited

7 And I will prepare destroyers against thee,
Every one with his weapons:
And they shall cut down thy choice cedars,
And cast them into the fire.

8 And many nations shall pass by this city,
And they shall say every man to his neighbour,
Wherefore hath the LORD done thus unto this great city?

9 Then they shall answer,
Because they have forsaken the covenant of the LORD their God,
And worshipped other gods, and served them.

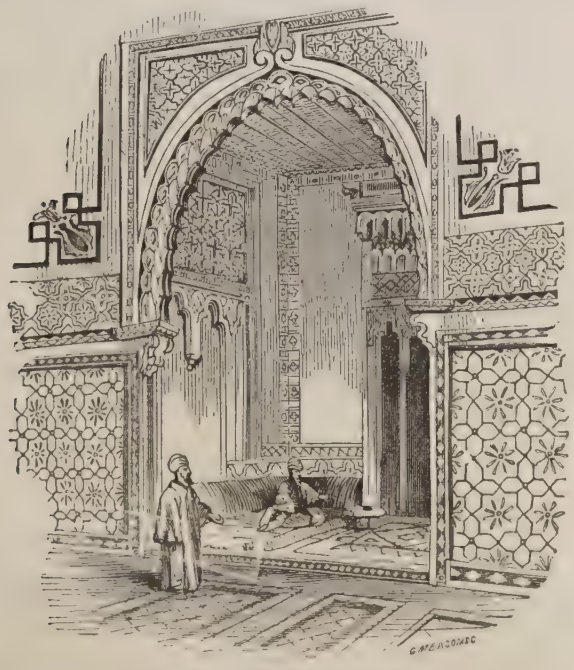
Here is, First. Orders given to Jeremiah to go preach before the king. In the chapter before, Zedekiah sent messengers to the prophet, but here the prophet is bidden to go in his own proper person to the house of the king, and demand his attention to the word of the King of kings; ver. 2, "Hear the word of the Lord, O king of Judah." Subjects must own that where the word of a king is there is power over them; but kings must own that where the word of the Lord is there is power over them. The king of Judah is here spoken to as sitting upon the throne of David, who was a man after God's own heart, as holding their dignity and power by the covenant made with him; let them, therefore, conform to his example, that they may have the benefit of the promises made to him. With the king his servants are spoken to, because a good government depends upon a good ministry as well as a good king.

Secondly. Instructions given him what to preach.

1. He must tell them what was their duty, what was the good which the Lord their God required of them, ver. 3. They must take care, 1st. That they do all the good they can with the power they have. They must do justice in defence of those that were injured, and must "deliver the spoiled out of the hand of their oppressors;" this was the duty of their place, Ps. lxxxii. 3. Herein they must be ministers of God for good. 2nd. That they do no hurt with it, no wrong, no violence. That is the greatest wrong and violence which is done under colour of law and justice, and by those whose business it is to punish and protect from wrong and violence. They must do no wrong to the stranger, fatherless, and widow, for these God doth in a particular manner patronise and take under his tuition, Ex. xxii. 21, 22.

2. He must assure them that the faithful discharge of their duty would advance and secure their prosperity, ver. 4. There shall then be a succession of kings, an uninterrupted succession upon the throne of David and of his line; these enjoying a perfect tranquillity, and living in great state and dignity, riding on chariots and horses, as before, ch. xvii. 25. Note, The most effectual way to preserve the dignity of the government is to do the duty of it.

3. He must likewise assure them that the iniquity of their family, if they persisted in it, would be the ruin of their family, though it was a royal family.



Nebo, which is undecided. This passage brings us suddenly upon the theatre of war, several years after the Chaldean hosts had invaded the land. Zedekiah had in the ninth year of his reign formed an alliance with Pharaoh-Hophra, successor of Necho, king of Egypt. Hophra, who came to the assistance of Zedekiah, was driven back into Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar; and it is to this episode in the war, before the final catastrophe, that this chapter refers. Nebuchadnezzar soon returned and completed the conquest of the Jews. The plain declarations of Jeremiah very naturally provoked the wrath of the defenders of their country. Under other circumstances they would have been most unpatriotic, because they counsel surrender as the only hope of safety, and declare that the victory shall rest with the enemy, who shall use his advantages in the ordinary brutal manner of the age. But it is to be remembered that in his prophetic capacity Jeremiah had, like other prophets, declared these woes beforehand.

ver. 5, "If ye will not hear," will not obey, "this house shall become a desolation," the palace of the kings of Judah shall fare no better than other habitations in Jerusalem. Sin has often been the ruin of royal palaces, though never so stately, never so strong. This sentence is ratified by an oath; "I swear by myself,"—and God can swear by no greater, Heb. vi. 12,—that this house shall be laid in ruins. Note, Sin will be the ruin of the houses of princes as well as of mean men.

4. He must shew how fatal their wickedness would be to their kingdom as well as to themselves, to Jerusalem especially, the royal city, ver. 6—9. 1st. It is confessed that Judah and Jerusalem had been valuable in God's eyes, and considerable in their own; "Thou art Gilead unto me, and the head of Lebanon." Their lot was cast in a place that was rich and pleasant as Gilead; Zion was a stronghold, as stately as Lebanon; this they trusted to as their security. But, 2nd. This shall not protect them. The country that is now fruitful as Gilead shall be made a wilderness; the cities that are now strong as Lebanon shall be cities not inhabited; and when the country is laid waste the cities must be dispeopled. See how easily God's judgments can ruin a nation, and how certainly sin will do it.

When this desolating work is to be done, First. There shall be those that shall do it effectually; ver. 7, "I will prepare destroyers against thee," I will 'sanctify' them, (so the word is,) I will appoint them to this service, and use them in it. Note, When destruction is designed, destroyers are prepared, and perhaps are in the preparing, and things are working towards the designed destruction, and are getting ready for it long before. And who can contend with destroyers of God's preparing? They shall destroy cities as easily as men fell trees in a forest. "They shall cut down thy choice cedars," and yet when they are down shall value them no more than thorns and briars, they shall "cast them into the fire," for their choicest cedars are become rotten ones, and good for nothing else. Secondly. There shall be those who shall be ready to justify God in the doing of it, ver. 8, 9. Persons of many nations, when they pass by the ruins of this city in their travels will ask, "Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this city?" How came so strong a city to be overpowered? so rich a city to be impoverished? so populous a city to be depopulated? so holy a city to be profaned? and a city that had been so dear to God to be abandoned by him? And the reason is so obvious that it shall be ready in every man's mouth; "Ask them that go by the way," Job xxi. 29; ask the next man you meet, and he will tell you it was because they changed their gods, which other nations never used to do; they forsook the covenant of Jehovah, their own God, revolted from their allegiance to him, and from the duty which their covenant with him bound them to, and they worshipped other gods, and served them in contempt of him, and therefore he gave them up to this destruction. Note, God never casts any off till they first cast him off. Go, saith God to the prophet, and preach this to the royal family.

10 Weep ye not for the dead,
Neither bemoan him:
But weep sore for him that goeth away:
For he shall return no more,
Nor see his native country.
11 For thus saith the LORD
Touching Shallum the son of Josiah king of Judah,
Which reigned instead of Josiah his father,
Which went forth out of this place;
He shall not return thither any more:
12 But he shall die in the place whither they have led him
And shall see this land no more. [captive, 13 Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness,
And his chambers by wrong;
That useth his neighbour's service without wages,
And giveth him not for his work;
14 That saith,
I will build me a wide house and large chambers,
And cutteth him out windows;
And it is cieled with cedar, and painted with vermilion
15 Shalt thou reign, because thou closest thyself in cedar?
Did not thy father eat and drink,
And do judgment and justice,
And then it was well with him?
16 He judged the cause of the poor and needy;
Then it was well with him:
Was not this to know me? saith the LORD.
17 But thine eyes and thine heart are not
But for thy covetousness, and for to shed innocent blood,
And for oppression, and for violence, to do it
18 Therefore thus saith the LORD
Concerning Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah;
They shall not lament for him, saying,
Ah my brother! or, Ah sister!
They shall not lament for him, saying,
Ah lord! or, Ah his glory!
19 He shall be buried with the burial of an ass,
Drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.

PAINTED ARABESQUE HALL.—ver. 14.

Kings, though they are gods to us, they are men to God, and shall die like men; so it appears in those verses, where we have a sentence of death passed upon two kings that reigned successively in Jerusalem, two brothers, and both the ungracious sons of a very pious father.

First. Here is the doom of Shallum, who doubtless is the same with Jehoahaz, for he is that "son of Josiah, king of Judah, who reigned in the stead of Josiah his father," ver. 11, which Jehoahaz did by the act of the people, who made him king though he was not the eldest son, 2 Kin. xxiii. 30; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 1. Among the sons of Josiah, 1 Chr. iii. 15, there is one Shallum mentioned, and not Jehoahaz. Perhaps the people preferred him before his elder brother because they thought him a more active, daring young man, and fitter to rule; but God soon shewed them the folly of their injustice, and that it could not prosper, for within three months the king of Egypt came upon him, deposed him, and carried him away prisoner into Egypt, as God had threatened, Deu. xxviii. 68. It doth not appear that any of the people were taken into captivity with him, but himself only. We have the story, 2 Kin. xxiii. 34; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 4. Now here,

1. The people are directed to lament him rather than his father Josiah; "Weep not for the dead," weep not any more for Josiah. Jeremiah had been himself a true mourner for him, and had stirred up the people to mourn for him, 2 Chr. xxxv. 25; yet now he will have them to go out of mourning for him, though it was but three months after his death, and to turn their tears into another channel: they must weep sore for Jehoahaz that is gone into Egypt; not that there was any great loss of him to the public, as there was of his father, but that his case was much more deplorable. Josiah went to the grave in peace and honour, was prevented from seeing the evil to come in this world, and removed to see the good to come in the other world; and therefore weep not for him, but for his unhappy son, that is likely to live and die in disgrace and misery, a wretched captive. Note, Dying saints may be justly envied, whilst living sinners are justly pitied. And so dismal perhaps the prospects of the times may be, that tears even for a Josiah, even for a Jesus, must be restrained, that they may be reserved for ourselves and for our children, Lu. xxiii. 28.

2. The reason given is, because he shall never return out of captivity, as he and his people expected, but shall die there. They were loath to believe this, therefore it is here repeated again and again, he shall return no more, ver. 10. He shall never have the pleasure of seeing his native country, but shall have the continual grief of hearing of the desolations of it. He is gone forth out of this place, and shall never return, ver. 11; "He shall die in the place whither they have led him captive," ver. 12. This came of his forsaking the good example of his father, and usurping the right of his elder brother. In Ezekiel's lamentation for the princes of Israel this Jehoahaz is represented as a young lion, that soon learned to catch the prey, but was taken and brought in chains to Egypt, and was long expected to return, but in vain: see Eze. xix. 3—5.

Secondly. Here is the doom of Jehoiakim, who succeeded him. Whether he had any better right to the crown than Shallum we know not, for, though he was elder than his predecessor, there seems to be another son of Josiah elder than he, called Johanan, 1 Chr. iii. 15; but this we know, he ruled no better, and fared no better at last. Here is,

1. His sins faithfully reproved. It is not fit for a private person to say to a king, Thou art wicked; but a prophet, that has a message from God, betrays his trust if he do not deliver it, be it never so unpleasing, even to kings themselves. Jehoiakim is not here charged with idolatry, and probably he had not yet put Urijah the prophet to death, as we find afterwards he did, ch. xxvi. 22, 23, for then he would have been told of it here; but the crimes for which he is here reproved are,

1st. Pride and affectation of pomp and splendour, as if all the business of a king were to look great, and to do good were to be the least of his care. He must build him a stately palace, a wide house, and large chambers, ver. 14. He must have windows cut out after the newest fashion, perhaps like sash windows with us; the rooms must be ceiled with cedar, the richest sort of wood. His house must be as well-roofed and wainscoted as the temple itself, or else it will not please him, 1 Kin. vi. 15, 16; nay, it must exceed that, for it must be painted with minium, or vermilion, which dyes red, or, as some read it, with indigo, which dyes blue. No doubt it is lawful for princes and great men to build, and beautify, and furnish their houses, so as is agreeable to xxi. 11—14. "The house of the king of Judah" and the "house of David" were the royal family. The injunction to "execute judgment in the morning" is peculiar, and it has therefore been understood to mean "promptly" or "speedily." It may be literally understood. The morning was the proper time for judicial proceedings, and it was the daily duty of the judge or magistrate to be at his post early day by day to administer justice. Why is Jerusalem called "inhabitant of the valley" and "rock of the plain?" It is probable that these expressions must be taken to include the whole city, upper and lower. The valley is known by recent excavations to have been deep and extensive, and the "rock of the plain" was a comparatively level ascent and elevation. The level summit was reached by a slope and not by a precipice. In fact, the word for "plain" merely means level ground.

xxii. 1. This chapter must refer to an earlier date than chapter xxi.; and the king of Judah mentioned in the first verses can only be their dignity; but he that knows what is in man knew that Jehoiakim did this in the pride of his heart, which makes that to be sinful, exceeding sinful, which is in itself lawful. Those, therefore, that are enlarging their houses, and making them more sumptuous, have need to look well to the frame of their own spirits in the doing of it, and carefully to watch against all the workings of vainglory. But that which was particularly amiss in Jehoiakim's case was, that he did this when he could not but perceive, both by the word of God and by his providence, that Divine judgments were breaking in upon him. He reigned his first three years by the permission and allowance of the king of Egypt, and all the rest by the permission and allowance of the king of Babylon; and yet he that was no better than a viceroy will covet to vie with the greatest monarch in buildings and furniture. Observe how peremptory he is in this resolution, "I will build me a wide house," I am resolved I will, whoever advises me to the contrary. Note, It is the common folly of those that are sinking in their estates to covet to make a fair show. Many have unhumbled hearts under humbling providences, and look most haughty then when God is bringing them down. This is striving with our Maker.

2nd. Carnal security and confidence in his wealth, depending upon the continuance of his prosperity, as if his mountain now stood so strong that it could never be moved. He thought he must reign without any disturbance or interruption, because he had closed himself in cedar, ver. 15, as if that were too fine to be assaulted, and too strong to be broken through, and as if God himself could not for pity give up such a stately house as that to be burned. Thus, when Christ spoke of the destruction of the temple, his disciples came to him to shew him what a magnificent structure it was, Mat. xxiii. 38; xxiv. 1. Note, Those wretchedly deceive themselves that think their present prosperity is a lasting security, and dream of reigning, because they are enclosed in cedar. It is but in his own conceit that the rich man's wealth is his strong city.

3rd. Some think he is here charged with sacrilege, and robbing the house of God to beautify and adorn his own house. He 'cuts him out my windows,' so it is in the margin, which some understand as if he had taken windows out of the temple, to put into his own palace, and then painted them (as it follows) with vermilion, that it might not be discovered, but might look of a piece with his own building. Note, Those cheat themselves and ruin themselves at last, that think to enrich themselves by robbing God and his house; and, however they may disguise it, God discovers it.

4th. He is here charged with extortion and oppression, violence and injustice. He built his house by unrighteousness, that is, with money unjustly got, and materials which were not honestly come by, and perhaps upon ground obtained, as Ahab obtained Naboth's vineyard. And, because he went beyond what he could afford, he defrauded his workmen of their wages, which is one of the sins that cries in the ears of the Lord of hosts, Jas. v. 4. God takes notice of the wrong done by the greatest of men to their poor servants and labourers, and will repay them in justice that will not in justice pay those whom they employ, but use their neighbours' service without wages. Observe, The greatest of men must look upon the meanest as their neighbours, and be just to them accordingly, and love them as themselves. Jehoiakim was oppressive not only in his buildings, but in the administration of his government; he did not do justice, made no conscience of shedding innocent blood, when it was to serve the purposes of his ambition, avarice, and revenge. He was all for oppression and violence,—not to threaten it only, but to do it,—and when he was set upon any act of injustice, nothing should stop him, but he would go through with it; and that which was at the bottom of all was covetousness, that love of money which is the root of all evil. "Thine eyes and thine heart are not but for covetousness;" they were for that and for nothing else. Observe, In covetousness the heart walks after the eyes; it is therefore called the lust of the eye, 1 Jno. ii. 15; Job xxxi. 7; it is setting the eyes upon that which is not, Pr. xxiii. 5. The eyes and the heart are then for covetousness, when the aims and affections are wholly set upon the wealth of this world, and where they are so the temptation is strong to murder, oppression, and all manner of violence and villany.

5th. That which aggravated all his sins was, that he was the son of a good father, that had left him a good example, if he would but have followed it, ver. 15, 16, "Did not thy father eat and drink?" When Jehoiakim enlarged and enlightened his house it is probable he spoke scornfully of his father, for contenting himself with such a mean and inconvenient dwelling, below the grandeur of a sovereign prince, and ridiculed him as one that had a dull fancy, a low spirit, and could not find in his heart to lay out his money, nor cared for what was fashionable; that should not serve him which served his father. But God, by the prophet, tells him that his father, though he had not the spirit of building, was a man of an excellent spirit, a better man than he, and did better for himself and his family. Those children that despise their parents' old fashions commonly come short of their real excellences. Jeremiah tells him, First. That he was directed to do his duty by his father's practice. He did judgment and justice, he never did wrong to any of his subjects, never oppressed them or put any hardship upon them, but was careful to preserve all their just rights and properties. Nay, he not only did not abuse his power for the support of wrong, but he used it for the maintaining of right; he judged the cause of the poor and needy, was ready to hear the cause of the meanest of his subjects, and do them justice. Notice, The care of magistrates must be not to support their grandeur and take their ease, but to do good; not only not to oppress the poor themselves, but to defend those that are oppressed. Secondly. That he was encouraged to do his duty by his father's prosperity. 1*st.* God accepted him; "Was not this to know me? saith the Lord." Did he not hereby make it to appear that he rightly knew his God and worshipped him, and consequently was known and owned of him? Note, The right knowledge of God consists in doing our duty, particularly that which is the duty of our place and station in the world. 2*nd.* He himself had the comfort of it; "Did he not eat and drink" soberly and cheerfully, so as to fit himself for his business, "for strength, and not for drunkenness?" Eccl. x. 17; he did eat, and drink, and do judgment, not as perhaps Jehoiakim and his princes did, "drink and forget the law, and pervert the judgment of the afflicted," Pr. xxxi. 5. He did eat and drink, that is, God blessed him with great plenty, and he had the comfortable enjoyment of it himself, and gave handsome entertainments to his friends, was very hospitable and very charitable. It was Jehoiakim's pride that he had built a fine house, but Josiah's true praise that he kept a good house. Many times those have least in them of true generosity that have the greatest affection for pomp and grandeur, for, to support the extravagant expense of that, hospitality, bounty to the poor, yea, and justice itself, will be pinched. It is better to live with Josiah in an old-fashioned house and do good, than live with Jehoiakim in a stately house and leave debts unpaid. Josiah did justice and judgment, and then it was well with him, ver. 15, and it is repeated again, ver. 16. He lived very comfortably, his own subjects and all his neighbours respected him, and whatever he put his hand to prospered. Note, While we do well we may expect it will be well with us. This Jehoiakim knew, that his father found the way of duty to be the way of comfort, and yet would not tread in his steps. Note, It should engage us to keep up religion in our day that our godly parents kept it up in theirs, and recommended it to us from their own experience of the benefit of it. They told us that they had found the promises which godliness has of the life that now is made good to them, and that religion and piety is a friend to outward prosperity; so that we are inexcusable if we turn aside from that good way.

2. Here we have Jehoiakim's doom faithfully read, ver. 18, 19. We may suppose it was in the utmost peril of his own life that Jeremiah here foretold the shameful death of Jehoiakim, but, Thus saith the Lord concerning him, and therefore thus saith he. 1st. He shall die unlamented. He shall make himself so odious by his oppression and cruelty, that all about him shall be glad to part with him, and none shall do him the honour of dropping one tear for him, whereas his father, who did judgment and justice, was universally lamented; and it is promised to Zedekiah, that he should be lamented at his death, for he carried himself better than Jehoiakim had done, ch. xxxiv. 5. His relations shall not lament him, no, not with the common expressions of grief used at the funeral of the meanest, where they cried, "Ah, my brother! or, Ah, sister!" His subjects shall not lament him, nor cry out as they used to do at the graves of their princes, "Ah, Lord! or, Ah, his glory!" It is sad for any to live so that when they die none will be sorry to part with them. Nay, 2nd. He shall lie unburied. This is worse than the former. Even those that have no tears to grace the funerals of the dead with would willingly have them buried out of their sight; but Jehoiakim shall be "buried with the burial of an ass," that is, he shall have no burial at all, but his dead body shall be cast into a ditch, or upon a dunghill; it shall be drawn or dragged ignominiously, and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem. It is said in the story of Jehoiakim, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 6, that "Nebuchadnezzar bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon;" and Eze. xix. 9, that he was brought in chains to the king of Babylon. But it is very probable that he died a prisoner before he was carried away to Babylon as was intended; perhaps, died for grief, or in the pride of his heart hastened his own end, and for that reason was denied a decent burial, as self-murderers usually are with us. Josephus saith, that Nebuchadnezzar slew him at Jerusalem, and left his body thus exposed, somewhere at a great distance from the gates of Jerusalem. And it is said, 2 Kin. xxiv. 6, he slept with his fathers. When he built himself a stately house, no doubt he designed himself a stately sepulchre, but see how he was disappointed. Note, Those that are lifted up with great pride are commonly reserved for some great disgrace, in life or death.

This prophecy seems to have been calculated for the ungracious, inglorious reign of Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin, the son of Jehoiakim, who succeeded him in the government, reigned but three months, and was then carried captive to Babylon, where he lived many years, ch. lii. 31. We have in these verses a prophecy,

First. Of the desolations of the kingdom, which were now hastening on apace, ver. 20—23. Jerusalem and Judah are here spoken to, or the Jewish state, as a single person; and we have it here under a threefold character:

Jehoiakim, whose name occurs in verse 18 as then king, but destined to endure the deepest dishonour, and to come to a miserable and disgraceful end.

xxii. 6. Here, as in verse 1, "the house of the king of Judah" would seem to be the royal palace, not the family, as in xxi. 11. The expression, "Thou art Gilead unto me, and the head (or summit) of Lebanon," is metaphorical, and implies a comparison: "Although beautiful and elevated, thou shalt be desolate and destroyed."

xxii. 11. By Shallum it is almost certain that Jehoahaz is meant. He was deposed by Pharaoh-Necho, and carried captive into Egypt, where he died.

xxii. 14. "A wide house" is a spacious one; and the "large chambers" were what we call airy, supplied with "windows" or lattices for ventilation, the ceiling of cedar, and probably carved, as well as painted in brilliant colours, among which the red, here called vermilion, was conspicuous.

1. Very haughty in a day of peace and safety, ver. 21; "I spake unto thee in thy prosperity," spake by my servants the prophets, reproofs, admonitions, counsels, "but thou saidst, I will not hear," I will not heed; "Thou obeyedst not my voice," and wast resolved thou wouldst not, and hadst the front to tell me so. It is common for those that live at ease to live in contempt of the word of God. "Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked." This was so much the worse, that they had it by kind; "This has been thy manner from thy youth." They were called transgressors from the womb, Isa. xlix. 8.

2. Very timorous upon the alarms of trouble; ver. 20, When thou seest all thy lovers destroyed, when thou findest thine idols unable to help thee, and thy foreign alliances failing thee, thou wilt then go up to Lebanon, and cry, as one undone, and giving up all for lost, cry with a bitter cry; thou wilt cry, Help, help, or we are lost; thou wilt lift up thy voice in fearful shrieks upon Lebanon and Bashan, two high hills, in hope to be heard from thence by the advantage of the rising ground. Thou wilt cry from the passages, from the roads, where thou wilt ever and anon be in distress. Thou wilt cry from Abarim, so some read it, as a proper name, a famous mountain in the border of Moab. Thou wilt cry as those that are in great consternation use to do, to all about thee; but in vain, for, ver. 22, "The wind shall eat up all thy pastors or rulers," that should protect and lead thee, and provide for thy safety. They shall be blasted, and withered, and brought to nothing, as buds and blossoms are by a bleak or freezing wind. They shall be devoured suddenly, insensibly, and irresistibly, as fruits by the wind. "Thy lovers," that thou dependest upon, and hast an affection for, "shall go into captivity," and shall be so far from saving thee, that they shall not be able to save themselves.

3. Very tame under the heavy and lasting pressures of trouble. When there appears no relief from any of thy confederates, and thy own priests are at a loss, "then shalt thou be ashamed and confounded for all thy wickedness," ver. 22. Note, Many will never be ashamed of their sins, till they are brought by them to the last extremity; and it is well if we get this good by our straits, by them to be brought to confusion for our sins. The Jewish state is here called an inhabitant of Lebanon, because that famous forest was within their border, ver. 23, and all their country was wealthy and well guarded, as with Lebanon's natural fastnesses; but so proud and haughty were they, that they are said to make their nest in the cedars, where they thought themselves out of the reach of all danger, and whence they looked with contempt upon all about them. But "how gracious wilt thou be when pangs come upon thee!" Then thou wilt humble thyself before God, and promise amendment. When thou art overthrown in stony places, thou wilt be glad to hear those words which in thy prosperity thou wouldst not hear, Ps. cxli. 6. Then thou wilt endeavour to make thyself acceptable with that God whom before thou madest light of. Note, Many have their pangs of piety, who, when the pangs are over, shew they have no true piety. Some give another sense of it: What will all thy pomp, and state, and wealth avail thee? What will become of it all, or what comfort shalt thou have of it, when thou shalt be in these distresses? No more than a woman in travail, full of pains and fears, can take comfort in her ornaments, while she is in that condition; so Mr. Gataker. Note, Those that are proud of their worldly advantages would do well to consider how they will look when pangs come upon them, and how they will then have lost all their beauty.

Secondly. Here is a prophecy of the disgrace of the king. His name was Jeconiah, but he is here once again called Coniah, in contempt; the prophet shortens, or nicks his name, and gives him, as we say, a nick-name, perhaps to note that he should be despoiled of his dignity, that his reign should be shortened, and the number of his months cut off in the midst. Two instances of dishonour are here put upon him:

1. He shall be carried away into captivity, and shall spend and end his days in bondage. He was born to a crown, but it should quickly fall from his head, and he should exchange it for fetters. Observe the steps of this judgment.

1st. God will abandon him, ver. 24. The God of truth saith it, and confirms it with an oath; "Though he were the signet upon my right hand," his predecessors have been so, and he might have been so, if he had carried himself well, but he being degenerated, "I will pluck him thence." The godly kings of Judah had been as signets on God's right hand, near and dear to him,—he had gloried in them, and made use of them as instruments of his government, as the prince doth of his signet ring, or sign manual; but Coniah has made himself utterly unworthy of the honour, and therefore the privilege of his birth shall be no security to him; notwithstanding that he shall be thrown off. Answering to this threatening against Jeconiah is God's promise to Zerubbabel, when he made him his people's guide in their return out of captivity, Hag. ii. 23, "I will take thee, O Zerubbabel, my servant, and make thee as a signet." Those that think themselves as signets on God's right hand must not be secure, but fear lest they be plucked thence.

2nd. The king of Babylon shall seize him. Those know not what enemies and mischiefs they lie exposed to, who have thrown themselves out of God's protection, ver. 25. The Chaldeans are here said to be such as had a spite to Coniah, they sought his life, no less than that they thought would satisfy their rage; and such as he had a dread of, they are those whose face thou fearest; which would make it the more terrible to him to fall into their hands, especially when it was God himself that gave him into their hands. And if God deliver him to them, who can deliver him from them?

3rd. He and his family shall be carried to Babylon, where they shall wear out the many tedious years of their lives in a miserable captivity; "He and his mother," ver. 26; "He and his seed," ver. 28; that is, he and all the royal family, for he had no children of his own when he went into captivity; or, he and the children in his loins; they shall all be cast out to another country, to a strange country, "a country where they were not born," nor such a country as that where they were born, "a land which they know not," in which they have no acquaintance, with whom to converse, or from whom to expect any kindness; thither they shall be carried, from a land where they were entitled to dominion, into a land where they shall be compelled to servitude. But have they no hopes of seeing their own country again? No, "to the land whereunto they desire to return, thither shall they not return," ver. 27. They carried themselves ill in it when they were in it, and therefore they shall never see it more. Jehoahaz was carried to Egypt, the land of the south, ver. 10, Jeconiah to Babylon, the land of the north, both far remote, the quite contrary way, and must never expect to meet again, nor either of them to breathe their native air again. Those that had abused the dominion they had over others were justly brought thus under the dominion of others. Those that had indulged and gratified their sinful desires by their oppression, luxury, and cruelty, were justly denied the gratification of their innocent desire to see their own native country again. We may observe something very emphatical in that part of this threatening, ver. 26; "In the country where ye were not born, there shall ye die." As there is a time to be born, and a time to die, so there is a place to be born in, and a place to die in. We know where we were born, but where we shall die we know not; it is enough that our God knows. Let it be our care that we die in Christ, and then it will be well with us wherever we die, though it should be in a far country.

4th. This shall render him very mean and despicable in the eyes of all his neighbours. They shall be ready to say, ver. 28, "Is this Coniah a despised, broken idol?" Yes, certainly he is, and much debased from what he was. First. Time was when he was dignified, nay, when he was almost deified. The people, who had seen his father lately deposed, were ready to adore him, when they saw him upon the throne; but now he is a despised, broken idol; that when it was whole was worshipped, but when it is rotten and broken is thrown by, and despised, and nobody regards it, or remembers what it has been. Note, What is idolized will first or last be despised and broken; what is unjustly honoured will be justly condemned, and rivals with God will be the scorn of man. Whatever we idolize we shall be disappointed in, and then shall despise. Secondly. Time was when he was delighted in, but now he is "a vessel in which is no pleasure," or to which there is no desire, either because grown out of fashion, or because cracked or dirtied, and so rendered unserviceable. Those whom God has no pleasure in will some time or other be so mortified, that men will have no pleasure in them.

2. He shall leave no posterity to inherit his honour. The prediction of this is ushered in with a solemn preface, ver. 29, "O earth, earth, earth, hear the word of the Lord." Let all the inhabitants of the world take notice of these judgments of God upon a nation and a family that had been near and dear to him, and from thence infer, that God is impartial in the administration of justice. Or, it is an appeal to the earth itself on which we tread, since those that dwell on earth are so deaf and careless, like that, Isa. i. 2, "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth." God's word, however slighted, will be heard; the earth itself will be made to hear it, and yield to it, when it and all the works that are therein shall be burnt up. Or, it is a call to men that mind earthly things, that are swallowed up in those things, and are inordinate in the pursuit of them; such have need to be called upon again and again, and a third time, to hear the word of the Lord. Or, it is a call to men considered as mortal, of the earth, and hastening to the earth again; we all are so, earth we are, dust we are, and in consideration of that are concerned to hear and regard the word of the Lord, that, though we are earth, we may be found among those whose names are written in heaven. Now that which is here to be taken notice of is, that Jeconiah is written childless, ver. 30; that is, as it follows, "No man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David." In him the line of David was extinct as a royal line. Some think he had children born in Babylon, because mention is made of his seed being cast out there, ver. 28, and that they died before him. We read in the genealogy, 1 Chr. iii. 17, of seven sons of Jeconiah Assir, that is, Jeconiah the captive, of which Salathiel is the first. Some think they were only his adopted sons, and that when it is said, Mat. i. 12, "Jeconiah begat Salathiel," no more is meant but that he bequeathed to him what claims and pretensions he had to the government; the rather, because Salathiel is called the son of Neri, Lu. iii. 27, of the house of Nathan, ver. 31. Whether he had children begotten, or only adopted, thus far he was childless, that none of his seed ruled as kings in Judah. He was the Augustulus of that empire, in whom it determined. Whoever are childless, it is God that writes them so; and those who take no care to do good in their days cannot expect to prosper in their days.

CHAPTER XXIII.

In this chapter the prophet, in God's name, is dealing his reproofs and threatenings. I. Among the careless princes, or pastors of the people, ver. 1, 2, yet promising to take care of the flock, which they had been wanting in their duty to, ver. 3—8. II. Among the wicked prophets and priests, whose ill character is here given at large in divers instances, especially their imposing upon the people with their pretended inspirations, at which the prophet is astonished, and for which they must expect to be punished, ver. 9—32. III. Among the profane people, who ridiculed God's prophets, and bantered them, ver. 33—40. When all have thus corrupted their way, they must all expect to be told faithfully of it.

WOE be unto the pastors
That destroy and scatter the sheep of my pasture!
Saith the LORD.
2 Therefore thus saith the LORD God of Israel
Against the pastors that feed my people;
Ye have scattered my flock, and driven them away,
And have not visited them:
Behold, I will visit upon you
The evil of your doings, saith the LORD.
3 And I will gather the remnant of my flock
Out of all countries whither I have driven them,
And will bring them again to their folds;
And they shall be fruitful and increase. [them:
4 And I will set up shepherds over them which shall feed
And they shall fear no more, nor be dismayed,
Neither shall they be lacking, saith the LORD.
5 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will raise unto David a righteous Branch,
And a King shall reign and prosper,
And shall execute judgment and justice in the earth.
6 In his days Judah shall be saved,
And Israel shall dwell safely:
And this is his name whereby he shall be called,
THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS.
7 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That they shall no more say, The LORD liveth,
Which brought up the children of Israel out of the land
8 But, the LORD liveth, [of Egypt;
Which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel

xxii. 20. Lebanon and Bashan are here put for lofty and conspicuous places, and such also must the so-called "passages" have been. This last word is by some understood to be a proper name, Abarim, and in any case is intended for the heights to the east of the Jordan. The "lovers" here and in verse 22 may include not only the favourers of Judah of the Hebrew race, but the Egyptians with whom they were allied.

xxii. 24. "Coniah, the son of Jehoiakim," was doubtless Jeconiah, or Jehoiachin, for he is known by all these names. (Compare chapter xxxvii. 1; Esther ii. 6; 2 Kings xxiv. 6.) He succeeded his father, Jehoiakim, but reigned only three months and a few days; as when the Babylonians returned to attack Jerusalem he surrendered, and was taken by them a captive to Babylon. A reference to 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9—11 will show that Jehoiachin or Coniah was not a good man, and was succeeded by his brother Zedekiah. It is curious that the art of engraving upon precious

Out of the north country, and from all countries whither
I had driven them;
And they shall dwell in their own land.

Here is, First. A word of terror to the negligent shepherds. The day is at hand when God will reckon with them concerning the trust and charge committed to them; "Woe be to the pastors," that is, to the rulers, both in church and state, who should be to those they are set over as pastors, to lead them, feed them, protect them, and take care of them. They are not owners of the sheep; God here calls them, "The sheep of my pasture," whom I am interested in, and have provided good pasture for; woe be to those therefore that are commanded to feed God's people, and pretend to do it, but instead of that they scatter the flock, and drive them away by their violence and oppression, and have not visited them, nor taken any care for their welfare, nor concerned themselves at all to do them good. In not visiting them, and doing their duty to them, they did in effect scatter them, and drive them away; the beasts of prey scattered them, and the shepherds are in the fault that should have kept them together. Woe be to them, when God will visit upon them the evil of their doings, and deal with them as they deserve. They would not visit the flock in a way of duty, and therefore God will visit them in a way of vengeance.

Secondly. Here is a word of comfort to the neglected sheep. Though the under shepherds take no care of them, no pains with them, but betray them, the chief Shepherd will look after them; "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord taketh me up." Though the interests of God's church in the world are neglected by those who should take care of them, and postponed to their own private secular interests, yet they shall not therefore sink. God will perform his promise, though those he employs do not perform their duty.

1. The dispersed Jews shall at length return to their own land, and be happily settled there under a good government, ver. 3, 4. Though there be but a remnant of God's flock left, a little remnant, that has narrowly escaped destruction, he will gather that remnant; will find them out wherever they are, and find out ways and means to bring them back "out of all countries whither I have driven them." It was the justice of God, for the sin of their shepherds, that dispersed them; but the mercy of God shall gather in the sheep, when the shepherds that betrayed them are cut off. They shall be brought to their former habitations, as sheep to their folds, and there they shall be fruitful, and increase in numbers. And though their former shepherds took no care of them, it doth not therefore follow that they shall have no more; if some have abused a sacred office, that is no good reason why it should be deposed; they destroyed the sheep, but "I will set shepherds over them which shall make it their business to feed them." Formerly they were continually exposed, and disturbed with some alarm or other; but now "they shall fear no more, nor be dismayed;" they shall be in no danger from without, in no fright from within. Formerly some or other of them were ever and anon picked up by the beasts of prey; but now none of them shall be lacking, none of them missing. Though the times may have been long bad with the church, it doth not follow that they will be ever so. Such pastors as Zerubbabel and Nehemiah were, though they lived not in the pomp that Jehoiakim and Jeconiah did, nor made such a figure, were as great blessings to the people as the other were plagues to them. The church's peace is not bound up in the pomp of her rulers.

2. Messiah the prince, that great and good Shepherd of the sheep, shall in the latter days be raised up to bless his church, and to be the glory of his people Israel, ver. 5, 6. The house of David seemed to be quite sunk and ruined by that threatening against Jeconiah, ch. xxii. 30, that none of his seed should ever sit upon the throne of David. But here is a promise which effectually secures the honour of the covenant made with David, notwithstanding; for by it the house will be raised out of its ruins to a greater lustre than ever, and shine brighter far than it did in Solomon himself. We have not so many prophecies of Christ in this book as we had in that of the prophet Isaiah; but here we have one, and a very illustrious one; of him doubtless the prophet here speaks, of him and of no other man. The first words intimate that it would be long ere this promise should have its accomplishment: "The days come," but they are not yet. "I shall see him, but not now;" but all the rest intimate that the accomplishment of it will be glorious.

1st. Christ is here spoken of as a branch from David, the Man, the Branch, Zec. iii. 8; his appearance mean, his beginnings small, like those of a bud or sprout, and his rise seemingly out of the earth, but growing to be green, to be great, to be loaded with fruits. A Branch from David's family, when it seemed to be a root in a dry ground, buried, and not likely to revive. Christ is the root and offspring of David, Rev. xxii. 16. In him doth the horn of David bud, Ps. cxxxii. 17, 18. He is a Branch of God's raising up, he sanctified him, and sent him into the world, gave him his commission and qualifications. He is a righteous Branch, for he is righteous himself, and through him many, even all that are his, are made righteous; as an Advocate, he is Jesus Christ the righteous.

2nd. He is here spoken of as his church's King. This Branch shall be raised as high as the throne of his father David, and there he shall reign and prosper, not as the kings that now were of the house of David, that went backward in all their affairs; no, he shall set up a kingdom in the world, that shall be victorious over all opposition. In the chariot of the everlasting Gospel he shall go forth, he shall go on conquering and to conquer. If God raise him up, he will prosper him, for he will own the work of his own hands; what is the good pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in the hands of those to whom it is committed. He shall prosper, for "he shall execute judgment and justice in the earth," all the world over, Ps. xcvi. 13. The present kings of the house of David were unjust and oppressive, and therefore no wonder they did not prosper; but Christ shall, by his Gospel, break the usurped power of Satan, institute a perfect rule of holy living, and, as far as it prevails, make all the world righteous. The effect of this shall be a holy security and serenity of mind in all his faithful, loyal subjects. "In his days," under his dominion, "Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely," that is, all the spiritual seed of believing Abraham, and praying Jacob, shall be protected from the curse of Heaven and the malice of hell; shall be privileged from the arrests of God's law, and delivered from the attempts of Satan's power; shall be saved from sin, the guilt and dominion of it, and then shall dwell safely, and be quiet from the fear of all evil: see Lu. i. 74, 75. Those that shall be saved hereafter from the wrath to come may dwell safely now; for "if God be for us, who can be against us?" In the days of Christ's government in the soul, when he is uppermost there, the soul dwells at ease.

3rd. He is here spoken of as "the Lord our Righteousness." Observe, First. Who and what he is. As God, he is Jehovah, the incommunicable name of God, speaking his eternity and self-existence; as Mediator, he is our righteousness; by making satisfaction to the justice of God for the sin of man, he has brought in an everlasting righteousness, and so made it over to us in the covenant of grace, that upon our believing consent to that covenant it becomes ours. His being Jehovah, our righteousness, implies that he is so our righteousness as no creature could be; he is a sovereign, all-sufficient, eternal righteousness. All our righteousness has its being from him, and by him it subsists, and we are made the righteousness of God in him. Secondly. The profession and declaration of this; "This is the name whereby he shall be called;" not only he shall be so, but he shall be known to be so. God shall call him by this name, for he shall appoint him to be our righteousness. By this name Israel shall call him, every true believer shall call him, and call upon him. That is our righteousness by which, as an allowed plea, we are justified before God, acquitted from guilt, and accepted into favour; and nothing else have we to plead but this, "Christ has died, yea, rather is risen again," and we have taken him for our Lord.

3. This great salvation, which will come to the Jews in the latter days of their state, after their return out of Babylon, shall be so illustrious as far to outshine the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt; ver. 7, 8, "They shall no more say, The Lord liveth that brought up Israel out of Egypt, but, The Lord liveth that brought them up out of the north." This we had before, ch. xvi. 14, 15; but here it seems to point more plainly than it did there to the days of the Messiah, and to compare not so much the two deliverances themselves, giving the preference to the latter, as the two states to which the church by degrees grew after those deliverances. Observe the proportions: just four hundred and eighty years after they were come out of Egypt Solomon's temple was built, 1 Kin. vi. 1, and at that time that nation, which was so wonderfully brought out of Egypt, was gradually arrived to its height, to its zenith; just four hundred and ninety years (seventy weeks) after they came out of Babylon, Messiah the prince set up the gospel temple, which was the greatest glory of that nation, that was so wonderfully brought out of Babylon: see Dan. ix. 24, 25. Now the spiritual glory of the second part of that nation, especially as transferred to the gospel church, is much more admirable and illustrious than all the temporal glory of the first part of it in the days of Solomon; for that was no glory compared with the glory which excelleth.

9 Mine heart within me is broken because of the prophets;
All my bones shake;
I am like a drunken man,
And like a man whom wine hath overcome,
Because of the LORD,
And because of the words of his holiness.
10 For the land is full of adulterers;
For because of swearing the land mourneth;
The pleasant places of the wilderness are dried up,
And their course is evil,
And their force is not right.
11 For both prophet and priest are profane;
Yea, in my house have I found their wickedness, saith the LORD.
12 Wherefore their way shall be unto them
As slippery ways in the darkness:
They shall be driven on, and fall therein:
For I will bring evil upon them,
Even the year of their visitation, saith the LORD.
13 And I have seen folly in the prophets of Samaria;
They prophesied in Baal, and caused my people Israel to err.
14 I have seen also in the prophets of Jerusalem an horrible thing:
They commit adultery, and walk in lies:
They strengthen also the hands of evildoers,
That none doth return from his wickedness:
They are all of them unto me as Sodom,
And the inhabitants thereof as Gomorrah
15 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts concerning the prophets;
Behold, I will feed them with wormwood,
And make them drink the water of gall:
For from the prophets of Jerusalem
Is profaneness gone forth into all the land.
16 Thus saith the LORD of hosts,
Hearken not unto the words of the prophets that prophesy unto you:
They make you vain:
They speak a vision of their own heart,
And not out of the mouth of the LORD
17 They say still unto them that despise me,
The LORD hath said, Ye shall have peace;
And they say unto every one that walketh after the imagination of his own heart,
No evil shall come upon you
18 For who hath stood in the counsel of the LORD,
And hath perceived and heard his word?
Who hath marked his word, and heard it?

stones, and skill to cut and polish them, should be implied in so many texts. At the present day these are among the most difficult operations of human handicraft, and the results very costly. Yet the nations of the old world were able, with resources more limited than ours, to produce works in this department which are even now thought admirable. The custom of wearing a signet or seal ring was also frequent in the case of nobles and kings, who used it to give validity to documents instead of writing their names.

xxii. 28. Our translators have departed from the Hebrew pointing in adopting the word "idol" here. In the common text the word means an earthen vessel. The word rendered "vessel" may mean any thing or article whatever; the idea being, "Is he a thing or article in which no pleasure is taken?"

xxii. 30. It has been often noticed that Coniah had seven sons, and that this expression, "Write ye this man childless," must be explained by what follows.

19 Behold, a whirlwind of the LORD is gone forth in fury,
Even a grievous whirlwind:
It shall fall grievously upon the head of the wicked
20 The anger of the LORD shall not return,
Until he have executed, and till he have performed
The thoughts of his heart:
In the latter days ye shall consider it perfectly 21 I have not sent these prophets, yet they ran:
I have not spoken to them, yet they prophesied.
22 But if they had stood in my counsel,
And had caused my people to hear my words,
Then they should have turned them from their evil way,
And from the evil of their doings.
23 Am I a God at hand, saith the LORD,
And not a God afar off?
24 Can any hide himself in secret places
That I shall not see him? saith the LORD.
Do not I fill heaven and earth? saith the LORD
25 I have heard what the prophets said,
That prophesy lies in my name,
Saying, I have dreamed, I have dreamed.
26 How long shall this be in the heart of the prophets that prophesy lies?
Yea, they are prophets of the deceit of their own heart;
27 Which think to cause my people
To forget my name by their dreams
Which they tell every man to his neighbour,
As their fathers have forgotten my name for Baal.
28 The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream;
And he that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully.
What is the chaff to the wheat? saith the LORD
29 Is not my word like as a fire? saith the LORD;
And like a hammer that breaketh the rock in pieces?
30 Therefore, behold, I am against the prophets, saith the LORD,
That steal my words every one from his neighbour.
31 Behold, I am against the prophets, saith the LORD,
That use their tongues, and say, He saith
32 Behold, I am against them that prophesy false dreams, saith the LORD,
And do tell them, and cause my people to err
By their lies, and by their lightness;
Yet I sent them not, nor commanded them: [LORD.
Therefore they shall not profit this people at all, saith the

Here is a long lesson for the false prophets. As none were more bitter and spiteful against God's true prophets than they, so there were none on whom the true prophets were more severe, and justly. The prophet had complained to God of those false prophets, ch. xiv. 13, and had often foretold that they should be involved in the common ruin, but here they have woes of their own.

First. He expresseth the deep concern that he was under upon this account, and what a trouble it was to him to see men, that pretended to a Divine commission and inspiration, ruining themselves, and the people among whom they dwelt, by their falsehood and treachery; ver. 9, "My heart within me is broken, I am like a drunken man." His head was in confusion with wonder and astonishment, his heart was under oppression with grief and vexation. Jeremiah was a man that laid things much to heart, and what was any way threatening to his country made a deep impression upon his spirits. He is here in trouble, 1. "Because of the prophets," and their sin, the false doctrine they preached, the wicked lives they lived; especially it filled him with horror, to hear them making use of God's name, and pretending to have their instructions from him. Never was the Lord so abused, and "the words of his holiness," as by these men. Note, The dishonour done to God's name, and the profanation of his holy word, is the greatest grief imaginable to a gracious soul. 2. "Because of the Lord," and his judgments, that by this means are brought in upon us like a deluge. He trembled to think of that ruin and desolation which was coming 'from the face of the Lord,' (so the word is,) 'and from the face of the word of his holiness,' which will be inflicted by the power of God's wrath, according to the threatenings of his word, confirmed by his holiness. Note, Those that have God for them yet cannot but tremble to think of the misery of those that have God against them.

Secondly. He laments the abounding abominable wickedness of the land, and the present tokens of God's displeasure they were under for it; ver. 10, "The land is full of adulterers," it is full both of spiritual and corporal whoredom; they go a whoring from God, and, having cast off the fear of him, no marvel that they abandon themselves to all manner of lewdness. And having dishonoured themselves and their own bodies, they dishonour God and his name by rash and false swearing, because of which "the land mourns." Both perjury and common swearing are sins for which a land must mourn in true repentance, or it will be made to mourn under the judgments of God. Their land mourned now under the judgment of famine; the pleasant places, or rather the pastures, or, as some read it, the habitations of the wilderness, are dried up for want of rain, and yet we see no signs of repentance; they answer not the end of the correction. The tenor and tendency of men's conversations is sinful, their course continues evil, as bad as ever, and they will not be diverted from it. They have a great deal of resolution, but it is turned the wrong way, are zealously affected, but not in a good thing; "their force is not right;" their heart is "fully set in them to do evil," and they are not "valiant for the truth," have not courage enough to break off their evil courses, though they see God thus contending with them.

Thirdly. He chargeth it all upon the prophets and priests, especially the prophets. They are both profane, ver. 11. The priests profane the ordinances of God they pretend to administer, the prophets profane the word of God they pretend to deliver; their converse and all their conversation are profane, and then it is not strange that the people are so debauched. They both play the hypocrite, so some read it; under sacred pretensions they carry on the vilest designs; yea, not only in their own houses, and the ill houses they frequent, but "in my house have I found their wickedness;" in the temple, where the priests ministered, where the prophets prophesied, there were they guilty both of idolatry and immorality. See a woful instance in Hophni and Phinehas, 1 Sam. ii. 21. God searcheth his house, and what wickedness is there he will find it out; and the nearer it is to him the more offensive it is. Two things are charged upon them:

1. That they taught people to sin by their examples. He compares them with the prophets of Samaria, the head city of the kingdom of the ten tribes, which had been long since laid waste. It was the folly of the prophets of Samaria, that "they prophesied in Baal," in Baal's name, so Ahab's prophets did, and so they "caused my people Israel to err," to forsake the service of the true God, and to worship Baal, ver. 13. Now the prophets of Jerusalem did not do so, they prophesied in the name of the true God, and valued themselves upon that, that they were not like the prophets of Samaria, who prophesied in Baal; but what the better, when they debauched the nation as much by their immoralities as the other had done by their idolatries? It is a "horrible thing in the prophets of Jerusalem," that they make use of the name of the holy God, and yet wallow in all manner of impurity; they make nothing of committing adultery, they make use of the name of the God of truth, and yet walk in lies; they not only prophesy lies, but in their common conversation one cannot believe a word they say. It is all either jest and banter or fraud and design. Thus they encourage sinners to go on in their wicked ways; for every one will say, Surely we may do as the prophets do; who can expect that we should be better than our teachers? By this means it is that none doth return from his wickedness; but they all say they shall have peace, though they go on, for their prophets tell them so. By this means Judah and Jerusalem are become as Sodom and Gomorrah, that were wicked, and sinners before the Lord exceedingly; and God looked upon them accordingly as fit for nothing but to be destroyed, as they were, by fire and brimstone.

2. That they encouraged people in sin, by their false prophecies. They made themselves believe there was no harm, no danger in sin, and practised accordingly, and then no marvel they made others believe so too; ver. 16, "They speak a vision of their own heart;" it is the product of their own invention, and agrees with their own inclination, but it is "not out of the mouth of the Lord;" he never dictated it to them, nor doth it agree either with the law of Moses or with what God has spoken by other prophets. They tell sinners it shall be well with them, though they persist in their sins, ver. 18. See here who they are that they encourage—those that despise God, that slight his authority, and have low and mean thoughts of his institutions, and those that "walk after the imagination of their own heart," that are worshippers of idols, and slaves to their own lusts. Those that are devoted to their pleasures put contempt upon their God. Yet see how these prophets caressed and flattered them. They should have been still saying, There is no peace to them that go on in their evil ways; those that despise God shall be lightly esteemed; woe, and a thousand woes to them; but they still said, "Ye shall have peace, no evil shall come upon you." And, which was worst of all, they told them God had said so, so making him to patronise sin, and to contradict himself. Note, Those that are resolved to go on in their evil ways will justly be given up to believe the strong delusions of those that tell them they shall have peace, though they go on.

Fourthly. God disowns all that these false prophets said to soothe people up in their sins; ver. 21, "I have not sent these prophets." They never had any mission from God, they were not only not sent by him on this errand, but they were never sent by him on any errand, he never had employed them in any service or business for him; and as to this matter, whereas they pretended to have instructions from him to assure this people of peace, he declares he never gave them any such instructions; yet they were very forward, they ran; they were very bold, they prophesied without any of that difficulty with which the true prophets sometimes struggled. They said to sinners, "You shall have peace;" but, ver. 18, "Who hath stood in the counsel of the Lord?" that is, who of you hath, that are so confident of this? You deliver this message with a great deal of assurance; but have you consulted God about it? No, you never considered whether it be agreeable to the discoveries God has made of himself, whether it will consist with the honour of his holiness and justice, to let sinners go unpunished? You have not perceived and heard his word, nor marked that, you have not compared this with the Scripture; if you had taken notice of that, and of the constant tenor of it, you would never have delivered such a message. The prophets themselves must try the spirits by the touchstone of the law and of the testimony, as well as those to whom they prophesy. But which of those did so that prophesied of peace? That they did not stand in God's counsel, nor hear his word, is proved afterwards; ver. 22, "If they had stood in my counsel," as they pretend, 1. They would have made the Scriptures their standard; "They would have caused my people to hear my words," and would have conscientiously kept close to them. But not speaking according to that rule, it is a plain evidence there is no light in them. 2. They would have made the conversion of souls their business, and would have aimed at that in all their preaching. They would have done all they could to turn people from their evil way in general, and from all the particular evil of their doings. They would have encouraged and assisted the reformation of manners, would have made this their scope in all their preaching, to part between men and their sins; but it appeared this was a thing they never aimed at, but on the contrary to encourage sinners in their sins. 3. They would have had some seals of their ministry. This sense our translation gives it, "If they had stood in my counsel," and the words they preached had been my words, "then they should have turned them from their evil way." A Divine power should have gone along with the word, for the conviction of sinners. God will own his own institutions. Yet this is no certain rule: Jeremiah himself, though God sent him, prevailed with but few to turn from their evil way.

Fifthly. God threatens to punish these prophets for their wickedness. They promised the people peace, and, to shew them the folly of that, God tells them they should have no peace themselves. They were very unfit to warrant the xxiii. 1—4. That "pastors" here are not only spiritual directors, as priests, but kings and others in authority, ought to be observed, though it is often overlooked.

xxiii. 5, 6. The reference to the Messiah in this passage has been long accepted. It is recognised in the Jewish Targum, "I will raise up unto David the Messiah of the righteous," and is advocated by various Hebrew writers. Instead of "the Lord our righteousness," the Greek has "Josedec" as a proper name, with the same meaning.

xxiii. 7, 8. The sense is that the time should come when the redemption from Egypt only would not be thought of, but when a deliverance from many lands would be commemorated. This is regarded by some as pointing to a still future return of Israel to Palestine; but others think it refers to the past, and see its fulfilment in the termination of the Babylonian captivity, and a return from other distant countries.

xxiii. 9. The Latin Vulgate treats this as a new section: "To the people, and pass their word to them that no evil shall come upon them, when all evil is coming upon themselves, and they are not aware of it, ver. 12. Because the prophets and priests are profane, "therefore their way shall be unto them as slippery ways in the darkness." They that undertake to lead others, because they mislead them, and know they do so, they shall themselves have no comfort in their way. 1. They pretend to shew others the way, but they shall themselves be in the dark, or in a mist, their light or sight shall fail, so that they shall not be able to look before them, shall have no forecast for themselves. 2. They pretend to give assurance to others, but they themselves shall find no firm footing, their ways shall be to them as slippery ways, in which they shall not go with any steadiness, safety, or satisfaction. 3. They pretend to make the people easy with their flatteries, but they shall themselves be uneasy. They shall be driven, forced forward as captives, or making their escape as those that are pursued; and they shall fall in the way by which they hoped to escape, and so fall into the enemies' hand. 4. They pretend to prevent the evil that threatens others, but God will "bring evil upon them, even the year of their visitation," the time fixed for calling them to an account; and such a time is fixed concerning all that do not judge themselves; and it will be an evil time. The year of visitation is the year of recompences. It is farther threatened, ver. 15, "I will feed them with wormwood," or poison, with that which is not only nauseous but noxious, and "make them drink waters of gall," or, as some read it, 'juice of hemlock:' see ch. ix. 15. And justly is the cup of trembling put into their hand first; for from the prophets of Jerusalem, that should have been patterns of piety, and every thing that is praiseworthy, even from them, is profaneness gone forth into all the lands. Nothing more effectually debaucheth a nation than the debauchery of ministers.

Sixthly. The people are here warned not to give any credit to these false prophets, for, though they flattered them with hopes of impunity, the judgments of God would certainly break out against them unless they repented, ver. 16. Take notice what God saith, and "hearken not to the words of these prophets;" for you will find in the issue God's word shall stand, and not theirs. God's word will make you serious, but they make you vain, feed you with vain hopes, which will fail you at last. They tell you, no evil shall come upon you; but hear what God saith, ver. 19, "Behold a whirlwind of the Lord is gone forth in fury;" they tell you, all shall be calm and serene; but God tells you, there is a storm coming, a whirlwind of the Lord, of his sending, and therefore there is no standing before it; it is a whirlwind raised by Divine wrath, it is gone forth in fury, a wind that is brought forth out of the treasuries of Divine vengeance, and therefore it is a grievous whirlwind, and shall light heavy, with rain and hail upon the head of the wicked, which they cannot avoid, nor find any shelter from. It shall fall upon the wicked prophets themselves that deceived the people, and the wicked people that suffered themselves to be deceived. A horrible temple shall be the portion of their cup, Ps. xi. 6. This sentence is bound on as irreversible; ver. 20, "The anger of the Lord shall not return," for the decree is gone forth, God will not alter his mind, nor suffer his anger to be turned away till he have executed the sentence and performed the thoughts of his heart. God's whirlwind, when it comes down from heaven, returneth not thither, but accomplisheth that for which he sent it, Isa. lv. 11. This they will not consider now, but "in the latter days ye shall consider it perfectly;" 'consider it with understanding,' so the word is, or with consideration. Note, Those that will not fear the threatenings shall feel the execution of them, and will then perfectly understand, what they will not now admit the evidence of, what a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of a just and jealous God. They that will not consider in time will be made to consider when it is too late. "Son, remember."

Seventhly. Divers things are here offered to the consideration of these false prophets for their conviction, that if possible they might be brought to recant their error, and acknowledge the cheat they had put upon God's people.

1. Let them consider that, though they may impose upon men, God is too wise to be imposed upon. Men cannot see through their fallacies, but God can and doth. Here,

1st. God asserts his own omnipresence and omniscience in general, ver. 23, 24. When they told the people that no evil should befall them, though they went on in their evil ways, they went upon atheistical principles,—That the Lord doth not see their sin, that he cannot judge through the dark cloud, that he will not require it; and therefore they must be taught the first principles of their religion, and confronted with the most incontestable self-evident truths. First. That though God's throne is prepared in the heavens, and this earth seems to be at a distance from him, yet he is a God here in this lower world which seems to be afar off, as well as in the upper world which seems to be at hand, ver. 23. The eye of God is the same on earth that it is in heaven; here it runs to and fro as well as there, 2 Chr. xvi. 9. And what is in the minds of men, whose spirits are veiled in flesh, is as clearly seen by him as what is in the mind of angels, those unveiled spirits above that surround his throne. The power of God is the same on earth among the inhabitants of that that it is in heaven among the armies of that; with us nearness and distance make a great difference both in our observations and our operations: but it is not so with God; to him darkness and light, at hand and afar off, are both alike. Secondly. That how ingenious and industrious soever men are to disguise themselves, and their own characters and counsels, they cannot possibly be concealed from God's all-seeing eye; ver. 24, "Can any hide himself in the secret places" of the earth, "that I shall not see him?" Can any hide his projects and intentions in the secret places of the heart, that I shall not see them? No arts of concealment can hide men from the eye of God, nor deceive his judgment of them. Thirdly. That he is everywhere present. He doth not only rule heaven and earth, and uphold both by his universal providence, but he fills heaven and earth by his essential presence, Ps. cxxxix. 7, &c. No place can either include him or exclude him.

2nd. He applies this to these prophets, that had a notable art of disguising themselves; ver. 25, 26, "I have heard what the prophets said that prophesy lies in my name." They thought he was so wholly taken up with the other world, that he had no leisure to take cognizance of what passed in this; but God will make them know that he knows all their impostures, all the shams they have put upon the world under colour of Divine revelation. What they intended to humour the people with, they pretended to have had from God in a dream, when there was no such thing; this they could not discover. If a man tell me he dreamed so and so, I cannot contradict him, he knows I cannot; but God discovered the fraud. Perhaps the false prophets whispered what they had to say in the ears of such as were their confidants, saying, So and so I have dreamed; but God overheard them. The heart-searching eye of God traced them in all the methods they took to deceive the people, and he cries out, How long? Shall I always bear with them? 'Is it in the heart of these prophets' (so some read it) 'to be ever prophesying lies, and prophesying the deceit of their own heart?' Will they never see what an affront they put upon God, what an abuse they put upon the people, and what judgments they are preparing for themselves?

2. Let them consider that their palming upon people counterfeit revelations, and fathering their own fancies upon Divine inspiration, was the ready way to bring all religion into contempt, and make men turn atheists and infidels; and this was the thing they really intended, though they frequently made mention of the name of God, and prefaced all they said with, "Thus saith the Lord." Yet, saith God, "They think to cause my people to forget my name by their dreams;" they designed to draw people off from the worship of God, from all regard to God's laws and ordinances and the true prophets, as their fathers forgot God's name for Baal. Note, The great thing Satan aims at is to make people forget God, and all that whereby he has made himself known; and he has many subtle methods to bring them to this: sometimes he doth it by setting up false gods, (bring men in love with Baal, and they soon forget the name of God;) sometimes by misrepresenting the true God, as if he were altogether such a one as ourselves. Pretences to new revelation may prove as dangerous to religion as the denying of all revelation; and false prophets in God's name, may perhaps do more mischief to the power of godliness than false prophets in Baal's name, as being less guarded against.

3. Let them consider what a vast difference there was between their prophecies and those that were delivered by the true prophets of the Lord; ver. 28, "The prophet that has a dream," which was that way of inspiration that the false prophets most pretended to, if he has a dream, 'let him tell it as a dream,' so Mr. Gataker reads it; let him lay no more stress upon it than men men do upon their dreams, nor expect any more regard to be had to it; let them not say it is from God, nor call their foolish dreams Divine oracles; but let the true prophet that has my word speak my word faithfully, speak it as a truth, so some read it; let him keep close to his instructions, and you will soon perceive a vast difference between the dreams that the false prophets tell and the Divine dictates which the true prophets deliver. He that pretends to have a message from God, whether by dream or voice, let him declare it, and it will easily appear which is of God and which is not. Those that have spiritual senses exercised will be able to distinguish; for "what is the chaff to the wheat?" The promises of peace which these prophets make to you are no more to be compared to God's promises than chaff to wheat. Men's fancies are light, and vain, and worthless, as the chaff which the wind drives away. But the word of God hath substance in it, it is of value, is food for the soul, the bread of life. Wheat was the staple commodity of Canaan, that valley of vision, Deu. viii. 8; Eze. xxvii. 16. There is as much difference between the vain fancies of men and the pure word of God as between the chaff and the wheat. It follows, ver. 29, "Is not my word like a fire, saith the Lord?" Is their word so? Has it the power and efficacy that the word of God has? No, nothing like it; there is no more comparison than between painted fire and real fire. Theirs is like an ignis fatuus,—'a deceiving meteor,' leading men into bypaths and upon dangerous precipices. Note, The word of God is like fire. The law was a fiery law, Deu. xxxiii. 2; and of the Gospel, Christ saith, "I am come to send fire on the earth," Lu. xii. 49. Fire has different effects, according as the matter is on which it works; it hardens clay, but softens wax; it consumes the dross, but purifies the gold: so the word of God is to some "a savour of life unto life, to others of death unto death." God appeals here to the consciences of those to whom the word was sent, "Is not my word like fire?" Has it not been so to you? Zec. i. 6; speak as you have found. It is compared likewise to "a hammer, breaking the rock in pieces." The unhumbled heart of man is like a rock; if it will not be melted by the word of God as the fire, it will be broken to pieces by it as the hammer. Whatever opposition is given to the word, it will be borne down and broken to pieces.

4. Let them consider, that while they went on in this course God was against them. Three times they are told this; ver. 30—32, "Behold, I am against the prophets." They pretended to be for God, and make use of his name, but were really against him; he looks upon them as they were really, and is against them. How can they be long safe, or at all easy, that have a God of almighty power against them? While these prophets were promising peace to the people, God was proclaiming war against them. They stand indicted here,

1st. For robbery. They "steal my word every one from his neighbour." Some understand it of that word of God which the good prophets preached they stole their sermons, their expressions, and mingled them with their own, as hucksters mingle bad wares with some good to make them vendible. Those that were strangers to the spirit of the true prophets mimicked their language, picked up some good sayings of theirs, and delivered them to the people as if they had been their own, but with an ill grace; it was not of a piece with the rest of their discourses. "The legs of the lame are not equal; so is a parable in the mouth of fools," Pr. xxvi. 7. Others understand it of the word of God, as it was received and entertained by some of the people; they stole it out of their hearts, as the wicked one in the parable is said to steal the good seed of the word, Mat. xiii. 19. By their insinuations they diminished the authority, and so weakened the efficacy, of the word of God upon the minds of those that seemed to be under convictions by it.

2nd. They stand indicted for counterfeiting the broad seal. Therefore God is against them, ver. 31, because they use their tongues at their pleasure; in their discourses to the people they say what they themselves think fit, and then father it upon God, pretend they had it from him, and say, He saith it. Some read it, 'They smooth their tongues,' they are very complaisant to the people, and say nothing but what is pleasing and plausible; they never reprove them, or threaten them, but their words are smoother than butter. Thus they ingratiate themselves with them, and get money by them; and they have the impudence and impiety to make God the patron of their lies, they say, He saith so. What greater indignity can be done to the God of truth than to lay the brats of the father of lies at his door?

3rd. They stand indicted as common cheats, ver. 32. "I am against them, for they prophesy false dreams," pretending that to be a Divine inspiration which is but an invention of their own. This is a horrid fraud; nor will it excuse them to say, Caveat emptor,—'Let the buyer take care of himself;' and Si populus vult decipi, decipiatur,—'If people will be deceived let them.' No; it is the people's fault that they err, that they take things upon trust, and do not try the spirits; but it is much more the prophets' fault that they cause God's people to err by their lies, and by their lightness, by the flatteries of their preaching, soothing them up in their sins, and by the looseness and lewdness of their conversation encouraging them to persist in them. First. God disowns their having any commission from him; "I sent them not, nor commanded them." They are not God's messengers, nor is what they say his message. Secondly. He therefore justly denies his blessing with them. "Therefore they shall not profit this people at all." All the profit they aim at is to make them easy; but they shall not so much as do that, for God's providences will at the same time be making them uneasy. They do not profit this people, so some read it; and more is implied than is expressed: they not only do them no good, but do them a great deal of hurt. Note, Those that corrupt the word of God, while they pretend to preach it, are so far from edifying the church that they do it the greatest mischief imaginable.

33 And when this people,
Or the prophet, or a priest, shall ask thee, saying,
What is the burden of the LORD?

prophets. "My heart," &c. Boothroyd and Henderson, and various German authors, regard it similarly: "Concerning the prophets." The Hebrew agrees with the common translation.

xxiii. 10. "Swearing" is not correct here, nor "cursing" (which the margin suggests), the allusion being to the "curse" which "adultery," or idolatry, had brought. "The pleasant places of the wilderness" also should be changed into "the pastures of the wilderness," for such is the true sense of the expression.

xxiii. 13. The prophets of Samaria prophesied in Baal; that is, in his service or in his name, as false prophets of a false god.

xxiii. 15. Wormwood is not uncommon in Palestine, and is here the symbol of what is nauseous. For "water of gall" we must read "poisoned water."

xxiii. 16. The rendering "they make you vain" is misleading, as the idea is that of befooling or leading astray. Henderson renders, "they seduce you to vanity."

Thou shalt then say unto them, What burden?
I will even forsake you, saith the LORD.
34 And as for the prophet, and the priest, and the people,
That shall say, The burden of the LORD,
I will even punish that man and his house.
35 Thus shall ye say every one to his neighbour,
And every one to his brother,
What hath the LORD answered?
And, What hath the LORD spoken?
36 And the burden of the LORD shall ye mention no more:
For every man's word shall be his burden;
For ye have perverted the words of the living God,
Of the LORD of hosts our God.
37 Thus shalt thou say to the prophet,
What hath the LORD answered thee?
And, What hath the LORD spoken?
38 But since ye say, The burden of the LORD;
Therefore thus saith the LORD;
Because ye say this word, The burden of the LORD,
And I have sent unto you, saying,
Ye shall not say, The burden of the LORD;
39 Therefore, behold, I, even I, will utterly forget you,
And I will forsake you,
And the city that I gave you and your fathers,
And cast you out of my presence:
40 And I will bring an everlasting reproach upon you,
And a perpetual shame, which shall not be forgotten.

The profaneness of the people, with that of the priests and prophets, is here reproved in a particular instance, which may seem of small moment in comparison with their greater crimes; but profaneness in a common discourse, and the debauching of the language of a nation, being a notorious evidence of the prevalency of wickedness in it, we are not to think it strange that this matter was so largely and warmly insisted upon here. Observe,

First. The sin here charged upon them is bantering God's prophets, and the dialect they used, and jesting with sacred things. They asked, "What is the burthen of the Lord?" ver. 33, and ver. 34, and they say, "The burthen of the Lord," ver. 38. This was the word that gave great offence to God, that whenever they spake of "the word of the Lord," they called it in scorn and derision, "the burthen of the Lord." Now, 1. This was a word that the prophets much used, and used it seriously, to shew what a weight the word of God was upon their spirits, of what importance it was, and how pressingly it should come upon those that heard it. The words of the false prophets had nothing ponderous in them; but God's words had: those were as chaff, these as wheat. Now the profane scoffers took this word and made a jest and a byword of it; they made people merry with it, that so, when the prophets used it, they might not make people serious with it. Note, It has been the artifice of Satan in all ages to obstruct the efficacy of sacred things by turning them into matter of sport and ridicule. The mocking of God's messengers was the baffling of his messages. 2. Perhaps this word was caught at and reproached by the scoffers as an improper word, newly coined by the prophets, and not used in that sense by any classic author. It was only in this and the last age that "the word of the Lord" was called "the burthen of the Lord," and it could not be found in their lexicons to have that signification. But if men take a liberty, as we see they do, to form new phrases, which they think more expressive and significant in other parts of learning, why not in divinity? But especially we must observe it as a rule, that the Spirit of God is not tied to our rules of speaking. 3. Some think that, because when the word of the Lord is called a "burthen" it signifies some word of reproof and threatening, which would lay load upon the hearers, (yet I know not whether that observation will always hold,) therefore in using this word, "the burthen of the Lord," in a canting way, they reflected upon God as always bearing hard upon them, always teazing them, always frightening them, and so making the word a perpetual uneasiness to them. They make the word of God a burthen to themselves, and then quarrel with the ministers for making it a burthen to them. Thus the scoffers of the latter days, while they slight heaven and salvation, reproach faithful ministers for preaching hell and damnation. Upon the whole we may observe that, how light soever men may make of it, the great God takes notice of, and is much displeased with, those that burlesque sacred things, and, that they may make a jest of Scripture truth and laws, put jests upon Scripture language. In such wit as this I am sure there is no wisdom, and so it will appear at last. "Be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong." Those that were here guilty of this sin were some of the false prophets, who perhaps came to steal the word of God from the true prophets; some of the priests, who perhaps came to seek occasions against them on which to ground an information; and some of the people who had learned of the profane priests and prophets to play with the things of God. The people would not have affronted the prophet and his God thus, if the priests and the prophets—those ringleaders of mischief—had not shewn them the way.

Secondly. When they are reproved for this profane way of speaking, they are directed how to express themselves more decently. We do not find that the prophets are directed to make no more use of this word; we find it used long after this, Zec. ix. 1; Mal. i. 1; Nah. i. 1; Hab. i. 1; and we do not find it once used in this sense by Jeremiah, either before or after. It is true indeed that in many cases it is advisable to make no use of such words and things as some have made an ill use of, and it may be prudence to avoid such phrases, as, though innocent enough, are in danger of being perverted and made stumblingblocks. But here God will have the prophet stick to his rule, ch. xv. 19, "Let them return unto thee, but return not thou unto them." Do not thou leave off using this word, but let them leave off abusing it. Ye "shall not mention the burthen of the Lord any more" in this profane, careless manner, ver. 36, for it is "perverting the words of the living God," and making an ill use of them, which is an impious, dangerous thing, for consider he is "the Lord of hosts our God." Note, If we will but look upon God as we ought to do in his greatness and goodness, and be but duly sensible of our relation and obligation to him, it may be hoped, we will not dare to affront him by making a jest of his words. It is an impudent thing to abuse him that is the living God, the Lord of hosts, and our God. How then must they express themselves? He tells them, ver. 37, Thus "shalt thou say to the prophet," when thou art inquiring of him, "What hath the Lord answered thee? And what hath the Lord spoken?" And, ver. 35, they must say thus when they inquire of their neighbours. Note, We must always speak of the things of God reverently and seriously, and as becomes the oracles of God. It is a commendable practice to inquire after the mind of God, to inquire of our brethren what they have heard, to inquire of our prophets what they have to say from God; but then, to shew that we do it for a right end, we must do it after a right manner. Ministers may learn here, when they reprove people for what they say and do amiss, to teach them how to say and do better.

Thirdly. Because they would not leave off this ill way of speaking, though they were admonished of it, God threatens them here with utter ruin. They would still say, "The burthen of the Lord," though God had sent to them to forbid them, ver. 38. What little regard have those to the Divine authority that will not be persuaded by it to leave an idle word. But see what will come of it:

1. Those shall be severely reckoned with that thus pervert the words of God, that put a wrong construction on them, and make an ill use of them; and it shall be made to appear what a great provocation it is to God to mock his messengers. "I will even punish that man and his house;" whether he be prophet or priest, or one of the common people, it shall be visited upon him, ver. 34. Perverting God's word, and ridiculing the preachers of it, is a sin that brings ruining judgments upon families, and entails a curse upon a house. Another threatening we have, ver. 36, "Every man's word shall be his own burthen," that is, the guilt of this sin shall be so heavy upon him as to sink him into the pit of destruction. "God shall make their own tongue to fall upon themselves," Ps. lxiv. 8. God will give them enough of their jest, so that "the burthen of the Lord" they shall have no heart to mention any more, it will be too heavy to make a jest of. They are as the madman that casteth firebrands, arrows, and death, while they pretend to be in sport.

2. The words of God, though thus perverted, shall be accomplished. Do they ask, "What is the burthen of the Lord?" Let the prophet ask them what burthen they mean. Is it this, "I will even forsake you?" ver. 33. This is the burthen that shall be laid and bound upon them, ver. 39, 40, "Behold, I, even I, will utterly forget you, and I will forsake you." I will leave you, and have no thoughts of returning to you. Those are miserable indeed that are forsaken and forgotten of God, and men's bantering God's judgments will not baffle them. Jerusalem was the city God had taken to himself as a holy city, and then given to them and their fathers; but that shall now be forsaken and forgotten. God had taken them to be a people near to him, but they shall now be cast out of his presence. They had been great and honourable among the nations, but now God will bring upon them an everlasting reproach, and a perpetual shame; both their sin and their punishment shall be their lasting disgrace. It is here upon record to their infamy, and will remain so to the world's end. Note, God's word will be magnified and made honourable when those that mock at it shall be vilified and made contemptible. They that despise me shall be lightly esteemed.

CHAPTER XXIV.

In the close of the foregoing chapter we had a general prediction of the utter ruin of Jerusalem, that it should be forsaken and forgotten; which, whatever effects it had upon others, we have reason to think made the prophet himself very melancholy; now in this chapter God encourageth him, by shewing him that, though the desolation seemed to be universal, yet all were not equally involved in it, but God knew how to distinguish, how to separate between the precious and the vile. Some were gone into captivity already with Jeconiah,—over them Jeremiah lamented, but God tells him it should turn to their good; others yet remained hardened in their sins, against whom Jeremiah had a just indignation, but those God tells him should go into captivity, and it should prove to their hurt. To inform the prophet of this, and affect him with it, here is, I. A vision of two baskets of figs, one very good and the other very bad, ver. 1—3. II. The explication of this vision, applying the good figs to those that were already sent into captivity for their good, ver. 4—7; the bad figs to those that should hereafter be sent into captivity for their hurt, ver. 8—10.

THE LORD shewed me, and, behold, two baskets of figs were set before the temple of the LORD, after that Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon had carried away captive Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, and the princes of Judah, with the carpenters and smiths, from Jerusalem, and had brought them to Babylon. 2 One basket had very good figs, even like the figs that are first ripe: and the other basket had very naughty figs, which could not be eaten, they were so bad. 3 Then said the LORD unto me, What seest thou, Jeremiah? And I said, Figs; the good figs, very good; and the evil, very evil, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil. 4 Again the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,

5 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel;
Like these good figs, [of Judah,
So will I acknowledge them that are carried away captive
Whom I have sent out of this place
Into the land of the Chaldeans for their good 6 For I will set mine eyes upon them for good.
And I will bring them again to this land:

xxiii. 39. There is a preferable reading here. Instead of "I will utterly forget you," some copies read, "I will utterly remove you." The ancient translations also mostly convey the same idea. In favour of this reading, moreover, it may be noticed that it agrees in every respect with what follows.

xxiv. 1. This is one of those symbolical visions, examples of which are more frequent than many suspect. It is not to be supposed that two baskets of real figs stood before the Temple on this occasion, or that Jeremiah actually saw two baskets of figs. It was a prophetic vision, in which things were represented to his inner consciousness apart from the organs of sense, as in dreams. The historical basis, if it may be so styled, was the custom of bringing offerings of first-fruits to the Temple as gifts to God. The word here rendered "carpenters" may mean much more, and include workers in metal and stone as well as in wood, like our term artificers. The next name, "smiths," seems to have a special significance, but it is somewhat obscure;

And I will build them, and not pull them down;
And I will plant them, and not pluck them up. [LORD:
7 And I will give them an heart to know me, that I am the
And they shall be my people, and I will be their God:
For they shall return unto me with their whole heart.
8 And as the evil figs, which cannot be eaten, they are so evil;
Surely thus saith the LORD,
So will I give Zedekiah the king of Judah, and his princes,
And the residue of Jerusalem, that remain in this land,
And them that dwell in the land of Egypt:
9 And I will deliver them to be removed
Into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt,
To be a reproach and a proverb, a taunt and a curse,
In all places whither I shall drive them.
10 And I will send the sword, the famine, and the pestilence, among them,
Till they be consumed from off the land
That I gave unto them and to their fathers.

This short chapter helps us to put a very comfortable construction upon a great many long ones, by shewing us that the same providence which to some is a savour of death unto death may, by the grace and blessing of God, be made to others a savour of life unto life; and that, though God's people share with others in the same calamity, yet it is not the same to them that it is to others, but is designed for their good, and shall issue in their good; to them it is a correcting rod in the hand of a tender father, while to others it is an avenging sword in the hand of a righteous judge. Observe,

First. The date of this sermon. It was after, a little after, Jeconiah's captivity, ver. 1. Jeconiah was himself a despised, broken vessel, but with him were carried away some very valuable persons, Ezekiel for one, Eze. i. 3; many of the princes of Judah then went into captivity, Daniel and his fellows were carried off a little before. Of the people, only the carpenters and the smiths were forced away, either because the Chaldeans needed some ingenious men of those trades, (they had a great plenty of astrologers and stargazers, but a great scarcity of smiths and carpenters,) or because the Jews would have a great loss of them, and would for want of them be unable to fortify their cities, and furnish themselves with weapons of war. Now it should seem there were many good people carried away in that captivity, which the pious prophet laid much to heart, while there were those that triumphed in it, and insulted over those to whose lot it fell to go into captivity. Note, We must not conclude concerning the first and greatest sufferers that they were the worst and greatest sinners; for perhaps it may appear quite otherwise, as it did here.

Secondly. The vision by which this distinction of the captives was represented to the prophet's mind. He saw "two baskets of figs set before the temple," there ready to be offered as first fruits, to the honour of God. Perhaps the priests, being remiss in their duty, were not ready to receive them, and dispose of them according to the law, and therefore Jeremiah sees them standing before the temple. But that which was the significancy of the vision was, that the figs in one basket were extraordinarily good, those in the other basket extremely bad. The children of men are all as the fruits of the fig-tree, capable of being made serviceable to God and man, Jud. ix. 11. But some are as good figs, than which nothing more pleasant; others as damaged, rotten figs, than which nothing more nauseous. What creature viler than a wicked man, and what more valuable than a godly man? The good figs were like those that are first ripe, which are most acceptable (Mic. vii. 1) and most prized when newly come into season. The bad figs are such as could not be eaten, they were so evil; they could not answer the end of their creation, were neither pleasant nor good for food, and what then were they good for? If God has no honour from men, nor their generation any service, they are even like the bad figs, that cannot be eaten, that will not answer any good purpose. If the salt have lost its savour, it is thenceforth fit for nothing but the dunghill. Of the persons that are presented to the Lord at the door of his tabernacle, some are sincere, and they are very good; others dissemble with God, and they are very bad. Sinners are the worst of men, hypocrites the worst of sinners. Corruptio optimi est pessima,—'That which is best becomes, when corrupted, the worst.'

Thirdly. The exposition and application of this vision. God intended by it to raise the dejected spirits of those that were gone into captivity, by assuring them of a happy return, and to humble and awaken the proud and secure spirits of those who continued yet in Jerusalem, by assuring them of a miserable captivity.

1. Here is the moral of the good figs, that were very good, the first ripe. Those represented the pious captives, that seemed first ripe for ruin, for they went first into captivity, but should prove first ripe for mercy, and their captivity should help to ripen them; these are pleasing to God, as good figs are to us, and shall be carefully preserved for use. Now observe here,

1st. Those that were already carried into captivity were the good figs, that God would own. This shews, First. That we cannot determine of God's love or hatred by all that is before us. When God's judgments are abroad, they are not always the worst that are first seized by them. Secondly. That early suffering sometimes proves for the best to us. The sooner the child is corrected the better effect the correction is likely to have. Those that went first into captivity were as the son whom the father loves and chastens betimes, chastens while there is hope, and it did well; but those that staid behind were like a child long left to himself, who, when afterwards corrected, is stubborn and made worse by it, Lam iii. 27.

2nd. God owns their captivity to be his doing. Whoever were the instruments of it, he ordered and directed it; ver. 5, "I have sent them out of this place into the land of the Chaldeans." It is God that puts his gold into the furnace to be tried; his hand is in a special manner to be eyed in the afflictions of good people. The judge orders the malefactor into the hand of an executioner, but the father corrects the child with his own hand.

3rd. Even this disgraceful, uncomfortable captivity God intended for their benefit, and we are sure his intentions are never frustrated: "I have sent them into the land of the Chaldeans for their good." It seemed to be every way for their hurt, not only as it was the ruin of their estates, honours, and liberties, parted them from their relations and friends, and put them under the power of their enemies and oppressors, but as it sunk their spirits, discouraged their faith, deprived them of the benefit of God's oracles and ordinances; and exposed them to temptations, and yet it was designed for their good, and proved so in the issue as to many of them: "Out of the eater came forth meat." By their afflictions they were convinced of sin, humbled under the hand of God, weaned from the world, made serious, taught to pray, and turned from their iniquity, particularly they were cured of their inclination to idolatry; and thus it was good for them that they were afflicted, Ps. cxix. 67, 71.

4th. God promiseth them that he will own them in their captivity. Though they seem abandoned they shall be acknowledged; their scornful relations they left behind will scarce own them, or their kindred to them, but God saith, "I will acknowledge them." Note, The Lord knows them that are his, and will own them in all conditions; nakedness and sword shall not separate them from his love.

5th. God assures them of his protection in their trouble, and a glorious deliverance out of it in due time, ver. 6. Being sent into captivity for their good, they shall not be lost there; but, as when the refiner puts his gold into the furnace, First. He has his eye upon it while it is there, and it is a careful eye, to see that it sustain no damage; so "I will set mine eyes upon them for good," to order every thing for the best, that all the circumstances of the affliction may concur to the answering of the great intention of it. Secondly. He will be sure to take it out of the furnace again, as soon as the work designed upon it is done; "I will bring them again to this land." They were sent abroad for improvement a while, under a severe discipline; but they shall be fetched back, when they have gone through their trial there, to their father's house. Thirdly. He will fashion his gold when he has refined it, will make it a vessel of honour fit for his use; so, when God has brought them back from their trial, he will build them, and make them a habitation for himself; will plant them, and make them a vineyard for himself. Their captivity was to square the rough stones, and make them fit for his building; to prune up the young trees, and make them fit for his planting.

6th. He engageth to prepare them for those temporal mercies he designed for them, by bestowing spiritual mercies upon them, ver. 7. It is this that will make their captivity be for their good; this shall be both the improvement of their affliction and their qualification for deliverance. When our troubles are sanctified to us, then we may be sure they will end well. Now that which is promised is, First. That they should be better acquainted with God; they should learn more of God by his providences in Babylon than they had learned by all his oracles and ordinances in Jerusalem; thanks to Divine grace, for, if that had not wrought mightily upon them in Babylon, they would for ever have forgotten God. It is here promised, "I will give them" not so much a head to know me, but "a heart to know me;" for the right knowledge of God consists not in notion and speculation, but in the convictions of the practical judgment, directing and governing the will and affections. "A good understanding have all they that do his commandments," Ps. cxi. 10. Where God gives a sincere desire and inclination to know him, he will give that knowledge. It is God himself that gives a heart to know him, else we should perish for ever in our ignorance. Secondly. That they should be entirely converted to God; to his will as their rule, his service as their business, and his glory as their end; "They shall return to me with their whole heart." God himself undertakes for them that they shall; and if he turn us we shall be turned. This follows upon the former; for those that have a heart to know God aright will not only turn to him, but turn with their whole heart; for those that are either obstinate in their rebellion or hypocritical in their religion may truly be said to be ignorant of God. Thirdly. That thus they should be again taken into covenant with God, as much to their comfort as ever. "They shall be my people, and I will be their God." God will own them as formerly for his people, both in the discoveries of himself to them, his acceptance of their services, and his gracious appearances on their behalf; and they shall have liberty to own him for their God, in their prayers to him, and their expectations from him. Note, Those that have backslidden from God, if they do in sincerity return to him, are admitted as freely as any to all the privileges and comforts of the everlasting covenant, which is herein well ordered, that every transgression in the covenant doth not throw us out of covenant, and that afflictions are not only consistent with, but flowing from, covenant love.

2. Here is the moral of the bad figs. Zedekiah and his princes and partizans yet remain in the land, proud and secure enough, Eze. xi. 3. Many were fled into Egypt for shelter, and they thought they had shifted well for themselves and their own safety, and boasted that, though therein they had gone contrary to the command of God, yet they had acted prudently for themselves. Now, as to both these, that looked so scornfully upon those that were gone into captivity, it is here threatened, 1st. That, whereas those that were already carried away were settled in one country, where they had the comfort of one another's society, though in captivity, these should be dispersed, and "removed into all the kingdoms of the earth," where they should have no joy one of another. 2nd. That, whereas those were carried captives for their good, these should be removed into all countries for their hurt. Their afflictions should be so far from humbling them that they should harden them; not bring them nearer to God, but set them at a greater distance from him. 3rd. That, whereas those should have the honour of being owned of God in their troubles, these should have the shame of being abandoned by all mankind; "In all places whither I shall drive them, they shall be a reproach and a proverb:" Such a one is as false and proud as a Jew; Such a one is poor and miserable as a Jew. All their neighbours shall make a jest of them, and of the calamities brought upon them. 4th. That, whereas those should return to their own land, these shall be consumed from that land, never to see it more, and it shall be of no avail to them to plead it was "the land God gave to their fathers," for they had it from God, and he gave it them upon condition of obedience. 5th. That, whereas those were reserved for better times, these were reserved for worse; wherever they are removed, "the sword, and famine, and pestilence," shall be sent after them, shall soon overtake them, and, coming with commission so to do, shall overcome them. God has variety of judgments wherewith to prosecute those that fly from justice, and those that have escaped one may expect another, till they are brought to repent and reform.

Doubtless this prophecy had its accomplishment in the men of that generation; yet, because we read not of any such remarkable difference between those of Jeconiah's captivity and those of Zedekiah's, it is probable this has a typical reference to the last destruction of the Jews by the Romans, in which those of them that believed were taken care of; but those that continued obstinate in unbelief were driven into all countries for "a taunt and a curse," and so they remain to this day.

CHAPTER XXV.

The prophecy of this chapter bears date some time before those prophecies in the chapters next foregoing, for they are not placed in the exact order of time in which they were delivered. This is dated in the first year of Nebuchadrezzar, that remarkable year, when the sword of the Lord began to be drawn and furbished. Here is, I. A indeed, the original word only occurs four times in the whole Bible. By some it has been thought to mean a locksmith, by others a maker of armour, by others one skilled in conducting sieges, and so forth. The ancient versions do not agree. The prophecy in chap. xxii. 24—30 had been fulfilled, and king, princes, and skilled artisans had been removed by Nebuchadnezzar. The transportation of skilled workmen was in accordance with the selfish policy habitually followed by ancient conquerors.

xxiv. 2. The figs which were first ripe were those which were ripe early in June, and were regarded as dainties and prized accordingly. There are other passages from which this idea is also to be gathered, as Hosea ix. 10, Micah vii. 1. These figs still have a special name in the East and elsewhere. Dr. Tristram says, "The fig-tree is one of the few plants now found wild in all parts of the Holy Land. Even in the recesses of the hot oases by the Dead Sea, it mingles with the palm and the henna. At Engedi, in the fissures moistened by perennial review of the prophecies that had been delivered to Judah and Jerusalem for many years last past, by Jeremiah himself and other prophets, with the little regard given to them, and the little success of them, ver. 1—7. II. A very express threatening of the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem, by the king of Babylon, for their contempt of God, and their continuance in sin, ver. 8—11. To which is annexed a promise of the deliverance out of their captivity in Babylon, after seventy years, ver. 12—14. III. A prediction of the devastation of divers other nations about, by Nebuchadrezzar, represented by a cup of fury put into their hands, ver. 15—28; by a sword sent among them, ver. 29—33; and a desolation made among the shepherds, and their flocks and pastures, ver. 34—38; so that we have here judgment beginning at the house of God, but not ending there.

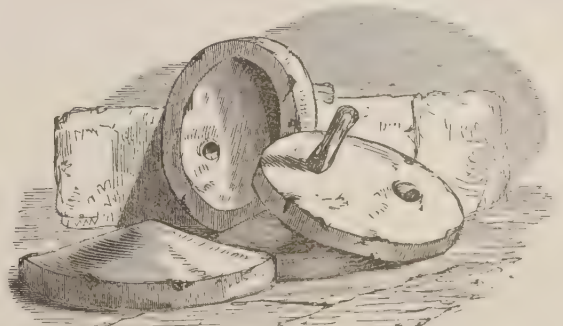
THE word that came to Jeremiah concerning all the people of Judah in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, that was the first year of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon; 2 The which Jeremiah the prophet spake unto all the people of Judah, and to all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, saying, 3 From the thirteenth year of Josiah the son of Amon king of Judah, even unto this day, that is the three and twentieth year, the word of the LORD hath come unto me, and I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking; but ye have not hearkened. 4 And the LORD hath sent unto you all his servants the prophets, rising early and sending them; but ye have not hearkened, nor inclined your ear to hear. 5 They said, Turn ye again now every one from his evil way, and from the evil of your doings, and dwell in the land that the LORD hath given unto you and to your fathers for ever and ever: 6 And go not after other gods to serve them, and to worship them, and provoke me not to anger with the works of your hands; and I will do you no hurt. 7 Yet ye have not hearkened unto me, saith the LORD; that ye might provoke me to anger with the works of your hands to your own hurt.

We have here a message from God concerning all the people of Judah, ver. 1, which Jeremiah delivered in his name unto all the people of Judah, ver. 2. Note, That which is of universal concern ought to be of universal cognizance; it is fit the word that is concerning all the people, as the word of God is, the word of the Gospel particularly, should be divulged to all in general, and, as far as may be, addressed to each in particular. Jeremiah had been sent to the house of the king, ch. xxii. 1, and he took the courage to deliver his message there; here he is sent to all the people, and he takes the pains to deliver his message to them, probably when they were all come up to Jerusalem to worship at some of the solemn fasts; then he had them together, and it was to be hoped then, if ever, they would be well disposed to hear counsel, and receive instruction. This prophecy is dated in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and first of Nebuchadnezzar. It was in the latter end of Jehoiakim's third year that Nebuchadnezzar began to reign himself alone, (having reigned some time before in conjunction with his father,) as appears Dan. i. 1; but Jehoiakim's fourth year was began before Nebuchadnezzar's first was completed. Now that active, daring, martial prince began to set up for the world's master, God by his prophet gives notice that he is his servant, and what work he intends to employ him in, that his growing greatness, which was so formidable to the nations, might not be construed as any reflection upon the power and providence of God in the government of the world. Nebuchadnezzar should not bid so fair for a universal monarchy, (I should have said, a universal tyranny,) but that God had purposes of his own to serve by him; in the execution of which the world shall see the meaning of God's permitting and ordering a thing that seemed such a reflection on his sovereignty and goodness. Now in this message we may observe,

First. The great pains that had been taken with this people to bring them to repentance, which they are here put in mind of, as an aggravation of their sin, and justification of God in his proceedings against them.

1. Jeremiah for his part had been a constant preacher among them twenty-three years. He began in the thirteenth year of Josiah, who reigned thirty-one years, so that he prophesied about eighteen or nineteen years in his reign, then in the reign of Jehoahaz, and now four years of Jehoiakim's reign. Note, God keeps an account, whether we do or no, how long we have enjoyed the means of grace; and the longer we have enjoyed them the heavier will our account be, if we have not improved them. "These three years" (these three-and-twenty years) "have I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree." All this while, 1st. God had been constant in sending messages to them, as there was occasion for them. From that time to this very day "the word of the Lord has come unto me," for your use. Though they had the substance of the warning sent them already in the books of Moses, yet, because those were not duly regarded as applied, God sent to enforce them, and to make them more particular, that they might be without excuse. Thus God's Spirit was striving with them, as with the old world, Gen. vi. 3. 2nd. Jeremiah had been faithful and industrious in delivering those messages. He could appeal to themselves as well as to God and his own conscience concerning this; "I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking." He had declared to them the whole counsel of God; he had taken a great deal of care and pains to discharge his trust in such a manner as might be most likely to win and work upon them. What men are solicitous about, and intent upon, they rise up early to prosecute. It intimates that his head was so full of thoughts about it, and his heart so intent upon doing good, that it broke his sleep, and made him get up betimes to project which way he might take that would be most likely to do them good. He rose early both because he would lose no time and because he would lay hold on and improve the best time to work upon them, when, if ever, they were sober and sedate. Christ came early in the morning to preach in the temple, and the people as early to hear him, Lu. xxi. 38. Morning lectures have their advantages. "My voice shalt thou hear in the morning."



2. Besides him God had sent them other prophets on the same errand, ver. 4. Of the writing prophets, Micah, Nahum, and Habakkuk were a little before him, and Zephaniah contemporary with him. But, besides those, there were many other of God's servants the prophets that preached awakening sermons which were never published. And here God himself is said to rise early and send them; intimating how much his heart also was upon it, that his people should turn and live, and not to go on and die, Eze. xxxiii. 11.

3. All the messages sent them were to the purpose and much to the same purpose, ver. 5, 6. 1st. They all told them of their faults, their evil way, and the evil of their doings. Those were not of God's sending who flattered them as if there were nothing amiss among them. 2nd. They all reproved them particularly for their idolatry, as a sin that was in a special manner provoking to God; their going after other gods to serve them, and worship them; gods that were the work of their own hands. 3rd. They all called to them to repent of their sins, and reform their lives. This was the burthen of every song, "Turn ye now every one from his evil way." Note, Personal and particular reformation must be insisted on as necessary to a national deliverance Every one must turn from his own evil way. The street will not be clean unless every one sweep before his own door. 4th. They all assured them that if they did so it would certainly be the lengthening out of their tranquillity. The mercies they enjoyed should be continued to them; "You shall dwell in the land," dwell at ease, dwell in peace in this good land which "the Lord has given you and your fathers." Nothing but sin will turn you out of it, and that shall not if you turn from it. The judgments they feared should be prevented; "Provoke me not, and I will do you no hurt." Note, We should never receive from God the evil of punishment if we did not provoke him by the evil of sin. God deals fairly with us, never corrects his children without cause, nor causeth grief to us unless we give offence to him.

Secondly. Yet all was to no purpose. They were not wrought upon to take the right and only method to turn away the wrath of God. Jeremiah was a lively, affectionate preacher, yet they hearkened not to him, ver. 3. The other prophets dealt faithfully with them, but neither did they hearken to them nor incline their ear, ver. 4. That very particular sin which they were told of all other was most offensive to God, and made them obnoxious to his justice, they wilfully persisted in. You "provoke me with the works of your hands to your own hurt." Note, What is a provocation to God will prove in the end hurt to ourselves, and we must bear the blame of it. "O Israel! thou hast destroyed thyself."

8 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts; Because ye have not heard my words, 9 Behold, I will send and take all the families of the north, saith the LORD, and Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon, my servant, and will bring them against this land, and against the inhabitants thereof, and against all these nations round about, and will utterly destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and perpetual desolations.

10 Moreover I will take from them
The voice of mirth, and the voice of gladness,
The voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride,
The sound of the millstones, and the light of the candle.

EASTERN MILLSTONES.

11 And this whole land shall be a desolation, and an astonishment; and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years. 12 And it shall come to pass, when seventy years are accomplished, that I will punish the king of Babylon, and that nation, saith the LORD, for their iniquity, and the land of the Chaldeans, and will make it perpetual desolations. 13 And I will bring upon that land all streams, the fig-tree clings to the rocks and overshadows the glen; and here it is evergreen, for no winter cold ever reaches those seething hollows, where the fig-tree yields throughout the year. In some parts, as in the glens between Nablous (Shechem) and Jerusalem, the fig-tree is cultivated as a sole or principal crop on the terraced hills." The figs of the principal crop are dried and preserved, and form an important part of daily food, like dates, &c.

xxiv. 8. The series of kings of Judah and Jerusalem terminated with Zedekiah, who had not sufficient prudence and patience to retain his allegiance to Babylon, but allowed his own ambition and the influence of a so-called patriotic party to persuade him to acts which ended in utter ruin. The passage before us suggests that among those who had escaped to Egypt were men of bad principles No circumstance is more perilous than such a one, because it enables wicked men, under the cloak of loyalty and patriotism, to do all sorts of mischief.

my words which I have pronounced against it, even all that is written in this book, which Jeremiah hath prophesied against all the nations. 14 For many nations and great kings shall serve themselves of them also: and I will recompense them according to their deeds, and according to the works of their own hands.

Here is the sentence grounded upon the foregoing charge; "Because you have not heard my words" I must take another course with you, ver. 8. Note, When men will not regard the judgments of God's mouth they may expect to feel the judgments of his hands; to hear the rod, since they would not hear the word; for the sinner must either be parted from his sin or perish in it. Wrath comes without remedy against those only that sin without repentance. It is not so much men's turning aside that ruins them, as their not returning.

First. The ruin of the land of Judah, by the king of Babylon's armies, is here decreed, ver. 9. God sent his servants the prophets, and they were not heeded, and therefore God will send for his servant the king of Babylon, whom they cannot mock, and despise, and persecute, as they did his servants the prophets. Note, The messengers of God's wrath will be sent against those that would not receive the messengers of his mercy. One way or other God will be heeded, and will make men know that he is the Lord. Nebuchadnezzar, though a stranger to the true God, the God of Israel, nay, and an enemy to him, and afterwards a rival with him, yet in the descent he made upon this country was God's servant, accomplished his purpose, was employed by him, and was an instrument in his hand for the correction of his people. He was really serving God's designs when he thought he was serving his own ends. Justly therefore doth God here call himself the Lord of hosts, ver. 8; for here is an instance of his sovereign dominion not only over the inhabitants, but over the armies of this earth, of which he makes what use he pleaseth. He hath them all at his command: the most potent and absolute monarchs are his servants; Nebuchadnezzar, that is an instrument of his wrath, is as truly his servant as Cyrus that is an instrument of his mercy. The land of Judah being to be made desolate, God here musters his army that is to do it, gathers them together, takes "all the families of the north," if there be occasion for them, leads them on as their commander-in-chief, "brings them against this land," gives them success, not only against Judah and Jerusalem, but "against all the nations round about," that there might be no dependence upon them as allies or assistants against that threatening force. The utter destruction of this and all the neighbouring lands is here described, ver. 9—11. It shall be total; "The whole land shall be a desolation;" not only desolate, but a desolation itself, both city and country shall be laid waste, and all the wealth of both made a prey of. It shall be lasting, even perpetual desolations; they shall continue so long in ruins, and after long waiting there shall appear so little prospect of relief, that every one shall call it perpetual. This desolation shall be the ruin of all their credit among their neighbours; it shall bury their honour in the dust, shall "make them an astonishment and an hissing." Every one will be amazed at them, and hiss them off the stage of action with a just disgrace, for deserting a God that would have been their protection, for impostors that would certainly be their destruction. It will likewise be the ruin of all their comfort among themselves; it shall be a final period of all their joy; "I will take from them the voice of mirth," hang their harps on the willow-trees, and put them out of tune for songs; "I will take from them the voice of mirth," they shall neither have cause for it nor hearts for it. They would not hear the voice of God's word, and therefore "the voice of mirth" shall no more be heard among them. They shall be deprived of food; "the sound of the millstones" shall not be heard, for when the enemy hath seized their stores the sound of the grinding must needs be low, Eccl. xii. 4. An end shall be put to all business; there shall not be seen "the light of a candle," for there shall be no work to be done worth candlelight. And, lastly, they shall be deprived of their liberty; "Those nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years." The fixing of the time how long the captivity shall last would be of great use not only for the confirmation of the prophecy, when the event (which in this particular could by no human sagacity be foreseen) should exactly answer the prediction, but for the comfort of the people of God in their calamity, and the encouragement of faith and prayer. Daniel, who was himself a prophet, had an eye to it, Dan. ix. 2. Nay, God himself had an eye to it, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 22; for therefore he stirred up the spirit of Cyrus, that the word spoken by the mouth of Jeremiah might be accomplished. "Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world," which appears by this, that, when he has thought fit, some of them have been made known to his servants the prophets, and by them to his church.

Secondly. The ruin of Babylon at last is here likewise foretold, as it had been long before by Isaiah, ver. 12—14. The destroyers must themselves be destroyed, and the rod thrown into the fire when the correcting work is done with it. This shall be done when seventy years are accomplished, for the destruction of Babylon must make way for the deliverance of the captives. It is a great doubt when these seventy years commence: some date them from the captivity in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and first of Nebuchadnezzar; others from the captivity of Jehoiakim eight years after. I rather incline to the former, because then these nations began to serve the king of Babylon, and because usually God has taken the earliest time from which to reckon the accomplishment of a promise of mercy, as will appear in computing the four hundred years' servitude in Egypt. And if so, eighteen or nineteen years of the seventy were run out before Jerusalem and the temple were quite destroyed in the eleventh year of Zedekiah. However that be, when the time, the set time to favour Zion, is come, the king of Babylon must be visited, and all the instances of his tyranny reckoned for. Then that nation shall be punished for their iniquity, as the other nations have been punished for theirs. That land must then be a perpetual desolation, such as they had made other lands; for the Judge of all the earth will both do right and avenge wrong, as king of nations, and king of saints. Let proud conquerors and oppressors be moderate in the use of their power and success; for it will come at last to their own turn to suffer; their day will come to fall. In this destruction of Babylon, which was to be brought about by the Medes and Persians, reference shall be had, 1. To what God had said; "I will bring upon that land all my words;" for all the wealth and honour of Babylon shall be sacrificed to the truth of the Divine predictions, and all its power broken, rather than one iota or tittle of God's word shall fall to the ground. The same Jeremiah that prophesied the destruction of other nations by the Chaldeans foretold also the destruction of the Chaldeans themselves; and this must be brought upon them ver. 13. It is with reference to this very event that God saith, ver. 26. He will "confirm the word of his servant, and perform the counsel of his messengers," Isa. xliv. 26. 2. To what they had done; ver. 14, "I will recompense them according to their deeds," by which they transgressed the law of God, even then when they were made to serve his purposes. They had made many nations to serve them, and trampled upon them with the greatest insolence imaginable; but, now the measure of their iniquity is full, many nations and great kings that are in alliance with, and come in to the assistance of, Cyrus king of Persia shall serve themselves of them also; shall make themselves masters of their country, and enrich themselves with their spoils, and make them the footstool by which to mount the throne of a universal monarchy. They shall make use of them for servants and soldiers; "He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity."

15 For thus saith the LORD God of Israel unto me; Take the wine cup of this fury at my hand, and cause all the nations, to whom I send thee, to drink it. 16 And they shall drink, and be moved, and be mad, because of the sword that I will send among them. 17 Then took I the cup at the LORD's hand, and made all the nations to drink, unto whom the LORD had sent me: 18 To wit, Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, and the kings thereof, and the princes thereof, to make them a desolation, an astonishment, an hissing, and a curse; as it is this day; 19 Pharaoh king of Egypt, and his servants, and his princes, and all his people; 20 And all the mingled people, and all the kings of the land of Uz, and all the kings of the land of the Philistines, and Ashkelon, and Azzah, and Ekron, and the remnant of Ashdod, 21 Edom, and Moab, and the children of Ammon, 22 And all the kings of Tyrus, and all the kings of Zidon, and the kings of the isles which are beyond the sea, 23 Dedan, and Tema, and Buz, and all that are in the utmost corners, 24 And all the kings of Arabia, and all the kings of the mingled people that dwell in the desert, 25 And all the kings of Zimri, and all the kings of Elam, and all the kings of the Medes, 26 And all the kings of the north, far and near, one with another, and all the kingdoms of the world, which are upon the face of the earth: and the king of Sheshach shall drink after them. 27 Therefore thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Drink ye, and be drunken, and spue, and fall, and rise no more, because of the sword which I will send among you. 28 And it shall be, if they refuse to take the cup at thine hand to drink, then shalt thou say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Ye shall certainly drink. 29 For, lo, I begin to bring evil on the city which is called by my name, and should ye be utterly unpunished? Ye shall not be unpunished: for I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth, saith the LORD of hosts.

xxv. 1. While here the fourth year of Jehoiakim is the first of Nebuchadnezzar, in Dan. i. 1 Nebuchadnezzar appears in the third of Jehoiakim. It is to be noted in connection with this discrepancy that the Greek of the Septuagint omits altogether the reference to the king of Babylon, which was therefore possibly not in their copy. At the same time the clause must not be hastily rejected, because both the representations here and in Daniel may be correct, and that Nebuchadnezzar's first year corresponded with parts of the third and fourth of Jehoiakim. The prophecies of Jeremiah are disarranged, but the chronological indications are numerous and highly interesting.

xxv. 9. The Greek, which so often differs from the Hebrew, here omits the words "and Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon." The Hebrew text is "and unto Nebuchadnezzar," &c., which should have been observed by our translators, for the sense is, "I will send and take all the families (or nations) of the north, saith the Lord, and

Under the similitude of a cup going round, which all the company must drink of, is here represented the universal desolation that was now coming upon that part of the world, which Nebuchadnezzar, who had just now began to reign and act, was to be the instrument of, and which should at length recoil upon his own country. The cup in the vision is to be a sword in the accomplishment of it. So it is explained, ver. 16, It is "the sword that I will send among them," the sword of war, that should be irresistibly strong, and implacably cruel. Observe,

First. Whence this destroying sword should come. From the hand of God; it is the sword of Lord, ch. xlvii. 6; bathed in heaven, Isa. xxxiv. 5; wicked men are made use of as his sword, Ps. xvii. 13. It is the wine cup of his fury. It is the just anger of God that sends this judgment. The nations have provoked him by their sins, and they must fall under the tokens of his wrath. These are compared to some intoxicating liquor, which they shall be forced to drink of; as formerly condemned malefactors were sometimes executed by being compelled to drink poison. The wicked are said to drink the wrath of the Almighty, Job xxi. 20; Rev. xiv. 10. Their share of troubles in this world is represented by the dregs of a cup of red wine full of mixture, Ps. lxxv. 8: see Ps. xi. 6. The wrath of God in this world is but as a cup, in comparison with the full streams of it in the other world.

Secondly. By whose hand it should be sent them. By the hand of Jeremiah, as the judge set over the nations, (ch. i. 10,) to pass this sentence upon them; and by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, as the executioner. What a much greater figure then doth the poor prophet make than what the potent prince makes, if we look upon their relation to God, though in the eye of the world it was the reverse of it. Jeremiah must take the cup at God's hand, and compel the nations to drink it. He foretells no hurt to them, but what God appoints him to foretell; and what is foretold by a Divine authority will certainly be fulfilled by a Divine power.

Thirdly. On whom it should be sent. On all the nations within the verge of Israel's acquaintance, and the lines of their communication. Jeremiah took the cup, and made all the nations to drink of it; that is, he prophesied concerning each of the nations here mentioned, that they should share in this great desolation that was coming. "Jerusalem and the cities of Judah" are put first, ver. 18; for "judgment begins at the house of God," 1 Pet. iv. 17; at the sanctuary, Eze. ix. 6. Whether Nebuchadnezzar had his eye principally upon Jerusalem and Judah in his expedition or no, doth not appear; probably he had, for it was as considerable as any of the nations here mentioned; however, God had his eye principally to them. And this part of the prophecy was already begun to be accomplished, which that melancholy parenthesis speaks, ("as it is this day,") for in the fourth year of Jehoiakim things were come into a very ill posture, and all the foundations were out of course. "Pharaoh king of Egypt," comes next; because the Jews trusted to that broken reed, ver. 9. The remains of them fled to Egypt; and there Jeremiah particularly foretold the destruction of that country, ch. xliii. 10, 11. All the other nations that bordered on Canaan must pledge Jerusalem in this bitter cup, this cup of trembling. The "mingled people," the Arabians, so some; some rovers of divers nations that lived by rapine, so others; "the kings of the land of Uz," joined to the country of the Edomites. The Philistines had been vexatious to Israel; but now their cities and their lords become a prey to this mighty conqueror. "Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Zidon," are places well known to border upon Israel. "The isles beyond or beside the sea," are supposed to be those parts of Phœnicia and Syria that lay on the coast of the Mediterranean sea. Dedan, and the other countries mentioned, ver. 23, 24, seem to have lain upon the confines of Idumea and Arabia the desert. Those of Elam are the Persians, with whom the Medes are joined; now looked upon as inconsiderable, and yet afterwards able to make reprisals upon Babylon for themselves and all their neighbours. "The kings of the north," that lay nearer to Babylon, and others that lay at some distance, will be sure to be seized on, and made a prey of by the victorious sword of Nebuchadnezzar. Nay, He shall push on his victories with such incredible fury and success, that "all the kingdoms of the world" that were then and there known, should become sacrifices to his ambition. Thus Alexander is said to have conquered the world; and the Roman empire is called the world, Lu. ii. 1. Or, it may be taken as reading the doom of all the kingdoms of this earth; one time or other they shall feel the direful effects of war. The world has been, and will be, a great cockpit, while men's lusts war as they do in their members, Jas. iv. 1; but, that the conquerors may see their fate with the conquered, it concludes, "The king of Sheshach shall drink after them," that is, the king of Babylon, himself, that has given his neighbours all this trouble and vexation, shall at length have it return upon own head. That by Sheshach is meant Babylon is plain from ch. li. 41; but whether it was another name of the same city, or the name of another city of the same kingdom, is uncertain. Babylon's ruin was foretold, ver. 12, 13; and upon this prophecy of its being the author of the ruin of so many nations it is very fitly repeated here again.

Fourthly. What should be the effect of it. The desolations which the sword should make in all these kingdoms are represented by the consequences of excessive drinking; ver. 16, "They shall drink, and be moved, and be mad;" and, ver. 27, "They shall be drunken, and spue, and fall, and rise no more." Now this may serve, 1. To make us loath the sin of drunkenness, that the consequences of it are made use of to set forth a most woful and miserable condition. Drunkenness deprives men for the present of the use of their reason, makes them mad. It takes from them, likewise, that which next to reason is the most valuable blessing, and that is health; it makes them sick, and endangers the bones and the life. Men in drink often fall and rise no more. It is a sin that is its own punishment. How wretchedly are they intoxicated and besotted that suffer themselves at any time to be intoxicated, especially to be by the frequent commission of this sin besotted with wine or strong drink! 2. To make us dread the judgment of war. When God sends the sword upon a nation, with warrant to make it desolate, it soon becomes like a drunken man; filled with confusion at the alarms of war; put into a hurry; its counsellors mad, and at their wits' end, staggering in all the measures they take, all the motions they make; sick at heart with continual vexation; vomiting up the riches they have greedily swallowed down, Job xx. 15; falling down before the enemy, and as unable to get up again, or do any thing to help themselves, as a man dead drunk is, Hab. ii. 16.

Fifthly. The undoubted certainty of it, with the reason given for it; ver. 28, 29, They will refuse to take the cup at thy hand; not only they will be loath that the judgment shall come, but they will be loath to believe that ever it will come. They will not give credit to the prediction of so despicable a man as Jeremiah; but tell them, it is the word of the Lord of hosts: he hath said it, and it is in vain for them to struggle with Omnipotence, "Ye shall certainly drink;" and give them this reason,—it is a time of visitation, it is a reckoning day, and Jerusalem has been called to an account already, "I begin to bring evil on the city that is called by my name;" its relation to me will not exempt it from punishment, "and should ye be utterly unpunished?" No, "If this be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" If they that have some good in them smart so severely for the evil that is found in them, can they expect to escape that have worse evils, and no good found among them? If Jerusalem be punished for learning idolatry of the nations, shall not the nations be punished of whom they learned it? No doubt they shall; "I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth," for they have helped to debauch the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

Upon this whole matter we may observe, 1. That there is a God that judgeth in the earth, to whom all the nations of the earth are accountable, and by whose judgment they must abide. 2. That God can easily bring to ruin the greatest nations, the most numerous and powerful, and such as have been most secure. 3. That those who have been vexatious and mischievous to the people of God will be reckoned with for it at last. Many of these nations had, in their turns, given disturbance to Israel, but now comes destruction on them. The year of the Redeemer will come, even the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion. 4. That "the burthen of the word of the Lord" will at last become the burthen of his judgments. Isaiah had prophesied long since against most of these nations, ch. xiii., &c.; and now at length all his prophecies will have their complete fulfilling. 5. That those who are ambitious of power and dominion commonly become the troublers of the earth, and the plagues of their generation; so Nebuchadnezzar was, so proud of his might that he had no sense of right. These are the men that turn the world upside down, and yet expect to be admired and adored. Alexander thought himself a great prince, when others thought him no better than a great pirate. 6. That the greatest pomp and power in this world is of very uncertain continuance. Before Nebuchadnezzar's greater force kings themselves must yield, and become captives.

30 Therefore prophesy thou against them all these words, and say unto them,
The LORD shall roar from on high,
And utter his voice from his holy habitation;
He shall mightily roar upon his habitation;
He shall give a shout, as they that tread the grapes,

We have in these verses a farther description of those terrible desolations which the king of Babylon, with his armies, should make in all the countries and nations round about Jerusalem. In Jerusalem God hath erected his temple, there were his oracles and ordinances, which the neighbouring nations should have attended to, and might have received benefit by; thither they should have applied themselves for knowledge of God and their duty, and then they might have had reason to bless God for their neighbourhood to Jerusalem; but they, instead of that, taking all opportunities either to debauch or to disturb that holy city, when God came to reckon with Jerusalem, because it learned so much of the way of the nations, he reckoned with the nations, because they learned so little of the way of Jerusalem. They will soon be aware of Nebuchadnezzar's making war upon them; but the prophet is here bidden to tell them that it is God himself that makes war upon them, a God with whom there is no contending.

First. The war is here proclaimed; ver. 30, "The Lord shall war from on high;" not from mount Zion and Jerusalem, (as Joel iii. 16, Am. i. 2,) but from heaven, from his holy habitation there; for now Jerusalem is one of the places against which he roars, "He shall mightily roar upon his habitation" on earth from that above. He has been long silent, and seemed not to take notice of the wickedness of the nations. The times of this ignorance God winked at; but now "he shall give a shout" as the assailants in battle do "against all the inhabitants of the earth," to whom it shall be a shout of terror, and yet a shout of joy in heaven, as theirs that treads the grapes; for, when God is reckoning with the proud enemies of his kingdom among men, there is a "great voice of much people heard in heaven, saying, Hallelujah," Rev. ix. 1; "He roars as a lion," Am. iii. 4, 8; as a lion that has "forsaken his covert,

I will send unto Nebuchadrezzar," &c. "My servant" is as much as to say "my agent."

xxv. 10. A prosperous, industrious, and peaceful condition, denoted by the indications of this verse, is to be exchanged for one of adversity, stagnation, and fear. The daily grinding at the mill and the nightly burning of the lamp characterised every house, mansion, and cottage in good times; but the sound of the one and the light of the other must cease in the presence of the invader, and as the result of the desolation of war. So ordinary festivities and marriage rejoicings would cease.

xxv. 11, 12. The number seventy has here been regarded by some as a round number, but the statements contained in Dan. ix. 2 and Ezra i. 1 seem to require that it should be rigidly interpreted, whenever its commencement may be fixed. Daniel directed his attention to this prophecy in the first year of Darius, the son of Ahasuerus; but the actual completion of the term was probably in ver. 38; and is going abroad to seek his prey, upon which he roars, that he may the more easily seize it.

Secondly. The manifesto is here published, shewing the causes and reasons why God proclaims this war; ver. 31, "The Lord hath a controversy with the nations," he has just cause to contend with them, and he will take this way of pleading with them. His quarrel with them is, in one word, for their wickedness, their contempt of him, and his authority over them, and kindness to them, "He will give them that are wicked to the sword." They have provoked God to anger, and thence comes all this destruction; it is "because of the fierce anger of the Lord," ver. 37; and again, ver. 38, the "fierceness of the oppressor," or, as it might better be read, 'the fierceness of the oppressing sword,' (for the word is feminine,) is "because of his fierce anger;" and we are sure he is never angry without cause; but who knows the power of his anger?

Thirdly. The alarm is here given and taken. "A noise shall come even to the ends of the earth," so loud shall it roar, so far shall it reach, ver. 31. The alarm is not given by sound of trumpet, or beat of drum, but by a whirlwind, a great whirlwind, storm, or tempest, which shall be raised up from the coasts, the remote coasts of the earth, ver. 32. The Chaldean army shall be like a hurricane, raised in the north, but thence carried on with incredible fierceness and swiftness, bearing down all before it. It is like the whirlwind out of which God answered Job, which was exceeding terrible, Job xxxvii. 1; xxxviii. 1; and when the wrath of God thus roars like a lion from heaven, no marvel if it be echoed with shrieks from earth; for who can choose but tremble, when God thus speaks in displeasure: see Hos. xi. 10. Now the shepherds shall howl and cry, the kings and princes, and great ones of the earth, the principal of the flock; though they used to be the most courageous and secure, yet now their hearts shall fail them, "They shall wallow themselves in the ashes," ver. 34. Seeing themselves utterly unable to make head against the enemy, and seeing their country, which they have the charge of, and a concern for, inevitably ruined, they shall abandon themselves to sorrow. There shall be "a voice of the cry of the shepherds," and a "howling of the principal of the flock shall be heard," ver. 36. Those are great calamities indeed, that strike such a terror upon the great men, and put them into this mighty consternation. The Lord hath spoiled their pasture," in which they fed their flock, and out of which they fed themselves; the spoiling of that makes them cry out thus. Perhaps, carrying on the metaphor of a lion roaring, it alludes to the great fright that shepherds are in, when they hear a roaring lion coming towards their flocks, and they have no way to flee, (ver. 35,) for their own security, neither can the principal of their flock escape. The enemy will be so numerous, so furious, so sedulous, and the extent of their armies so vast, that it will be impossible to avoid falling into their hands. Note, As we cannot outface, so we cannot outrun, the judgments of God. This is that for which the shepherds howl and cry.

Fourthly. The progress of this war is here described; ver. 32, "Behold evil shall go forth from nation to nation." As the cup goes round, every nation shall have its share and take its turn, because one doth not take warning by the calamities of another, to repent and reform. Nay, as if this were to be a little representation of the last and general judgment, it shall reach "from one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth," ver. 33. The day of vengeance is in his heart, and now his hand shall find out all his enemies, wherever they are, Ps. xxi. 8. Note, When our neighbour's house is on fire it is time to be concerned for our own; when one nation is a seat of war every neighbour nation should hear, and fear, and make its peace with God.

Fifthly. The dismal consequences of this war are here foretold. The days of slaughter and dispersions are accomplished; that is, they are fully come, ver. 34, the time fixed in the Divine counsel for the slaughter of some and the dispersion of the rest, which will make the nations completely desolate. Multitudes shall fall by the sword of the merciless Chaldeans, so that the slain of the Lord shall be everywhere found; they are slain by commission from him, and are sacrificed to his justice. The slain for sin are the slain of the Lord; and, to complete the misery of their slaughter, they shall not be lamented in particular, so general shall the matter of lamentation be. Nay, they shall not be gathered up nor buried, for they shall have no friends left to do it, and the enemies shall not have so much humanity in them as to do it; and then they shall be as dung upon the earth, so vile and noisome. And it is well if, as dung manures the earth and makes it fruitful, so these horrid spectacles, which lie as monuments of Divine justice, might be a means to awaken the inhabitants of the earth to learn righteousness. The effect of this war will be the desolation of the whole land that is the seat of it, ver. 38, one land after another. But here are two expressions more that seem to make the case in a particular manner piteous: 1. "Ye shall fall like a pleasant vessel, ver. 34. The most desirable persons among them, that most valued themselves and were most valued, that were looked upon as vessels of honour, shall fall by the sword. Ye shall fall as a Venice glass or a China dish, which is soon broken all to pieces. Even the tender and delicate shall share in the common calamity. The sword devours one as well as another. 2. Even the peaceable habitations are cut down. Those that used to be quiet and not molested, the habitations in which ye have long dwelt in peace shall now be no longer such, but cut down by the war. Or, those that used to be quiet and not molesting any of their neighbours, those that lived in peace, easily, and gave no provocation to any, yet shall not escape. This is one of the direful effects of war, that even those who were most harmless and inoffensive yet suffer hard things. Blessed be God, there is a peaceable habitation above for all the sons of peace, which is out of the reach of fire and sword.

CHAPTER XXVI.

As in the history of the Acts of the Apostles that of their preaching and that of their suffering is interwoven, so it is in the account we have of the prophet Jeremiah; witness this chapter, where we are told, I. How faithfully he preached, ver. 1—6. II. How spitefully he was persecuted for so doing the the priests and the prophets, ver. 7—11. III. How bravely he stood to his doctrine in the face of his persecutors, ver. 12—15. IV. How wonderfully he was protected and delivered by the prudence of the princes and elders, ver. 16—19. Though Urijah, another prophet, was about the same time put to death by Jehoiakim, ver. 20—23, yet Jeremiah met with those that sheltered him, ver. 24.

IN the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah came this word from the LORD, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD; Stand in the court of the LORD's house, and speak unto all the cities of Judah, which come to worship in the LORD's house, all the words that I command thee to speak unto them; diminish not a word: 3 If so be they will hearken, and turn every man from his evil way, that I may repent me of the evil, which I purpose to do unto them because of the evil of their doings. 4 And thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD; If ye will not hearken to me, to walk in my law, which I have set before you, 5 To hearken to the words of my servants the prophets, whom I sent unto you, both rising up early, and sending them, but ye have not hearkened; 6 Then will I make this house like Shiloh, and will make this city a curse to all the nations of the earth.

We have here the sermon that Jeremiah preached, which gave such offence that he was in danger of losing his life for it. It is here left upon record, as it were by way of appeal to the judgment of impartial men in all ages, whether Jeremiah was worthy to die for delivering such a message as this from God, and whether his persecutors were not very wicked and unreasonable men.

First. God directed him where to preach this sermon, and when, and to what auditory, ver. 2. Let not any censure Jeremiah as indiscreet in the choice of place and time, nor say he might have delivered his message more privately, in a corner, among his friends that he could confide in, and that he deserved to smart for not acting more cautiously; for God gave him orders to preach "in the court of the Lord's house," which was within the peculiar jurisdiction of his sworn enemies, the priests, and who would therefore take themselves to be in a particular manner affronted. He must preach this, as it should seem, at the time of one of the most solemn festivals, when persons were come from all the cities of Judah to worship in the Lord's house. These worshippers, we may suppose, had a great veneration for their priests, would credit the character they gave of men, and be exasperated against those whom they put into an ill name, and consequently side with them, and strengthen their hands against Jeremiah. But none of these things must move him or daunt him; in the face of all this danger he must preach this sermon, which, if it were not convincing, would be very provoking. And because the prophet might be in some temptation to palliate the matter, and make it better to his hearers than God had made it to him, to exchange an offensive expression for one more plausible, therefore God chargeth him particularly not to diminish a word, but to speak all the things, nay, and all the words, that he had commanded him. Note, God's ambassadors must keep close to their instructions, and not in the least vary from them, either to please men or to save themselves harmless; they must neither add nor diminish, Deu. iv. 2.

Secondly. God directed him what to preach, and it is that which could not give offence to any but such as were resolved to go on still in their trespasses.

1. He must assure them that if they would repent of their sins, and turn from them, though they were in imminent danger of ruin, and desolating judgments were just at the door, yet a stop should be put to them, and God would proceed no farther in his controversy with them, ver. 3. This was the main thing God intended in sending him to them, to try if they would return from their sins, that so God might turn from his anger, and turn away the judgments that threatened them, which he was not only willing but very desirous to do, as soon as he could do it without prejudice to the honour of his justice and holiness. See how God waits to be gracious, waits till we are duly qualified, till we are fit for him to be gracious to, and in the meantime tries a variety of methods to bring us to be so.

2. He must on the other hand assure them that, if they continue obstinate to all the calls God gave them, and would persist in their disobedience, it would certainly end in the ruin of their city and temple, ver. 4—6. 1st. That which God required of them was that they should be observant of what he had said to them, both by the written word and by his ministers; that they should walk in all his law which he set before them, the law of Moses and the ordinances and commandments of it; and that they should hearken to the words of his servants the prophets, who pressed nothing upon them but what was agreeable to the law of Moses that was set before them, as a touchstone to try the spirits by, and by this they were distinguished from the false prophets, who drew them from the law, instead of drawing them to it. The law was what God himself set before them. The prophets were his own servants, and were immediately sent by him to them, and sent with a great deal of care and concern, rising early to send them, lest they should come too late, when their prejudices had got possession and were become invincible. They had hitherto been deaf both to the law and to the prophets, "Ye have not hearkened;" all he expects now is, that at length they should heed what he said, and make his word their rule,—a reasonable demand. 2nd. That which is threatened in case of refusal is, that this city, and the temple in it, shall fare as their predecessors did, Shiloh, and the tabernacle there, for a like refusal to walk in God's laws and hearken to his prophets, then when the present dispensation of prophecy just began in Samuel. Now could a sentence be expressed more unexceptionably? Is not a rule of justice, ut parium par sit ratio,—'that those whose causes are the same be dealt with alike?' If Jerusalem be like Shiloh in respect of sin, why should it not be like Shiloh in respect of punishment? Can any other be expected? This was not the first time he had given them warning to this purpose: see ch. vii. 12—14. When the temple, which was the glory of Jerusalem, was destroyed, the city was thereby made a curse, for the temple was that which made it a blessing. If the salt lose that savour it is thenceforth good for nothing; it shall be a curse, that is, it shall be the pattern of a curse; if a man would curse any city, he would say, God make it like Jerusalem. Note, Those that will not be subject to the commands of God make themselves subject to the curse of God.

7 So the priests and the prophets and all the people heard Jeremiah speaking these words in the house of the LORD. 8 Now it came to pass, when Jeremiah had made an end of speaking all that the LORD had commanded him to speak unto all the people, that the priests and the prophets and all the

xxv. 15—17. Here also we meet with a symbolical prophecy, not corresponding with any real transactions, but wholly metaphorical. It is quite true that some have thought Jeremiah may have offered a cup to the ambassadors or representatives of the nations enumerated. But it is a sufficient reply to say that so many nations were never at any one time represented in Judea, and that when this prediction was uttered the fallen condition of the people was such that few, if any, remained. There is, however, another observation to be made concerning the subsequent list, based upon the repetition of the phrase, "all the kings," namely, that as most of the nations had but one king at a time, the cup was to be offered to the succession of monarchs, and the prophecy gradually fulfilled.

xxv. 18. The words "as it is this day" do not occur in the Greek, but the country was then in a very sad condition.

people took him, saying, Thou shalt surely die. 9 Why hast thou prophesied in the name of the LORD, saying, This house shall be like Shiloh, and this city shall be desolate without an inhabitant? And all the people were gathered against Jeremiah in the house of the LORD. 10 When the princes of Judah heard these things, then they came up from the king's house unto the house of the LORD, and sat down in the entry of the new gate of the LORD's house. 11 Then spake the priests and the prophets unto the princes and to all the people, saying, This man is worthy to die; for he hath prophesied against this city, as ye have heard with your ears. 12 Then spake Jeremiah unto all the princes and to all the people, saying, The LORD sent me to prophesy against this house and against this city all the words that ye have heard. 13 Therefore now amend your ways and your doings, and obey the voice of the LORD your God; and the LORD will repent him of the evil that he hath pronounced against you. 14 As for me, behold, I am in your hand: do with me as seemeth good and meet unto you. 15 But know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, and upon this city, and upon the inhabitants thereof: for of a truth the LORD hath sent me unto you to speak all these words in your ears.

One would have hoped that such a sermon as that in the foregoing verses, so plain and practical, so rational and pathetical, and delivered in God's name, should have wrought upon even this people, especially meeting them now at their devotions, and should have prevailed with them to repent and reform; but, instead of awakening their convictions, it did but exasperate their corruptions, as appears by this account of the effect of it.

First. Jeremiah is charged with it as a crime that he had preached such a sermon, and is apprehended for it as a criminal. The priests, and false prophets, and people heard him speak these words, ver. 7. And it seems they had patience to hear him out, did not disturb him when he was preaching, nor give him any interruption till he had "made an end of speaking all that the Lord had commanded him to speak;" so far they were fairer with him than some of the persecutors of God's ministers have been. They let him say all he had to say, and yet perhaps with an ill design, in hopes to have something worse yet to lay to his charge; but, having no worse, this shall suffice to ground an indictment upon, he hath said, "This house shall be like Shiloh." See how unfair they are in representing his words; he had said in God's name, If ye will not hearken to me, then will I make this house like Shiloh; but they leave out God's hand in the desolation, ("I will make it so,") and their own hand in it, in not hearkening to the voice of God, and charge it upon him that he blasphemed this holy place, (the crime charged both on our Lord Jesus and on Stephen,) that he said, "This house shall be like Shiloh." Well might he complain, as David doth, Ps. lvi. 5, "Every day they wrest my words;" and we must not think it strange if we, and what we say and do, be thus misrepresented. And when the accusation was so weakly grounded, no marvel that the sentence passed upon it was unjust, "Thou shalt surely die." What he had said agreed with what God had said, when he took possession of the temple, 1 Kin. ix. 6—8, If you shall at all turn from following after me, then this house shall be abandoned; and yet he is condemned to die for saying it. It is not out of any concern for the honour of the people that they appear thus warm, but because they are resolved not to part with their sins, in which they flatter themselves with a conceit that the temple of the Lord will protect them; therefore, right or wrong, "Thou shalt surely die." This outcry of the priests and prophets raised the mob, and all the people were gathered together against Jeremiah in a popular tumult, ready to pull him to pieces; were gathered about him, so some read it; they flocked together, some crying one thing and some another. The people that were at first present were hot against him, ver. 8, but their clamours drew more together, only to see what the matter was.

Secondly. He is arraigned and indicted for it before the highest court of judicature they had. Here, 1. The princes of Judah were his judges, ver. 10; those that filled the thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David, the elders of Israel. They, hearing of this tumult in the temple, came up from the king's house, where they usually sat near the court, to the house of the Lord, to inquire into this matter, and to see that nothing was done disorderly. They "sat down in the entry of the new gate of the Lord's house," and held a court, as it were, by a special commission of Oyer and Terminer. 2. The priests and prophets were his persecutors and accusers, and were violently set against him; they appealed to the princes and to all the people, to the court and the jury, whether this man be not worthy to die, ver. 11. The corrupt priests and counterfeit prophets have always been the most bitter enemies to the prophets of the Lord; they had ends of their own to serve, which they thought such preaching as this would be an obstruction to. When Jeremiah prophesied in the house of the king concerning the fall of the royal family, (ch. xxii. 1,) the court, though very corrupt, bore it patiently, and we do not find they persecuted him for it; but when he comes into the house of the Lord, and toucheth the copyhold of the priests, and contradicts the lies and flatteries of the false prophets, then he is adjudged worthy to die. For the prophets prophesied falsely, and the priests bore rule by their means, ch. v. 31. Observe, When Jeremiah is indicted before the princes, the stress of his accusation is laid upon what he had said concerning the city, because they thought the princes would be most concerned about that. But concerning the words spoken, they appeal to the people, Ye have heard what he hath said, let it be given in evidence.

Thirdly. Jeremiah makes his defence before the princes and the people. He doth not go about to deny the words, or to diminish aught from them,—what he hath said he will stand to, though it cost him his life. He owns he had prophesied against this house and this city; but,

1. He asserts that he did this by a good authority, not maliciously or seditiously, not out of any ill will to his country or any disaffection to the government in church or state, but "The Lord sent me" to prophesy thus. So he begins his apology, ver. 12, and so he concludes it, for this is that he resolves to abide by as sufficient to bear him out, ver. 15, "Of a truth the Lord hath sent me unto you, to speak all these words." As long as ministers keep close to the instructions they have from heaven, they need not fear the opposition they meet with from hell or earth. He pleads he is but a messenger, and if he faithfully deliver his message he must bear no blame; but he is a messenger from the Lord, to whom they were accountable as well as he, and therefore might demand regard. If he speak but what God appointed him to speak he is under the Divine protection, and whatever affront they offer to the ambassador will be resented by the prince that sent him.

2. He shews them that he did it with a good design, and that it was their fault if they did not make a good use of it. It was said not by way of fatal sentence, but of fair warning; if they would take the warning, they might prevent the execution of the sentence, ver. 13. Shall I take it ill of a man that tells me of my danger, while I have an opportunity of avoiding it, and not rather return him thanks for it as the greatest kindness he could do me? I have indeed, saith Jeremiah, prophesied against this city, but if you will now amend your ways and your doings, the threatened ruin shall be prevented, which was the thing I aimed at in giving you the warning. Those are very unjust who complain of ministers for preaching hell and damnation when it is only to keep them from that place of torment, and bring them to heaven and salvation.

3. He therefore warns them of their danger if they proceed against him; ver. 14, As for me, the matter is not great what becomes of me, "behold, I am in your hand;" you know I am, I neither have any power, nor can make any interest, to oppose you, neither is it so much my concern to save my own life; do with me as seemeth meet unto you, if I be led to the slaughter it shall be as a lamb. Note, It becomes God's ministers that are warm in preaching to be calm in suffering, and to carry it submissively to the powers that are over them, though they be persecuting powers. But for themselves, he tells them, it is at their peril if they put him death, "Ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves," ver. 15. They might think that killing the prophet would help to defeat the prophecy, but they would prove wretchedly deceived; it would but add to their guilt and aggravate their ruin. Their own consciences could not but tell them, that if Jeremiah was, as certainly he was, sent of God to bring them this message, it was at their utmost peril if they treated him for it as a malefactor. Those that persecute God's ministers hurt not them so much as themselves.

16 Then said the princes and all the people unto the priests and to the prophets; This man is not worthy to die: for he hath spoken to us in the name of the LORD our God. 17 Then rose up certain of the elders of the land, and spake to all the assembly of the people, saying, 18 Micah the Morasthite prophesied in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah, and spake to all the people of Judah, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts; Zion shall be plowed like a field, and Jerusalem shall become heaps, and the mountain of the house as the high places of a forest. 19 Did Hezekiah king of Judah and all Judah put him at all to death? did he not fear the LORD, and besought the LORD, and the LORD repented him of the evil which he had pronounced against them? Thus might we procure great evil against our souls. 20 And there was also a man that prophesied in the name of the LORD, Urijah the son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim, who prophesied against this city and against this land according to all the words of Jeremiah: 21 And when Jehoiakim the king, with all his mighty men, and all the princes, heard his words, the king sought to put him to death: but when Urijah heard it, he was afraid, and fled, and went into Egypt; 22 And Jehoiakim the king sent men into Egypt, namely, Elnathan the son of Achbor, and certain men with him into Egypt. 23 And they fetched forth Urijah out of Egypt, and brought him unto Jehoiakim the king; who slew him with the sword, and cast his

xxv. 19. The Pharaoh who then reigned was Hophra, or Apries, who was overthrown through having so many foreign troops.

xxv. 20. Some connect "all the mingled people" with verse 19, but some copies and the Chaldee read "all the kings of the mingled people." The kings following were doubtless petty monarchs at the head of small populations, as of Ashkelon, Gaza, Ekron, and Ashdod, which were cities, it is true, but which, separately considered, were feeble and insignificant as monarchies.

xxv. 21. The territories subject to the kings of Edom, Moab, and Ammon skirted the land of Judah on the east and south.

xxv. 22. The great wealth and commercial importance of Tyre and Sidon gave them an influence which their narrow realms would alone not have commanded. For "the isles which are beyond the sea" the margin suggests "the region by the sea-side," which may be correct.

xxv. 23. Probably Dedan, Tema, and Buz were tribes dwelling dead body into the graves of the common people. 24 Nevertheless the hand of Ahikam the son of Shaphan was with Jeremiah, that they should not give him into the hand of the people to put him to death.

Here is, First. The acquitting of Jeremiah from the charge exhibited against him. He had, indeed, spoken the words as they were laid in the indictment, but they are not looked upon to be seditious, or treasonable, ill intended, or of any ill tendency, and therefore the court and country agree to find him, Not guilty. The priests and prophets, notwithstanding his rational plea for himself, continued to demand judgment against him; but the princes and all the people are clear in it, that "this man is not worthy to die," ver. 16. For, say they, "he hath spoken to us," not of himself, but "in the name of the Lord our God." And are they willing to own that he did, indeed, speak to them in the name of the Lord, and that that Lord is their God? Why then did they not amend their ways and doings, and take the method he prescribed to prevent the ruin of their country? If they say, his prophecy is from heaven, it may justly be asked, "Why did ye not then believe him?" Mat. xxi. 25. Note, It is pity that those who are so far convinced of the Divine original of gospel preaching as to protect it from the malice of others do not submit to the power and influence of it themselves.

Secondly. A precedent quoted to justify them in acquitting Jeremiah. Some of the elders of the land, either the princes before mentioned or the more intelligent men of the people, stood up, and put the assembly in mind of a former case, as is usual with us in giving judgment; for the wisdom of our predecessors is a direction to us. The case referred to is that of Micah; we have extant the book of his prophecy among the minor prophets.

1. Was it thought strange, that Jeremiah prophesied against this city and the temple? Micah did so before him, even in the reign of Hezekiah, that reign of reformation, ver. 18. Micah said it as publicly as Jeremiah had now spoken to the same purpose, "Zion shall be ploughed like a field," the building shall be all destroyed, so that nothing shall hinder but it may be ploughed; "Jerusalem shall become heaps" of ruins, and "the mountain of the house," on which the temple is built, shall be "as the high places of the forest," overrun with briars and thorns. That prophet not only spoke this, but wrote it, and left it upon record; we find it Mic. iii. 12. By this it appears, that a man may be, as Micah was, a true prophet of the Lord, and yet may prophesy the destruction of Zion and Jerusalem. When we threaten secure sinners with the taking away of the Spirit of God and the kingdom of God from them, and declining churches with the removal of the candlestick, we say no more than what has been said many a time, and what we have warrant from the word of God to say.

2. Was it thought fit by the princes to justify Jeremiah in what he had done? It was what Hezekiah did before him in a like case. Did Hezekiah, and the people of Judah, that is, the representatives of the people, the commons in parliament, did they complain of Micah the prophet? Did they impeach him, or make an act to silence him, and put him to death? No, on the contrary, they took the warning he gave them. Hezekiah, that renowned prince, of blessed memory, set a good example before his successors; for he feared the Lord, as Noah, who, being warned of God of things not seen as yet, was moved with fear. Micah's preaching drove him to his knees; he besought the Lord to turn away the judgment threatened, and to be reconciled to them. And he found it was not in vain to do so; for the Lord repented him of the evil, and returned in mercy to them, sent an angel, who routed the army of the Assyrians that threatened to have ploughed Zion like a field, ver. 19. Hezekiah got good by the preaching, and then, you may be sure, he would do no harm to the preacher. These elders conclude, that it would be of dangerous consequence to the state, if they should gratify the importunity of the priests and prophets in putting Jeremiah to death: "Thus might we procure great evil against our souls." Note, It is good to frighten ourselves from sin with the consideration of the mischief we shall certainly do to ourselves by it, and the irreparable damage it will be to our own souls.

Thirdly. Here is an instance of another prophet that was put to death by Jehoiakim, for prophesying as Jeremiah had done, ver. 20, &c. Some make this to be urged by the persecutors as a case that favoured the prosecution, a modern case, in which speaking such words as Jeremiah had spoken was adjudged treason. Others think the elders that were advocates for Jeremiah alleged this, to shew that thus they might procure great evil against their souls; for it would be adding sin to sin. Jehoiakim, the present king, had slain one prophet already, let not them fill up the measure by slaying another. Hezekiah that protected Micah, prospered; but did Jehoiakim prosper that slew Urijah? No, they all saw the contrary. As good examples, and the good consequences of them, should encourage us in that which is good, so the examples of bad men, and the bad consequences of them, should deter us from that which is evil. But some good interpreters take this narrative from the historian that penned the book, Jeremiah himself, or Baruch, who, to make Jeremiah's deliverance by means of the princes the more wonderful, takes notice of this passage that happened about the same time; for both were in the reign of Jehoiakim, and this in the beginning of his reign, ver. 1. Observe,

1. Urijah's prophecy. It was "against this city, and this land, according to all the words of Jeremiah." The prophets of the Lord agreed in their testimony; and one would have thought that out of the mouth of so many witnesses the word should have been regarded.

2. The prosecution of him for it, ver. 21. Jehoiakim and his courtiers were exasperated against him, and "sought to put him to death." In this wicked design the king was himself principally concerned.

3. His absconding thereupon. When he heard that the king was become his enemy, and sought his life, "he was afraid, and fled, and went into Egypt." This was certainly his fault, and an effect of the weakness of his faith, and it sped accordingly. He distrusted God, and his power to protect him, and bear him out; he was too much under the power of that fear of man which brings a snare. It looked as if he durst not stand to what he had said, or was ashamed of his Master. It was especially unbecoming him to flee into Egypt, and so in effect to abandon the land of Israel, and to throw himself quite out of the way of being useful. Note, There are many that have much grace, but they have little courage; that are very honest, but withal very timorous.

4. His execution notwithstanding. Jehoiakim's malice, one would have thought, might have contented himself with his banishment, and it might suffice to have driven him the country; but they are bloodthirsty that hate the upright, Pr. xxix. 10; it was the life, that precious life, that he hunted after, and nothing less would satisfy him. So implacable is his revenge, that he sends a party of soldiers into Egypt, some hundreds of miles, and they bring him back by force of arms. It would not sufficiently gratify him to have him slain in Egypt, but he must feed his eyes with the bloody spectacle; they brought him to Jehoiakim, and he "slew him with the sword;" for aught I know, with his own hands. Yet neither did this satisfy his insatiable malice; but he loads the dead body of the good man with infamy, would not allow it the decent respects usually and justly paid to the remains of men of distinction; but cast it into "the graves of the common people," as if he had not been a prophet of the Lord. Thus was the shield of Saul vilely cast away, as though he had not been anointed with oil. Thus Jehoiakim hoped both to ruin his reputation with the people, that no heed might be given to his predictions, and to deter others from prophesying in like manner; but in vain: Jeremiah saith the same. There is no contending with the word of God. Herod thought he had gained his point when he had cut off John Baptist's head, but he found himself deceived, when soon after he heard of Jesus Christ, and said in a fright, "This is John the Baptist."

Fourthly. Here is Jeremiah's deliverance. Though Urijah was lately put to death, and persecutors, when they have tasted the blood of saints, are apt to thirst after more, as Herod, Acts xii. 2, 3 yet God wonderfully preserved Jeremiah, though he did not flee as Urijah did, but stood his ground. Ordinary ministers may use ordinary means, provided they be lawful ones, for their own preservation; but they that had an extraordinary mission might expect an extraordinary protection. God raised up a friend for Jeremiah, whose hand was with him; he took him by the hand in a friendly way, encouraged him, assisted him, appeared for him; it was Ahikam the son of Shaphan, one that was minister of state in Josiah's time. We read of him, 2 Kin. xxii. 12. Some think Gedaliah was the son of this Ahikam. He had a great interest, it should seem, among the princes, and he used it in favour of Jeremiah, to prevent the farther designs of the priests and prophets against him, who would have had him turned over into the hand of the people; not those people, ver. 16, that had adjudged him innocent, but the rude and insolent mob, whom they could persuade by their cursed insinuations, not only to cry, Crucify him, crucify him, but to stone him to death in a popular tumult; for perhaps Jehoiakim had been so reproached by his own conscience for slaying Urijah, that they despaired of making him the tool of their malice. Note, God can, when he pleaseth, raise up great men to patronise good men; and it is an encouragement to us to trust him in the way of duty, that he has all men's hearts in his hands.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Jeremiah the prophet, since he cannot persuade people to submit to God's precept, and so to prevent the destruction of their country by the king of Babylon, is here persuading them to submit to God's providence, by yielding tamely to the king of Babylon, and becoming tributaries to him, which was the wisest course they could now take, and would be a mitigation of the calamity, and prevent the laying of their country waste by fire and sword; the sacrificing of their liberties would be the saving of their lives. I. He gives this counsel in God's name to the kings of the neighbour nations, that they might make the best of bad; assuring them that there was no remedy, but they must serve the king of Babylon; and yet in time there should be relief, for his dominion should last but seventy years, ver. 1—11. II. He gives this counsel to Zedekiah king of Judah particularly, ver. 12—14; and to his priests and people, assuring them, that the king of Babylon should still proceed against them, till things were brought to the last extremity, and a patient submission would be the only way to mitigate the calamity, and make it easy, ver. 12—22. Thus the prophet, if they would have hearkened to him, would have directed them in the paths of true policy, as well as true piety.

IN the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah came this word unto Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD to me; Make thee bonds and yokes, and put them upon thy neck, 3 And send them to the king of Edom, and to the king of Moab, and to the king of the Ammonites, and to the king of Tyrus, and to the king of Zidon, by the hand of the messengers which come to Jerusalem unto Zedekiah king of Judah; 4 And command them to say unto their masters, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Thus shall ye say unto your masters; 5 I have made the earth, the man and the beast that are upon the ground, by my great power and by my outstretched arm, and have given it unto whom it seemed meet unto me. 6 And now have I given all these lands into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, my servant; and the beasts of the field have I given him also to serve him. 7 And all nations shall serve him, and his son, and his son's son, until the very time of his land come: and then many nations and great kings shall serve themselves of him. 8 And it shall come to pass, that the nation and kingdom which will not serve the same Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon, and that will not put their neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon, that nation will I punish, saith the LORD, with the sword, and with the famine, and with the pestilence, until I have consumed them by his hand. 9 There-considerably to the east and south-east of Judah. The last clause is wrongly translated; by "all that are in the utmost corners" we must understand, as in chap. ix. 26, certain tribes who rounded off their beard.

xxv. 24. This verse probably comprises the great Arabian peninsula in its northern parts, with the Bedouin tribes of the wilderness. These tribes are numerous and diversified even now, and regularly have some sheikh at their head, as in the days of Jeremiah.

xxv. 25. As the list for the most part proceeds in geographical order, Zimri should be looked for either along with Elam and Media or in connection with the Arab races preceding. The best suggestion is probably that of Grotius, who thought Zimri was an Arabian tribe, otherwise called Zamereni.

xxv. 26. The general summary contained in this verse is concluded by reference to the king of Sheshach. This last is no doubt Babylon, or Babel, as the Targum explains it. The word Sheshach is regarded fore hearken not ye to your prophets, nor to your diviners, nor to your dreamers, nor to your enchanters, nor to your sorcerers, which speak unto you, saying, Ye shall not serve the king of Babylon: 10 For they prophesy a lie unto you, to remove you far from your land; and that I should drive you out, and ye should perish. 11 But the nations that bring their neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon, and serve him, those will I let remain still in their own land, saith the LORD; and they shall till it, and dwell therein.

Some difficulty occurs in the date of this prophecy. This word is said to come to Jeremiah, "in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim," ver. 1, and yet the messengers, to whom he is to deliver the badges of servitude, are said, ver. 3, to come to Zedekiah, king of Judah, who reigned not till eleven years after the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign. Some make it an error of the copy, and that it should be read, ver. 1, 'In the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah,' for which some negligent scribe, having his eye on the title of the foregoing chapter, wrote Jehoiakim. And if one would admit a mistake anywhere, it should be here; for Zedekiah is mentioned again, ver. 12, and the next prophecy is dated the same year, and said to be in the "beginning of the reign of Zedekiah," ch. xxviii. 1. Dr. Lightfoot solves it thus: in the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign, Jeremiah is to make these bonds and yokes, and to put them upon his own neck, in token of Judah's subjection to the king of Babylon, which began at that time; but he is to send them to the neighbouring kings afterwards in the reign of Zedekiah; of whose succession to Jehoiakim, and the ambassadors sent to him, mention is made by way of prediction.

First. Jeremiah is to prepare a sign of the general reduction of all these countries into subjection to the king of Babylon, ver. 2. "Make thee bonds and yokes;" yokes, with bonds to fasten them, that the beast may not slip his neck out of the yoke. Into these the prophet must put his own neck, to make them taken notice of as a prophetical representation; for every one would inquire what was the meaning of Jeremiah's yokes. We find him with one on, ch. xxviii. 10. Hereby he intimated, that he advised them to nothing but what he was resolved to do himself, for he was none of those that bind heavy burthens on others, which they themselves will not touch with one of their fingers. Ministers must thus lay themselves under the weight and obligation of what they preach to others.

Secondly. He is to send this, with a sermon annexed to it, to all the neighbouring princes. Those are mentioned, ver. 3, that lay next to the land of Canaan. It should seem, there was a treaty of alliance on foot between the king of Judah and all those other kings. Jerusalem was the place appointed for the treaty, thither they all send their plenipotentiaries; and it was agreed that they should bind themselves in a league, offensive and defensive, to stand by one another, in opposition to the growing threatening greatness of the king of Babylon, and to reduce his exorbitant power. A mighty confidence they had in their strength thus united, and were ready to call themselves, the high allies. But when the envoys were returning to their respective masters, with the ratification of this treaty, Jeremiah gives each of them a yoke to carry his master, to signify to him that he must either by consent or compulsion become a servant to the king of Babylon; let him choose what he will. In the sermon upon this sign,

1. God asserts his own indisputable right to dispose of kingdoms as he pleaseth, ver. 5. He is the Creator of all things; he made the earth at first, established it, and it abideth; it is still the same, though one generation passeth away, and another comes; he still, by a continued creation, produceth man and beast upon the ground, and it is by his great power and outstretched arm: his arm has an infinite strength, though it be stretched out. Upon this account he may give and convey a property and dominion to whomsoever he pleaseth. As he hath graciously given the earth to the children of men in general, Ps. cxv. 16, so he gives to each their share of it, be it more or less. Note, Whatever any have of the good things of this world it is what God sees fit to give them. We ourselves should therefore be content though we have never so little, and not envy any their share, though they have never so much.

2. He publisheth a grant of all these countries to Nebuchadnezzar. Know all men by these presents, sciant præsentes et futuri,—'let those of the present and those of the future age know,'—this is to certify to all whom it may concern, that I have "given all these lands," with all the wealth of them, into the hands of the king of Babylon, even the beasts of the field, whether tame or wild, have I given to him; parks and pastures, they are all his own. Nebuchadnezzar was a proud wicked man, an idolater, and God in his providence gives him this large dominion, these vast possessions. Note, The things of this world are not the best things; for God often gives the largest share of them to bad men, that are rivals with him, and rebels against him. He was a wicked man, and yet what he had he had by Divine grant. Note, Dominion is not founded in grace. Those that have not any colourable title to eternal happiness may yet have a justifiable title to their temporal good things. Nebuchadnezzar is a very ill man, and yet God calls him his servant, because he employed him as an instrument of his providence for the chastising of the nations, and particularly his own people, and for his service herein he thus liberally repaid him. Those whom God makes use of shall not lose by him, much more will he be found the bountiful rewarder of all those that designedly serve him.

3. He assures them that they should all be unavoidably brought under the dominion of the king of Babylon for a time; ver. 7, "All nations," all these nations, and many others, "shall serve him, and his son, and his son's son." His son was Evil-merodach, and his son's son, Belshazzar, in whom his kingdom ceased; then the time of reckoning with his land came, when the tables should be turned, and many nations and great kings incorporated in the empire of the Medes and Persians shall serve themselves of him, as before. ch. xxv. 14. Thus Adonibezek was trampled upon himself, as he had trampled on other kings.

4. He threatens those with military execution that stood out, and would not submit to the king of Babylon, ver. 8. That nation that will not put their neck under his yoke, I will punish with sword and famine, with one judgment after another, till it is consumed by his hand. Nebuchadnezzar was very unjust and barbarous in invading the rights and liberties of his neighbours thus, and forcing them into a subjection to him; yet God had just and holy ends in permitting it, to punish these nations for their idolatry and gross immoralities They that would not serve the God that made them were justly made to serve their enemies that sought to ruin them.

5 He shews them the vanity of all the hopes they fed themselves with, that they should preserve their liberties, ver. 9, 10. These nations had their prophets too, that pretended to foretell future events by the stars, or by dreams, or enchantments; and they, to please their patrons, and because they would themselves have it so, flattered them with assurances that they should not serve the king of Babylon. Thus they designed to animate them to a vigorous resistance; and, though they had no ground for it, they hoped hereby to do them service. But he tells them it would prove to their destruction; for by resisting they would provoke the conqueror to deal severely with them, to remove them, and drive them out into a miserable captivity, in which they should all be lost, and buried in oblivion. Particular prophecies against these nations that bordered on Israel severally, the ruin of which is here foretold in the general, we shall meet with, ch. xlviii.; xlix.; Eze. xxv.; which had the same accomplishment with this here. Note, When God judgeth, he will overcome.

6. He puts them in a fair way to prevent their destruction, by a quiet and easy submission, ver. 11. The nations that will be content to serve the king of Babylon,-and pay him tribute for seventy years, (ten apprenticeships,) "those will I let remain still in their own land." They that will bend shall not break. Perhaps the dominion of the king of Babylon may bear no harder upon them than that of their own kings had done. It is many times more a point of honour than true wisdom to prefer liberty before life. It is not mentioned to the disgrace of Issachar, that because he saw rest was good, and the land pleasant, that he might peaceably enjoy it, he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant to tribute, Gen. xlix. 14, 15, as these here are advised to do; Serve the king of Babylon, and you shall till the land, and dwell therein. Some would condemn this as the evidence of a mean spirit, but the prophet recommends it as that of a meek spirit that yields to necessity, and by a quiet submission to the hardest turns of providence makes the best of bad. It is better to do so than by struggling make it worse.

Many might have prevented destroying providences, by humbling themselves under humbling providences. It is better take up a lighter cross in our way than pull a heavier on our own head.

12 I spake also to Zedekiah king of Judah according to all these words, saying, Bring your necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon, and serve him and his people, and live. 13 Why will ye die, thou and thy people, by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence, as the LORD hath spoken against the nation that will not serve the king of Babylon? 14 Therefore hearken not unto the words of the prophets that speak unto you, saying, Ye shall not serve the king of Babylon: for they prophesy a lie unto you. 15 For I have not sent them, saith the LORD, yet they prophesy a lie in my name; that I might drive you out, and that ye might perish, ye, and the prophets that prophesy unto you. 16 Also I spake to the priests and to all this people, saying, Thus saith the LORD; Hearken not to the words of your prophets that prophesy unto you, saying, Behold, the vessels of the LORD's house shall now shortly be brought again from Babylon: for they prophesy a lie unto you. 17 Hearken not unto them; serve the king of Babylon, and live: wherefore should this city be laid waste? 18 But if they be prophets, and if the word of the LORD be with them, let them now make intercession to the LORD of hosts, that the vessels which are left in the house of the LORD, and in the house of the king of Judah, and at Jerusalem, go not to Babylon. 19 For thus saith the LORD of hosts concerning the pillars, and concerning the sea, and concerning the bases, and concerning the residue of the vessels that remain in this city, 20 Which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon took not, when he carried away captive Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah from Jerusalem to Babylon, and all the nobles of Judah and Jerusalem; 21 Yea, thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, concerning the vessels that by many as an example of the Jewish device of transposing the letters of words in accordance with certain rules. In this case the order of the Hebrew alphabet would be inverted, and the character for sh put instead of b, and ch instead of l, giving Sheshach for Babel. It has been thought inconsistent with the character of Jeremiah to resort to this device, but a parallel case occurs in chap. li. 41 (see the note on that text), and a different example will be found in chap. li. 1.

xxv. 38. Instead of "fierceness" some copies and old versions read "sword," which is adopted by Dr. Henderson, who translates the phrase "the cruel sword," which we prefer. The received reading may be rendered "oppressive wrath:" that of the Latin Vulgate, "wrath of the dove," cannot be entertained; neither can the Greek version, "Grecian sword," be admitted.

xxvi. 1. A reference to chap. xxv. 1 will show that this chapter precedes it in the order of time by three or four years.

remain in the house of the LORD, and in the house of the king of Judah and of Jerusalem; 22 They shall be carried to Babylon, and there shall they be until the day that I visit them, saith the LORD; then will I bring them up, and restore them to this place.

What was said to all the nations is here with a particular tenderness applied to the nation of the Jews, for whom Jeremiah was sensibly concerned. The case at present stood thus: Judah and Jerusalem had often contested with the king of Babylon, and still were worsted; many both of their valuable persons and their valuable goods were carried to Babylon already, and some of the vessels of the Lord's house particularly. Now how this struggle would issue, was the question. They had those among them at Jerusalem, who pretended to be prophets, that bade them hold out, and they should in a little time be too hard for the king of Babylon, and recover all they had lost. Now Jeremiah is sent to bid them yield, and knock under, for, instead of recovering what they had lost, they should otherwise lose all that remained; and to press them to this is the scope of these verses.

First. Jeremiah humbly addresseth the king of Judah, to persuade him to surrender to the king of Babylon. His act would be the people's, and would determine them; and therefore he speaks to him as to them all, ver. 12, "Bring your necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon, and live." Is it their wisdom to submit to the heavy iron yoke of a cruel tyrant, that they may secure the lives of their bodies? And is it not much more our wisdom to submit to the sweet and easy yoke of our rightful Lord and Master Jesus Christ, that we may secure the lives of our souls? Bring down your spirits to repentance and faith, and that is the way to bring up your spirits to heaven and glory. And with much more cogency and compassion may we expostulate with perishing souls than Jeremiah here expostulates with a perishing people, "Why will ye die by the sword and the famine?" miserable deaths, which you inevitably run yourselves upon, under pretence of avoiding miserable lives. What God had spoken in general, of all those that would not submit to the king of Babylon, he would have them to apply to themselves, and be afraid of. It were well if sinners would in like manner be afraid of the destruction threatened against all those that will not have Christ to reign over them, and reason thus with themselves, Why should we die the second death, which is a thousand times worse than that by sword and famine, when we might submit and live?

Secondly. He addresseth himself likewise to the priests and the people, ver. 16; to persuade them to serve the king of Babylon, that they might live, and might prevent the desolation of the city, ver. 17. Wherefore should it be laid waste, as certainly it will be, if you stand it out? The priests had been Jeremiah's enemies, and had sought his life to destroy it, yet he approves himself their friend, and seeks their lives to preserve and secure them; which is an example to us to render good for evil; when the bloodthirsty hate the upright, yet the just seek his soul, and the welfare of it, Pr. xxix. 10. The matter was far gone here; they were upon the brink of ruin, which they had not been brought to if they would have taken Jeremiah's counsel, yet he continues his friendly admonitions to them, to save the last stake, and manage that wisely, and now at length in this their day to understand the things that belonged to their peace, when they had but one day to turn them in.

Thirdly. In both these addresses he warns them against giving credit to the false prophets, that rocked them asleep in their security, because they saw they loved to slumber. "Hearken not to the words of the prophets," ver. 14; "your prophets," ver. 16. They are not God's prophets, he never sent them; they do not serve him, nor seek to please him; they are yours, for they say what you would have them to say, and aim at nothing but to please you. Two things their prophets flattered them into the belief of:

1. That the power which the king of Babylon had gained over them should now shortly be broken. They said, ver. 14, "Ye shall not serve the king of Babylon." You need not submit voluntarily, for you shall not be compelled to submit. This they prophesied in the name of the Lord, ver. 15; as if God had sent them to the people on this errand, in kindness to them, that they might not disparage themselves by an inglorious surrender; but it was a lie. They said God sent them, but that was false, he disowns it; "I have not sent them, saith the Lord." They said they should never be brought into subjection to the king of Babylon; but that was false too, the event proved it so. They said, to hold out to the last would be the way to secure themselves and their city; but that was false, for it would certainly end in their being driven out, and perishing. So it was all a lie from first to last; and the prophets that deceived the people with these lies did in the issue but deceive themselves: the blind leaders and the blind followers fell together into the ditch; That "ye might perish, ye, and the prophets that prophesy unto you;" who will be so far from warranting your security, that they cannot secure themselves. Note, They that encourage sinners to go on in their sinful ways will in the end perish with them.

2. They prophesied that the vessels of the temple, which the king of Babylon had already carried away, should now shortly be brought back, ver. 16. This they fed the priests with the hopes of, knowing how acceptable it would be to them, who loved the gold of the temple better than the temple that sanctified the gold. The vessels were taken away when Jeconiah was carried captive into Babylon, ver. 20. We have the story, and it is a melancholy one, 2 Kin. xxiv. 13—15; 2 Chr. xxxvi. 10. All the goodly vessels, that is, all the vessels of gold, that were in the house of the Lord, with all the treasures, were taken as prey, and brought to Babylon. This was grievous to them above any thing, for the temple was their pride and confidence, and the stripping of that was too plain an indication of that which the true prophet told them, that their God was departed from them. Their false prophets therefore had no other way to make them easy but by telling them that the king of Babylon should be forced to restore them in a little while. Now here,

1st. Jeremiah bids them think of preserving the vessels that remained, by their prayers, rather than of bringing back those that were gone, by their prophecies; ver. 18, "If they be prophets," as they pretend, and "if the word of the Lord be with them," if they have any intercourse with heaven, and any interest there, let them improve it, by stopping the progress of the judgment. Let them step into the gap, and stand with the censer between the living and the dead, between that which is carried away and that which remains, that the plague may be stayed. Let them make intercession with the Lord of hosts, that the vessels that are left go not after the rest. First. Instead of prophesying, let them pray. Note, Prophets must be praying men; by being much in prayer, they must make it to appear that they keep up a correspondence with heaven. We cannot think that those do as prophets ever hear thence who do not frequently by prayer send thither. By praying for the safety and prosperity of the sanctuary, they must make it appear that, as becomes prophets, they are of a public spirit; and by the success of their prayers it will appear that God favours them. Secondly. Instead of being concerned for the retrieving of what they had lost, they must bestir themselves for the securing of what was left, and take it as a great favour if they can gain that point. When God's judgments are abroad, we must not seek great things, but be thankful for a little.

2nd. He assures them that even this point should not be gained, but the brazen vessels should go after the golden ones, ver. 19—22. Nebuchadnezzar had found so good a booty once, that he would be sure to come again, and take all he could find, not only in the house of the Lord, but in the king's house. They shall all be carried to Babylon in triumph, and there shall they be. But he concludes with a gracious promise, that the time should come when they should all be returned; "Until the day that I visit them" in mercy, according to appointment, and then I will bring those vessels up again, "and restore them to this place," to their place. Surely they were under the protection of a special providence, else they had been melted down, and put to some other use; but there was to be a second temple, for which they were to be reserved. We read particularly of the return of them, Ezr. i. 8. Note, Though the return of the church's prosperity do not come in our time, we must not, therefore, despair of it, for it will come in God's time. Though they that said the vessels of the Lord's house shall shortly be brought again prophesied a lie, ver. 16, he that said, they shall at length be brought again, prophesied the truth. We are apt to set our clock before God's dial, and then to quarrel because they do not agree; but the Lord is a God of judgment, and it is fit we should wait for him.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

In the foregoing chapter Jeremiah had charged those prophets with lies, who foretold the speedy breaking of the yoke of the king of Babylon, and the speedy return of the vessels of the sanctuary; now here we have his contest with a particular prophet upon those heads. I. Hananiah, a pretender to prophecy, in contradiction to Jeremiah, foretold the sinking of Nebuchadnezzar's power, and the return both of the persons and of the vessels that were carried away, ver. 1—4; and as a sign of this he broke the yoke from the neck of Jeremiah, ver. 10, 11. II. Jeremiah wished his words might prove true; but appealed to the event, whether they were so or no, not doubting but that would disprove them, ver. 5—9. III. The doom both of the deceived and of the deceiver is here read. The people that were deceived should have their yoke of wood turned into a yoke of iron, ver. 12—14. And the prophet that was the deceiver should be shortly cut off by death, and he was so accordingly within two months, ver. 15—17.

AND it came to pass the same year, in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the fourth year, and in the fifth month, that Hananiah the son of Azur the prophet, which was of Gibeon, spake unto me in the house of the LORD, in the presence of the priests and of all the people, saying, 2 Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, saying, I have broken the yoke of the king of Babylon. 3 Within two full years will I bring again into this place all the vessels of the LORD's house, that Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon took away from this place, and carried them to Babylon: 4 And I will bring again to this place Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, with all the captives of Judah, that went into Babylon saith the LORD: for I will break the yoke of the king of Babylon. 5 Then the prophet Jeremiah said unto the prophet Hananiah in the presence of the priests, and in the presence of all the people that stood in the house of the LORD, 6 Even the prophet Jeremiah said, Amen: the LORD do so: the LORD perform thy words which thou hast prophesied, to bring again the vessels of the LORD's house, and all that is carried away captive, from Babylon into this place. 7 Nevertheless hear thou now this word that I speak in thine ears, and in the ears of all the people; 8 The prophets that have been before me and before thee of old prophesied both against many countries, and against great kingdoms, of war, and of evil, and of pestilence. 9 The prophet which prophesieth of peace, when the word of the prophet shall come to pass, then shall the prophet be known, that the LORD hath truly sent him.

This struggle between a true prophet and a false one is said here to have happened "in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah," and yet in the fourth year, for the first four years of his reign might well be called the beginning or former part of it, because during those years he reigned under the dominion of the king of Babylon, and as a tributary to him; whereas the rest of his reign, which might well be called the latter part of it, in distinction from that xxvi. 2. Lightfoot says the great court of the Temple was the place were those who brought no sacrifice offered their worship. There, consequently, the inhabitants of the cities of Judah would be represented, if not on ordinary occasions, at least at the great festivals.

xxvi. 6. Here, as in chap. vii. 12, 14, Jeremiah calls attention to the desolation which had overtaken Shiloh, once the chief seat of worship.

xxvi. 7. In whatever sense we take the word "prophets" here and subsequently, it is clear that they were such only in name. Still, if Jeremiah had been a false prophet, uttering untruths in the name of the Lord, the law would have been in their favour (Deut. xviii. 20).

xxvi. 18. It was about a hundred and twenty years before this that Micah so prophesied. The words are taken from Micah iii. 12.

xxvi. 20—23. The case described in these verses seems to have been pleaded in opposition to those adduced in favour of Jeremiah.

former part, he reigned in rebellion against the king of Babylon. In this fourth year of his reign he went in person to Babylon, as we find, ch. li. 59; and, it is probable, that gave the people some hope that his negotiation in person would put a good end to the war, in which hope the false prophets encouraged them, this Hananiah particularly, who was of Gibeon, a priests' city, and therefore probably himself a priest, as well as Jeremiah. Now here we have,

First. The prediction which Hananiah delivered publicly, solemnly, "in the house of the Lord," and in the name of the Lord, in an august assembly, "in the presence of the priests, and of all the people," who probably were expecting to have some message from heaven. In delivering this prophecy he faced Jeremiah, he spoke it to him, ver. 1; designing to confront and contradict him, as much as to say, Jeremiah, thou liest. Now his prediction is, that the king of Babylon's power, at least his power over Judah and Jerusalem, should be speedily broken. That within two full years the vessels of the temple should be brought back, and Jeconiah and all the captives that were carried away with him should return; whereas Jeremiah had foretold that the yoke of the king of Babylon should be bound on yet faster, and that the vessels and captives should not return for seventy years, ver. 2—4. Now upon the reading of this sham prophecy, and comparing it with the messages that God sent by the true prophets, we may observe what a vast difference there is between them. Here is nothing of that spirit and life, that majesty of style, and sublimeness of expression, that appears in the discourses of God's prophets, nothing of that Divine flame and flatus. But that which is especially wanting here, is an air of piety; he speaks with a great deal of confidence of the return of their prosperity, but here is not a word of good counsel given them to repent and reform, and return to God, to pray and seek his face, that they might be prepared for those favours God had in reserve for them. He promiseth them temporal mercies in God's name, but makes no mention of those spiritual mercies which God always promised should go along with them, as ch. xxiv. 7, "I will give them a heart to know me." By all which it appears that, whatever he pretended, he had only the spirit of the world, not the Spirit of God, 1 Cor. xii.; that he aimed to please, not to profit.

Secondly. Jeremiah's reply to this pretended prophecy.

1. He heartily wisheth it might prove true. Such an affection has he for his country, and so truly desirous is he of the welfare of it, that he would be content to lie under the imputation of a false prophet, so that their ruin might be prevented. He said, "Amen, the Lord do so, the Lord perform thy words," ver. 5, 6. This was not the first time that Jeremiah had prayed for his people, though he had prophesied against them, and deprecated the judgments which yet he certainly knew would come; as Christ prayed, "Father, if it be possible, let the cup pass from me," when yet he knew it must not pass from him. Though as a faithful prophet he foresaw and foretold the destruction of Jerusalem, yet as a faithful Israelite he prayed earnestly for the preservation of it, in obedience to that command, "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Though the will of God's purpose is the rule of prophecy and patience, the will of his precept is the rule of prayer and practice. God himself, though he has determined, yet doth not desire, the death of sinners, but would have all men to be saved. Jeremiah often interceded for his people, ch. xviii. 20. The false prophets thought to ingratiate themselves with the people by promising them peace; now the prophet shews that he bore them as great a good-will as their prophets did that they were so fond of; and though he had no warrant from God to promise them peace, yet he earnestly desired it, and prayed for it. How strangely were they besotted who caressed those who did them the greatest wrong imaginable by flattering them; and persecuted him who did them the greatest service imaginable by interceding for them! see ch. xxvii. 18.

2. He appeals to the event to prove it false, ver. 7—9. The false prophets reflected upon Jeremiah, as Ahab upon Micaiah, because he never prophesied good concerning them, but evil; now he pleads that this had been the purport of the prophecies that other prophets had delivered, so that it ought not to be looked upon as a strange thing, or as rendering his mission doubtful; for prophets of old prophesied against many countries and great kingdoms, so bold were they in delivering the messages which God sent by them; and so far from fearing men, or seeking to please them, as Hananiah did, they made no difficulty, no more than Jeremiah did, of threatening war, famine, and pestilence, and what they said was regarded as coming from God. Why then should Jeremiah be run down as a pestilent fellow, and a sower of sedition, who preached no otherwise than God's prophets had always done before him? Other prophets had foretold destruction, and sometimes the destruction did not come, which yet did not disprove their Divine mission, as in the case of Jonah; for God is gracious, and ready to turn away his wrath from those that turn away from their sins. But the prophet that prophesied of peace and prosperity, especially as Hananiah did, absolutely and unconditionally, without adding that necessary proviso, that they do not by wilful sin put a bar in their own door, and stop the current of God's favours, will be proved a true prophet only by the accomplishment of his prediction; if it come to pass, then it shall be known that the Lord hath sent him; but if not, he will appear to be a cheat and an impostor.

10 Then Hananiah the prophet took the yoke from off the prophet Jeremiah's neck, and brake it. 11 And Hananiah spake in the presence of all the people, saying, Thus saith the LORD; Even so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon from the neck of all nations within the space of two full years. And the prophet Jeremiah went his way. 12 Then the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah the prophet, after that Hananiah the prophet had broken the yoke from off the neck of the prophet Jeremiah, saying, 13 Go and tell Hananiah, saying, Thus saith the LORD; Thou hast broken the yokes of wood; but thou shalt make for them yokes of iron. 14 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; I have put a yoke of iron upon the neck of all these nations, that they may serve Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon; and they shall serve him; and I have given him the beasts of the field also. 15 Then said the prophet Jeremiah unto Hananiah the prophet, Hear now, Hananiah; The LORD hath not sent thee; but thou makest this people to trust in a lie. 16 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will cast thee from off the face of the earth: this year thou shalt die, because thou hast taught rebellion against the LORD. 17 So Hananiah the prophet died the same year in the seventh month.

We have here an instance,

First. Of the insolence of the false prophet. To complete the affront he designed Jeremiah, he took the yoke from off his neck, which he carried as a memorial of what he had prophesied concerning the enslaving of the nations to Nebuchadnezzar, and he broke it, that he might give a sign of the accomplishment of his prophecy, as Jeremiah had given of his, and might seem to have conquered him, and to have defeated the intention of his prophecy. See how the lying spirit in the mouth of this false prophet mimics the language of the Spirit of truth; "Thus saith the Lord, so will I break the yoke of the king of Babylon, not only from the neck of this nation, but from the neck of all nations, within two full years." Whether by the force of a heated imagination Hananiah had persuaded himself to believe this, or whether he knew it to be false, and only persuaded them to believe it, doth not appear. But it is plain he speaks with abundance of assurance. It is no new thing for lies to be fathered upon the God of truth.

Secondly. Of the patience of the true prophet. Jeremiah quietly went his way, and when he was reviled he reviled not again, and would not contend with one that was in the height of his fury, and in the midst of the priests and people that were violently set against him. The reason why he went his way was not because he had nothing to answer; but because he was willing to stay till God was pleased to furnish him a direct and immediate answer, which as yet he had not received. He expected God would send a special message to Hananiah, and he would say nothing till he had received that. "I, as a deaf man, heard not, for thou wilt hear." And thou shalt answer, Lord, for me. It may sometimes be our wisdom rather to retreat than to contend. Currenti cede furori, —'Give place unto wrath'

Thirdly. Of the justice of God in giving judgment between Jeremiah and his adversary. Jeremiah went his way as a man in whose mouth there was no rebuke; but God soon put a word into his mouth, for he will appear for those who silently commit their cause to him.

1. The word of God in the mouth of Jeremiah is ratified and confirmed. Let not Jeremiah himself distrust the truth of what he had delivered in God's name, because it met with such a daring opposition and contradiction. If what we have spoken be the truth of God, we must not unsay it, because men gainsay it; for great is the truth, and will prevail. It will stand; let us therefore stand to it, and not fear that men's unbelief or blasphemy will make it of no effect. Hananiah hath broken the yokes of wood, but Jeremiah must make for them yokes of iron that cannot be broken, ver. 13; for, saith God, "I have put a yoke of iron upon the neck of all these nations," which shall lie heavier and bind harder upon them, ver. 14, that they may serve the king of Babylon, and not be able to shake off the yoke, however they may struggle, for they shall serve him whether they will or no; and who is he that can contend with God's counsel? What was said before is repeated again, "I have given him the beasts of the field also," as if there were something significant in that. Men had by their wickedness made themselves like the beasts that perish, and therefore deserved to be ruled by an arbitrary power, as beasts are ruled, and such a power Nebuchadnezzar ruled with; for whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive.

2. Hananiah is sentenced to die for contradicting it, and Jeremiah, when he has received commission from God, boldly tells him so to his face; though before he received that commission he went away and said nothing. 1st. The crimes of which Hananiah stands convicted are, cheating the people and affronting God. "Thou makest this people to trust in a lie," encouraging them to hope they shall have peace, which will make their destruction the more terrible to them when it comes; yet this was not the worst, "thou hast taught rebellion against the Lord," that is, thou hast taught them to despise all the good counsel given them in God's name by the true prophets, and rendered it ineffectual. Those have a great deal to answer for who, by telling sinners they shall have peace, though they go on, harden their hearts in a contempt of the reproofs and admonitions of the word, and the means and methods God takes to bring them to repentance. 2nd. The judgment given against him is, "I will cast thee off from the face of the earth," as unworthy to live upon it; thou shalt be buried in it. "This year thou shalt die," and die as a rebel against the Lord, to whom death would come with a sting and a curse. This sentence was executed, ver. 17. Hananiah died the same year, within two months; for his prophecy is dated the fifth month, ver. 1, and his death the seventh. Good men may perhaps be suddenly taken off by death, in the midst of their days, and in mercy to them, as Josiah was; but this being foretold, as the punishment of his sin, and coming to pass accordingly, it may safely be construed as a testimony from heaven against him, and a confirmation of Jeremiah's mission. And if the people's hearts had not been wretchedly hardened by the deceitfulness of sin, it would have prevented their being farther hardened by the deceitfulness of their prophets.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The contests between Jeremiah and the false prophets were carried on before by preaching, here by writing: there we had sermon against sermon, here we have letter against letter; for some of the false prophets are now carried away into captivity in Babylon, while Jeremiah remains in his own country. Now here is, 1. A letter which Jeremiah wrote to the captives in Babylon, against their prophets that they had there, ver. 1—3. In which letter, 1. He endeavours to reconcile them to their captivity, to be easy under it, and make the best of it, ver. 4—7; 2. He cautions them not to give any credit to their false prophets, that fed them with the hopes of a speedy release, ver. 8, 9; 3. He assures them that God would restore them in mercy to their own land again at the end of seventy years, ver. 10—14; 4. He foretells the destruction of those who yet continued, and that they should be persecuted with one judgment after another, and sent at last into captivity, ver. 15—19; 5. He prophesies the destruction of two of their false prophets that they had in Babylon, that both soothed them up in their sins and set

Yet there is no intimation of a change of speakers. The idea of some is that the cause of Urijah was tried at the same time with that of Jeremiah, but it is only a supposition, and open to several objections. Possibly Jeremiah himself introduces the episode concerning Urijah, to intimate the temper of the men he had escaped from, and the reality of the danger which had overtaken him.

xxvii. 1. This chapter throughout refers to Zedekiah, whereas Jehoiakim appears in the first verse. There must be an error, and indeed the Syriac, an Arabic version, and a few Hebrew manuscripts have Zedekiah in this very verse; besides which chap. xxviii. 1 requires us to understand it so. Dr. Davidson says, "This verse was originally wanting in the Septuagint. It proceeded from an interpolator."

xxvii. 2. This seems to have been a real transaction, and we may suppose that Jeremiah actually made models of bonds and yokes as symbols of servitude.

them ill examples. ver. 20—23; and this is the purport of Jeremiah's letter. II. Here is a letter which Shemaiah a false prophet in Babylon wrote to the priests at Jerusalem, to stir them up to persecute Jeremiah, ver. 24—29; and a denunciation of God's wrath against him for writing such a letter, ver. 30—32; such struggles as these have there always been between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent.

NOW these are the words of the letter that Jeremiah the prophet sent from Jerusalem unto the residue of the elders which were carried away captives, and to the priests, and to the prophets, and to all the people whom Nebuchadnezzar had carried away captive from Jerusalem to Babylon; 2 (After that Jeconiah the king, and the queen, and the eunuchs, the princes of Judah and Jerusalem, and the carpenters, and the smiths, were departed from Jerusalem;) 3 By the hand of Elasah the son of Shaphan, and Gemariah the son of Hilkiah, (whom Zedekiah king of Judah sent unto Babylon to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon) saying, 4 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, unto all that are carried away captives, whom I have caused to be carried away from Jerusalem unto Babylon;

5 Build ye houses, and dwell in them;
And plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them;
6 Take ye wives, and beget sons and daughters;
And take wives for your sons,
And give your daughters to husbands,
That they may bear sons and daughters,
That ye may be increased there, and not diminished.
7 And seek the peace of the city
Whither I have caused you to be carried away captives,
And pray unto the LORD for it;
For in the peace thereof shall ye have peace.

We are here told,

First. That Jeremiah did write to the captives in Babylon in the name of the Lord. Jeconiah had surrendered himself a prisoner, with the queen his mother, the chamberlains of his household, called here the eunuchs, many of "the princes of Judah and Jerusalem," that were at that time the most active men; the carpenters and smiths likewise being demanded, were yielded up, that those which remained might not have any proper hands to fortify their city, or furnish themselves with weapons of war. By this tame submission it was hoped Nebuchadnezzar would be pacified; Satis est prostrasse leoni,—'It suffices the lion to have laid his antagonist prostrate.' But the imperious conqueror grows upon their concessions, like Benhadad upon Ahab's, 1 Kin. x. 5, 6. And not content with this, when these were departed from Jerusalem, he comes again and fetcheth away many more of the elders, the priests, the prophets, and people, ver. 1, such as he thought fit, or such as his soldiers could lay hands on, and carries them to Babylon. The case of these captives was very melancholy, the rather, because they being thus distinguished from the rest of their brethren who continued in their own land, looked as if they were greater sinners than all men that dwelt at Jerusalem. Jeremiah therefore writes a letter to them to comfort them, assuring them that they had no reason either to despair of succour themselves or to envy their brethren that were left behind. Note, 1. The word of God written is as truly given by inspiration of God as his word spoken was; and this was the proper way of spreading the knowledge of God's will among his children scattered abroad. 2. We may serve God and do good by writing to our friends at a distance pious letters of seasonable comforts and wholesome counsel. Whom we cannot speak to we may write to; that which is written remains. This letter of Jeremiah's was sent to the captives in Babylon by the hands of the ambassadors whom king Zedekiah sent to Nebuchadnezzar, probably to pay him his tribute and renew his submission to him, or to treat of peace with him, in which treaty the captives might perhaps hope that they should be included, ver. 3. By such messengers Jeremiah chose to send this message, to put an honour upon it, because it was a message from God. Or perhaps, because there was no settled way of sending letters to Babylon, but as such an occasion as this offered. And then it made the condition of the captives there the more melancholy, that they could rarely hear from their friends and relations they had left behind, which is some reviving and satisfaction to those that are separated from one another.

Secondly. We are here told what he wrote. A copy of the letter at large follows, ver. 24. In these verses,

1. He assures them that he wrote in the name of the "Lord of hosts, the God of Israel," who indited the letter. Jeremiah was but the scribe, or amanuensis. It would be comfortable to them in their captivity to hear that God is the Lord of hosts, of all hosts, and is therefore able to help and deliver them; and that he is the God of Israel, still a God in covenant with his people, though he contend with them, and their enemies for the present are too hard for them. This would likewise be an admonition to them to stand upon their guard against all temptations to the idolatry of Babylon, because the God of Israel, the God whom they served, is Lord of hosts. God's sending to them in this letter might be an encouragement to them in their captivity, as it was an evidence that he had not cast them off, had not abandoned them and disinherited them, though he was displeased with them and corrected them; for if the Lord had been pleased to kill them he would not have written to them.

2. God, by him, owns the hand he had in their captivity; I have caused you to be carried away, ver. 4; and again, ver. 7. All the force of the king of Babylon could not have done it, if God had not ordered it; nor could he have any power against them, but what was given him from above. If God caused them to be carried captives, they might be sure he neither did them any wrong nor meant them any hurt. Note, It will help very much to reconcile us to our troubles, and to make us patient under them, to consider that they are what God has appointed us to: "I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it."

3. He bids them to think of no other but of settling there, and therefore let them resolve to make the best of it; ver. 5, 6, "Build ye houses, and dwell in them," &c. By all this it is intimated to them, 1st. That they must not feed themselves with hopes of a speedy return out of their captivity, for that would keep them still unsettled, and consequently uneasy. They would apply themselves to no business, take no comfort, but be always tiring themselves and provoking their conquerors with the expectations of relief, and their disappointment at last would sink them into despair, and make their condition much more miserable than otherwise it would be; let them, therefore, count upon a continuance there, and accommodate themselves to it as well as they can. Let them build, and plant, and marry, and dispose of their children there, as if they were at home in their own land; let them take a pleasure in seeing their families built up and multiplied; for, though they must expect themselves to die in captivity, yet their children may live to see better days. If they live in the fear of God, what should hinder them but they may live comfortably in Babylon? They cannot but weep sometimes when they remember Zion; but let not weeping hinder sowing, let them not sorrow as those that have no hope, no joy, for they have both. Note, In all conditions of life it is our wisdom and duty to make the best of that which is, and not to throw away the comfort of what we may have, because we have not all we would have. We have a natural affection for our native country, it strangely draws our mind; but it is with a nescio qua dulcedine,—'we can give no good account of the sweet attraction,' and therefore if Providence remove us to some other country, we must resolve to live easy there, to bring our mind to our condition, when our condition is not in every thing to our mind; if the earth be the Lord's, then, wherever a child of God goes, he doth not go off his Father's ground. Patria est ubicunque bene est,—'That place is our country in which we are well off.' If things be not as they have been, instead of fretting at that, we must live in hopes that they will be better than they are. Non si male nunc, et olim sic erit,—'Though we suffer now we shall not always.' 2nd. That they must not disquiet themselves with fears of intolerable hardships in their captivity. They might be ready to suggest—as persons in trouble are always apt to make the worst of things—that it would be in vain to build houses, for their lords and masters would not suffer them to dwell in them when they had built them, nor to eat the fruit of the vineyards they planted. Never fear, saith God, if you live peaceable with them, you shall find them civil to you. Meek and quiet people, that work and mind their own business, have often found much better treatment, even with strangers and enemies, than they expected; and God has made his people to be pitied of those that carried them captives, Ps. cvi. 46, and pity it is but that those who have built houses should dwell in them. Nay,

4. He directs them to seek the good of the country where they were captives, ver. 7, to pray for it, to endeavour it. This forbids them to attempt any thing against the public peace, while they were subjects to the king of Babylon. Though he was a heathen, an idolater, an oppressor, and an enemy to God and his church, yet while he gave them protection they must pay him allegiance, and live quiet and peaceable lives under him, in all godliness and honesty; not plotting to shake off his yoke, but patiently leaving it to God due time to work deliverance for them. Nay, they must pray to God for the peace of the places where they were, that they might oblige them to continue their kindness to them, and disprove the character that had been given their nation, that they were hurtful to kings and provinces, and moved sedition, Ezr. iv. 15. Both the wisdom of the serpent and the innocency of the dove required them to be true to the government they lived under; for, "In the peace thereof shall ye have peace." Should the country be embroiled in war, they would have the greatest share in the calamitous effects of it. Thus the primitive Christians, according to the temper of their holy religion, prayed for the powers that were, though they were persecuting powers. And if they were to pray for, and seek the peace of, the land of their captivity, much more reason have we to pray for the welfare of the land of our nativity, where we are a free people under a good government, that in the peace thereof we and ours may have peace. Every passenger is concerned in the safety of the ship.

8 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Let not your prophets and your diviners,
That be in the midst of you, deceive you,
Neither hearken to your dreams
Which ye cause to be dreamed.
9 For they prophesy falsely unto you in my name:
I have not sent them, saith the LORD.
10 For thus saith the LORD,
That after seventy years be accomplished at Babylon
I will visit you, and perform my good word toward you,
In causing you to return to this place.
11 For I know the thoughts that I think toward you, saith the LORD,
Thoughts of peace, and not of evil,
To give you an expected end.
12 Then shall ye call upon me,
And ye shall go and pray unto me,
And I will hearken unto you.
13 And ye shall seek me, and find me,
When ye shall search for me with all your heart.
14 And I will be found of you, saith the LORD:
And I will turn away your captivity,
And I will gather you from all the nations,
And from all the places whither I have driven you, saith the LORD;

xxvii. 3. That the rulers of Edom, Moab, and other neighbouring nations at this time had ambassadors at Jerusalem is very probable. They all groaned under a common tyranny, or the fear of it; for the power of Babylon either had subdued or threatened every kingdom of Western Asia. We need not suppose that the ambassadors all received the emblems of defeat, but they would remember them.

xxvii. 7. Nebuchadnezzar was, after a reign of forty-three years, succeeded by his son, Evil-Merodach, whose successor was Nergal-Sharezer, his brother-in-law, who had murdered him. Nergal-Sharezer left his crown to his young son, Laborosoarchod, who was killed nine months later. It must be observed that there is some obscurity in the course of Babylonian history, and that the foregoing account may not be altogether complete.

xxvii. 9. The habit of consulting men who professed a knowledge of the future was universally prevalent in ancient times, and is constantly condemned in Scripture. These impostors bore various

And I will bring you again into the place
Whence I caused you to be carried away captive.

To make the people quiet and easy in their captivity,

First. God takes them off from building upon the false bottom which their pretended prophets laid, ver. 8, 9. They told them their captivity should be short, and therefore they must not think of taking root in Babylon, but be upon the wing to go back. Now herein they deceive you, saith God; they prophesy a lie to you, though they prophesy in my name. But let them not deceive you, suffer not yourselves to be deluded by them. As long as we have the word of truth to try the spirits by, it is our own fault if we be deceived, for by it we may be undeceived. "Hearken not to your dreams, which ye cause to be dreamed." He means either the dreams or fancies which the people pleased themselves with, and with which they filled their own heads, (by thinking and speaking of nothing else but a speedy enlargement when they were awake, they caused themselves to dream of it when they were asleep; and then took that for a good omen, and with it strengthened themselves in their vain expectations), or the dreams which the prophets dreamed, and grounded their prophecies upon. God tells the people, They are your dreams, because they pleased them, were the dreams that they desired and wished for; they caused them to be dreamed, for they hearkened to them, and encouraged the prophets to put such shams upon them, desiring them to prophesy nothing but smooth things, Isa. xxx. 10. They were dreams of their own bespeaking. False prophets would not flatter people in their sins, but that they love to be flattered, and speak their prophets fair to speak them fair.

Secondly. He gives them a good bottom to build their hopes upon. We would not persuade people to pull down the house they have built upon the sand, but that there is a rock ready for them to rebuild upon. God here promiseth them that, though they should not return quickly, they should return at length; "after seventy years be accomplished." By this it appears, that the seventy years of the captivity are not to be reckoned from the last captivity, but the first. Note, Though the deliverance of the church do not come in our time, it is sufficient that it will come in God's time, and we are sure that is the time. The promise is, that God will visit them in mercy; though he had long seemed to be strange to them he will come among them, and appear for them, and put honour upon them, as great men do upon their inferiors, by coming to visit them. He will put an end to their captivity, and turn away all the calamities of it. Though they are dispersed, some in one country and some in another, he will gather them from all the places whither they are driven, will set up a standard for them all to resort to, and incorporate them again in one body. And though they are at a great distance, they shall be brought again to their own land, to the place whence they were carried captive, ver. 14. Now,

1. This shall be the performance of God's promise to them; ver. 10, "I will perform my good words toward you." Let not the failing of those predictions, which are delivered as from God, lessen the reputation of those that really are from him. That which is indeed God's word is a good word, and therefore it will be made good, and not one iota or tittle of it shall fall to the ground. Hath he said, and shall he not do it? This will make their return out of captivity very comfortable, that it will be the performance of God's good word to them, the product of a gracious promise.

2. This shall be in pursuance of God's purposes concerning them; ver. 11, "I know the thoughts that I think towards you." Known unto God are all his works, for known unto him are all his thoughts, Acts xv. 18; and his works agree exactly with his thoughts; he doth all according to the counsel of his will. We often do not know our own thoughts, not know our mind, but God is never at any uncertainty within himself. We are sometimes ready to fear that God's designs concerning us are all against us. But he knows the contrary concerning his own people, that they are thoughts of good and not of evil; even that which seems evil is designed for good. His thoughts are all working towards the expected end, which he will give in due time. The end they expect will come, though perhaps not when they expect it. Let them have patience till the fruit is ripe, and then they shall have it. He will give them an end, and expectation; so it is in the original. 1st. He will give them to see the end, that is, the comfortable period of their trouble. Though it last long it shall not last always; the time to favour Zion, yea, the set time, will come; when things are at the worst they will begin to mend. And he will give them to see the glorious perfection of their deliverance; for, as for God, his work is perfect. He that in the beginning finished the heavens and the earth, and all the hosts of both, will finish all the blessings of both to his people. When he begins in ways of mercy, he will make an end; God doth nothing by the halves. 2nd. He will give them to see the expectation, that end which they desire and hope for, and have been long waiting for. He will give them not the expectations of their fears, or the expectations of their fancies, but the expectations of their faith; the end which he has promised, and which will turn for the best to them.

3. This shall be an answer to their prayers and supplications to God, ver. 12—14. 1st. God stirs them up to pray; "Then shall ye call upon me, and ye shall go and pray unto me." Note, When God is about to give his people the expected good, he pours out a spirit of prayer, and it is a good sign he is coming towards them in mercy. Then when you see the expected end approaching, then ye shall call upon me. Note, Promises are given not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage, prayer; and when deliverance is coming we must by prayer go forth to meet it. When Daniel understood that the seventy years were near expiring, then he set his face with more fervency than ever to seek the Lord, Dan. ix. 2, 3. 2nd. He will then stir up himself to come and save them, Ps. lxxx. 2, "I will hearken unto you, and I will be found of you." God hath said it, and we may depend upon it, Seek, and ye shall find. We have a general rule laid down; ver. 13, "Ye shall find me, when ye shall search for me with all your heart." In seeking God, we must search for him, accomplish a diligent search, search for directions in seeking him, and encouragements to our faith and hope; we must continue seeking, and take pains in seeking, as those that search, and this we must do with our heart; that is, in sincerity and uprightness, and with our whole hearts; that is, with vigour and fervency, putting forth all that is within us in prayer; and those who thus seek God shall find him, and shall find him their bountiful rewarder, Heb. xi. 6. He never said to such, Seek ye me in vain.

15 Because ye have said, The LORD hath raised us up prophets in Babylon;
16 Know that thus saith the LORD
Of the king that sitteth upon the throne of David,
And of all the people that dwelleth in this city,
And of your brethren that are not gone forth with you into captivity;
17 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Behold, I will send upon them the sword, the famine, and the pestilence,
And will make them like vile figs, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil.
18 And I will persecute them with the sword, with the famine, and with the pestilence,
And will deliver them to be removed to all the kingdoms of the earth, [a reproach,
To be a curse, and an astonishment, and an hissing, and Among all the nations whither I have driven them:
19 Because they have not hearkened to my words, saith the LORD,
Which I sent unto them by my servants the prophets Rising up early and sending them;
But ye would not hear, saith the LORD
20 Hear ye therefore the word of the LORD, all ye of the captivity, whom I have sent from Jerusalem to Babylon: 21 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, of Ahab the son of Kolaiah, and of Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah, which prophesy a lie unto you in my name; Behold, I will deliver them into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon; and he shall slay them before your eyes; 22 And of them shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The LORD make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire; 23 Because they have committed villany in Israel, and have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives, and have spoken lying words in my name, which I have not commanded them; even I know, and am a witness, saith the LORD.

Jeremiah, having given great encouragement to those among the captives whom he knew to be serious and well-affected, assuring them that God had very kind and favourable intentions concerning them, here turns to those among them who slighted the counsels and comforts that Jeremiah ministered to them, and depended upon what the false prophets flattered them with. When this letter came from Jeremiah, they would be ready to say, What needs he make himself so busy, and take upon him to advise us; "the Lord hath raised us up prophets in Babylon," ver. 15. We are satisfied with those prophets, and can depend upon them, and have no occasion to hear from any prophets in Jerusalem. See the impudent wickedness of this people; as the prophets, when they prophesied lies, said they had them from God, so the people when they invited those prophets thus to flatter them, fathered it upon God, and said it was the Lord that raised them up those prophets. Whereas those that harden people in their sins, and deceive them with false and groundless hopes of God's mercy, we may be sure are no prophets of God's raising up. These prophets of their own told them, that no more should be carried captive, but those that were in captivity should shortly return. Now in answer to this,

First. The prophet here foretells the utter destruction of those who remained still at Jerusalem, notwithstanding what those false prophets said to the contrary. As for the king and people that dwell in the city, who, you think, will be ready to bid you welcome when you return, you are deceived; they shall be followed with one judgment after another,—sword, famine, and pestilence, which shall cut off multitudes; and the poor and miserable remains shall be removed into all kingdoms of the earth, ver. 16—18. And thus God will make them, or rather deal with them, like vile figs. They have made themselves so by their wickedness, and God will use them accordingly, as the salt that has lost its savour, which being good for nothing is cast to the dunghill; and so are rotten figs. This refers to the vision, and the prophecy upon it, which we had ch. xxiv. And the reason given for these proceedings against them is the same that has often been given, and will justify God in the eternal ruin of impenitent sinners; ver. 19, "Because they have not hearkened to my words." "I called, but they refused."

Secondly. He foretells the judgment of God upon the false prophets in Babylon, who deceived the people of God there. He calls upon all the children of the captivity, who boasted of them as prophets of God's raising up, ver. 20, Stand still, and hear the doom of the prophets you are so fond of. The two prophets are named here, Ahab and Zedekiah, ver. 21. Observe,

1. The crimes charged upon them, impiety and immorality. They prophesied lies in God's name, ver. 21; and again, ver. 23, They have spoken lying words in my name. Lying was bad, lying to the people of God, to delude them into a false hope, was worse, but fathering their lies upon the God of truth was worst of all. As they had the face to do that, no marvel if they could allow themselves in the gratification of those vile affections to which God in a way of righteous judgment gave them up. They have done villany in Israel, for "they have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives." Adultery is villany, and it is an aggravation of it, if it be villany in Israel, and in such as pretend to be prophets, who by such wickednesses manifestly disprove their own pretensions. God never sent such profligate wretches on his errands; he is the Lord God of the holy prophets, not of such impure ones. Here it appears why they flatter others in their sin, because they could not reprove them with-names, according to the particular kind of fortune-telling professed by them. The term "prophets" here may signify the ordinary pretenders to foretell in general. The "diviners" pretended to reveal a man's fate, or the lot marked out for him. "Dreamers" gave a predictive significance to their own dreams and to those of their consulters. "Enchanters" practised magical rites and legerdemain. The "sorcerers" professed to have verbal messages from the unseen world. Such seem to have been their prominent features.

xxvii. 16—22. The spoliation of the Temple was effected on successive occasions. The reader should refer to 2 Chron. xxxvi. 7, 10; 2 Kings xxv. 13—17. The prediction at the close of this chapter belongs to the period between the two events recorded in the texts named, and was evidently fulfilled in the most literal manner.

xxviii. 1. To what does the date "the fourth year" refer? Among the many answers proposed to this question, the most ingenious is that the fourth year of the Sabbatical period is meant. Another out condemning themselves. These lewd practices of theirs they knew how to conceal from the eye of the world, that they might preserve their credit; but, I know it, "and am a witness, saith the Lord." The most secret sins are known to God; he can see the villany that is covered with the thickest cloak of hypocrisy; and there is a day coming when he will bring to light all these hidden works of darkness, and every man will appear in his own colours.

2. The judgments threatened against them. The king of Babylon shall "slay them before your eyes," nay, he shall put to a miserable death, roast them in the fire, ver. 22. We may suppose it was not for their impiety and immorality that Nebuchadnezzar punished them thus severely; but sedition, and some attempts of their turbulent spirits upon the public peace, and stirring up the people to revolt and rebel. So much of their wickedness shall then be detected, and in such a wretched manner they shall end their days, that their names shall be a curse among the captives in Babylon, ver. 22. When men would imprecate the greatest evil upon one they hated, they would think they could not load them with a heavier curse in fewer words than to say, "The Lord make thee like Zedekiah, and like Ahab!" Thus were they made ashamed of the prophets they had been proud of, and convinced at last of their folly in hearkening to them. God's faithful prophets were sometimes charged with being the troublers of the land, and such were tortured and slain. But their names were a blessing when they were gone, and their memory sweet, not as these here. As malefactors are attended with infamy and disgrace, so martyrs with glory and honour.

24 Thus shalt thou also speak to Shemaiah the Nehelamite, saying, 25 Thus speaketh the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, saying, Because thou hast sent letters in thy name unto all the people that are at Jerusalem, and to Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah the priest, and to all the priests, saying, 26 The LORD hath made thee priest in the stead of Jehoiada the priest, that ye should be officers in the house of the LORD, for every man that is mad, and maketh himself a prophet, that thou shouldest put him in prison, and in the stocks. 27 Now therefore why hast thou not reproved Jeremiah of Anathoth, which maketh himself a prophet to you? 28 For therefore he sent unto us in Babylon, saying, This captivity is long: build ye houses, and dwell in them; and plant gardens, and eat the fruit of them. 29 And Zephaniah the priest read this letter in the ears of Jeremiah the prophet. 30 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying, 31 Send to all them of the captivity, saying, Thus saith the LORD concerning Shemaiah the Nehelamite; Because that Shemaiah hath prophesied unto you, and I sent him not, and he caused you to trust in a lie: 32 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will punish Shemaiah the Nehelamite, and his seed: he shall not have a man to dwell among this people; neither shall he behold the good that I will do for my people, saith the LORD; because he hath taught rebellion against the LORD.

We have perused the contents of Jeremiah's letter to the captives in Babylon, who had reason, with a great deal of thanks to God and him, to acknowledge the receipt of it, and lay it up among their treasures. But we cannot wonder if the false prophets they had among them were enraged at it; for it gave them their true character. Now here we are told concerning one of them,

First. How he discovered his malice against Jeremiah. This busy fellow is called Shemaiah the Nehelamite, the dreamer, so the margin reads it; because all his prophecies he pretended to have received from God in a dream. He had got a copy of Jeremiah's letter to the captives, or had heard it read, or information was given to him concerning it, and it nettled him exceedingly; and he will take pen in hand and answer it, yea, that he will; but how? He doth not write to Jeremiah in justification of his own mission, nor offer any rational arguments for the support of his prophecies concerning the speedy return of the captives; but he writes to the priests, those faithful patrons of the false prophets, and instigates them to persecute Jeremiah. He writes in his own name, not so much as pretending to have the people's consent to it; but, as if he must be dictator to all mankind, he sends a circular letter (as should seem) among the priests at Jerusalem, and the rest of the people, probably by the same messengers that brought the letter from Jeremiah. But it is chiefly directed to Zephaniah, who was either the immediate son of Maaseiah, or of the twenty-fourth course of the priests, of which Maaseiah was the father and the head. He was not the high priest, but sagan or suffragan to the high priest, or in some other considerable post of command in the temple, as Pashur, ch. xx. 1. Perhaps he was chairman of that committee of priests that was appointed in a particular manner to take cognizance of those that pretended to be prophets, of which there were very many at this time, and to give judgment concerning them. Now,

1. He puts him and the other priests in mind of the duty of their place; ver. 26, "The Lord hath made thee priest in the stead of Jehoiada the priest." Some think he refers to the famous Jehoiada, that great reformer in the days of Joash; and (saith Mr. Gataker) he would insinuate that this Zephaniah is, for spirit and zeal, such another as he, and raised up as he was, for the glory of God, and the good of the church, and therefore it was expected from him that he should proceed against Jeremiah. Thus (saith he) there is no act so injurious or impious but that wicked wretches and false prophets will not only attempt it, but colour it also with some specious pretence of piety, and zeal of God's glory, Isa. lxvi. 5; Jno. xvi. 2. Or, rather, it was some other Jehoiada, his immediate predecessor in this office, who perhaps was carried to Babylon among the priests, ver. 1. Zephaniah is advanced sooner than he expected, to this place of trust and power; and Shemaiah would have him think Providence had preferred him, that he might persecute God's prophets; that he was come to this government for such a time as this, and he was unjust and ungrateful if he did not thus improve his power, or rather abuse it. Their hearts are wretchedly hardened who can justify the doing of mischief, by having a power to do it. These priests' business was to examine "every man that is mad, and maketh himself a prophet." God's faithful prophets are here represented as prophets of their own making, usurpers of the office, and lay intruders; and as men that were mad, acted by some demon, and not divinely inspired; or, as distracted men, and men in a frenzy. Thus the characters of the false prophets are thrown upon the true ones; and if this had been indeed their character, they ought to be bound as madmen, and punished as pretenders; and therefore he concludes Jeremiah must be so done to. He doth not bid them examine whether Jeremiah could produce any proofs of his mission, and could make it appear he was not mad; no, that is taken for granted, and when once he is put into an ill name, he must be run down, of course.

2. He informs them of the letter which Jeremiah had written to the captives, ver. 28. He sent unto us in Babylon with the authority of a prophet, saying, "This captivity is long," and therefore resolve to make the best of it. And what harm was there in this, that it should be objected to him as a crime? The false prophets had formerly said, the captivity would never come, ch. xiv. 13. Jeremiah had said it would come, and the event had already proved him in the right, which obliged them to give credit to him who now said it would be long, rather than to those who said it would be short, but had once before been found liars.

3. He demands judgment against him, taking it for granted that he is "mad, and maketh himself a prophet." He expects they should order him to be put in prison, and in the stocks, ver. 26; that they should thus punish him, and by putting him to disgrace possess the people with prejudices against him, ruin his reputation, and so prevent the giving of any credit to his prophecies at Jerusalem, hoping, if they could gain that point, neither would the captives of Babylon be influenced by him. Nay, he takes upon him to chide Zephaniah for his neglect, ver. 27. Why hast thou not rebuked and restrained Jeremiah of Anathoth? See how insolent and imperious these false prophets were grown, that, though they were in captivity, they would give law to the priests that were not only at liberty, but in power. It is common for those that pretend to more knowledge than their neighbours to be so. Now here is a remarkable instance of the hardness of the hearts of sinners, and it is enough to make us all fear, lest our hearts be at any time hardened. For here we find, 1st. That these sinners would not be convinced by the clearest evidence. God had confirmed his word in the mouth of Jeremiah, it had taken hold of them, Zec. i. 6; and yet, because he doth not prophesy to them the smooth things they desired, they are resolved to look upon him as not duly called to the office of a prophet. None so blind as those that will not see. 2nd. That they would not be reclaimed and reformed by the most severe chastisment. They were now sent into a miserable thraldom for mocking the messengers of the Lord, and misusing his prophets; this was the sin for which God now contended with them, and yet in their distress they trespass yet more against the Lord, 2 Chr. xxviii. 22. This very sin they are notoriously guilty of in their captivity; which shews that afflictions will not of themselves cure men of their sins, unless the grace of God work with them; but will rather exasperate the corruptions they are intended to mortify. So true is that of Solomon, Pr. xxvii. 22, "Though thou shouldest bray a fool in a mortar, yet will not his foolishness depart from him."

Secondly. How Jeremiah came to the knowledge of this; ver. 29, "Zephaniah read this letter in the ears of Jeremiah." He did not design to do as Shemaiah would have him, but, as it should seem, had a respect for Jeremiah; for we find him employed in messages to him as a prophet, ch. xxi. 1, xxxvii. 3, and therefore protected him. He that continued in his dignity and power stood more in awe of God and his judgments than he that was now a captive. Nay, he made Jeremiah acquainted with the contents of the letter, that he might see what enemies he had even among the captives. Note, It is kindness to our friends to let them know their foes.

Thirdly. What was the sentence passed upon Shemaiah for writing this letter. God sent him an answer; for to him Jeremiah committed his cause. It was ordered to be sent not to him, but to them of the captivity, who encouraged and countenanced him as if he had been a prophet of God's raising up, ver. 31, 32. Let them know,

1. That Shemaiah has made fools of them. He promised them peace in God's name, but God did not send him. He forged a commission, and counterfeited the broad seal of heaven to it, and made the people to trust in a lie, and, by preaching false comfort to them, deprived them of true comfort. Nay, he had not only made fools of them, but, which was worse, he had made traitors of them, he had "taught rebellion against the Lord," as Hananiah had done, ch. xxviii. 16. And if vengeance shall be taken on them that rebel, much more on them that teach rebellion, by their doctrine or example.

2. That at his end he also shall be a fool, as the expression is, ch. xvii. 11. His name and family shall be extinct, and shall be buried in oblivion. He shall leave no issue behind him to bear up his name, his pedigree shall end in him; "He shall not have a man to dwell among this people," and neither he nor any that come from him shall "behold the good that I will do for my people." Note, Those are unworthy to share in God's favours to his church, that are not willing to stay his time for them. Shemaiah was angry at Jeremiah's advice to the captives, to see to the building up of their families in Babylon, that they might be increased and not diminished; and therefore justly is he written childless there. Those that slight the blessings of God's word deserve to lose the benefit of them: see Am. vii. 16, 17.

CHAPTER XXX.

The sermon which we have in this and the following chapter, is of a very different complexion from all those before: the prophet doth indeed, by direction from God, change his voice. Most he had said hitherto was by way of reproof and threatening: but these two chapters are wholly taken up with precious promises of a return out of captivity, and that typical of the glorious things reserved for the church in the days of the Messiah. The prophet is bidden not only to preach this, but to write it; because it is intended for the comfort of the generations to come, ver. 1—3. It is here promised, 1. That they should hereafter have a joyful restoration; 1. Though they were now in a great deal of pain and terror, ver. 4—7; 2. Though their oppressors were very strong, explanation is that Zedekiah had previously only held an annual appointment as king, but now, after four years, he really began to reign without such limitation. The Septuagint only has, "And it came to pass in the fourth year of Zedekiah, king of Judah, in the fifth month." The other ancient versions agree with the Hebrew, as represented by our common version. No one can be surprised that Jeremiah was unpopular, and that the false prophet who prophesied peace was accounted patriotic and loyal. Hananiah was from Gibeon, which was one of the cities of the priests, and he was therefore probably a priest himself. The whole of this chapter has a grand historical reality, and a simple, unvarnished aspect, which never characterised mere fiction. The contest between the two prophets is depicted with the graphic hand of an eye-witness and a master, and the conclusion is a catastrophe of tragic effect.

xxix. 1. The place to which this letter belongs is sufficiently indicated. Various important personages, as well as common people, ver. 8—10; 3. Though a full end was made of other nations, and they were not restored, ver. 11; 4. Though all means of their deliverance seemed to fail, and be cut off, ver. 12—14; 5. Though God himself had sent them into captivity, and justly, for their sins, ver. 15, 16; 6. Though all about them looked upon their case as desperate, ver. 17. II. That after their joyful restoration they should have a happy settlement; that their city should be rebuilt, ver. 18, their numbers increased, ver. 19, 20, their government established, ver. 21, God's covenant with them renewed, ver. 22, and their enemies destroyed and cut off, ver. 23, 24.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Thus speaketh the LORD God of Israel, saying, Write thee all the words that I have spoken unto thee in a book. 3 For, lo, the days come, saith the LORD, that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel and Judah, saith the LORD: and I will cause them to return to the land that I gave to their fathers, and they shall possess it. 4 And these are the words that the LORD spake concerning Israel and concerning Judah.

5 For thus saith the LORD;
We have heard a voice of trembling,
Of fear, and not of peace.
6 Ask ye now, and see
Whether a man doth travail with child?
Wherefore do I see every man
With his hands on his loins, as a woman in travail,
And all faces are turned into paleness?
7 Alas! for that day is great,
So that none is like it:
It is even the time of Jacob's trouble;
But he shall be saved out of it. [hosts,
8 For it shall come to pass in that day, saith the LORD of
That I will break his yoke from off thy neck,
And will burst thy bonds,
And strangers shall no more serve themselves of him:
9 But they shall serve the LORD their God,
And David their king, whom I will raise up unto them.

Here, First. Jeremiah is directed to write what God had spoken to him; which perhaps refers to all the foregoing prophecies. He must write them, and publish them, in hopes that they who had not profited by it upon once hearing it, might take more notice of it when in reading it they had leisure for a more considerate review. Or, rather, it refers to the promises of their enlargement, which had been often mixed with his other discourses. He must collect them and put them together, and God will now add unto them many like words. He must write them for the generations to come, who should see them accomplished, and thereby have their faith in the prophecy confirmed. He must write it not in a letter, as that in the chapter before to the captives, but in a book, to be carefully preserved in the archives, or among the public rolls or registers of the state. Daniel understood by these books when the captivity was about coming to an end, Dan. ix. 2. He must write it in a book, not in loose papers; for the days come, and are yet at a great distance, when I will bring again the captivity of Israel and Judah, great numbers of the ten tribes, with those of the two, ver. 3. And it must be written that it may be read then also, that so it may appear how exactly the accomplishment answers the prediction, which is one end of the writing of prophecies. It is intimated that they shall be beloved for their fathers' sake, Rom. xi. 28, for therefore God will bring them again to Canaan, because it was the land that he gave to their fathers, which therefore they shall possess.

Secondly. He is directed what to write. The very words are such as the Holy Ghost teacheth, ver. 4. These are the words which God ordered to be written; and those promises which are written by his order are as truly his word as the ten commandments which were written with his finger.

1. He must write a description of the fright and consternation which the people were now in, and were likely to be still in, upon every attack that the Chaldeans made upon them, which will much magnify both the wonder and the welcomeness of their deliverance; ver. 5, "We have heard a voice of trembling," the shrieks of terror echoing to the alarms of danger. The false prophets told them they should have peace; but there is fear, and not peace, so the margin reads it. And no marvel that, when "without are fightings, within are fears." The men, even the men of war, shall be quite overwhelmed with the calamities of their nation, shall sink under them, and yield to them, and shall look like women in labour, whose pains come upon them in great extremity, and they know they cannot escape them, ver. 6. You never heard of a man travailing with child, and yet here you find not here and there a timorous man, but "every man with his hands on his loins," in the utmost anguish and agony, as a woman in travail, when they see their cities burnt, and their countries laid waste. But this pain is compared to that of a woman in travail, not to that of a death-bed; because it shall end in joy at last, and the pain, like that of a travailing woman, shall be forgotten. All faces shall be turned into paleness. The word signifies not only such paleness as arises from a sudden fright, but that which is the effect of an ill habit of body, the jaundice, or green-sickness. The prophet laments the calamity upon the foresight of it; ver. 7, "Alas! for that day is great," a day of judgment, which is called the great day, the "great and terrible day of the Lord," Joel ii. 31; Jude 6. Great, so that there has been none like it. The last destruction of Jerusalem is thus spoken of by our Saviour, as unparalleled, Mat. xxiv. 21. "It is even the time of Jacob's trouble," a sad time, when God's professing people shall be in distress above other people. The whole time of the captivity was a time of Jacob's trouble, and such times ought to be greatly lamented by all that are concerned for the welfare of Jacob, and the honour of the God of Jacob.

2. He must write the assurances which God had given that a happy end should at length be put to these calamities. 1st. Jacob's troubles shall cease, "he shall be saved out of them." Though the afflictions of the church may last long, they shall not last always. Salvation belongs to the Lord, and shall be wrought for his church. 2nd. Jacob's troublers shall be disabled to do him any farther mischief, and shall be reckoned with for the mischief they have done him; ver. 8, the Lord of hosts, who has all power in his hand, undertakes to do it, "I will break his yoke from off thy neck," which has long lain so heavy, and hath so sorely galled thee; "I will burst thy bonds," and restore thee to liberty and ease, and thou shalt no more be at the beck and command of strangers, shalt no more serve them, nor shall they any more serve themselves of thee, shall no more enrich themselves either by thy possessions or by thy labours. And, 3rd. That which crowns and completes the mercy is, that they shall be restored to the free exercise of their religion again, ver. 9. They shall be delivered from serving their enemies, not that they may live at large, and do what they please, but that they may "serve the Lord their God, and David their king," that they may come again into order under the established government both in church and state. Therefore they were brought into trouble, and made to serve their enemies, because they had not served the Lord their God as they ought to have done, "with joyfulness and gladness of heart," Deu. xxviii. 47. But when the time is come that they should be saved out of their trouble, God will prepare and qualify them for it, by giving them a heart to serve him; and will make it doubly comfortable, by giving them opportunity to serve him. Therefore we are delivered out of the hands of our enemies, that we may serve God, Lu. i. 74, 75. And then deliverances out of temporal calamities are mercies indeed to us, when by them we find ourselves engaged to, and enlarged in, the service of God. They shall serve their own God, and neither be inclined, as they had been of old in the day of their apostacy, nor compelled as they had been of late in the day of their captivity, to serve other gods. They shall serve David their king, such governors as God should from time to time set over them, of the line of David, as Zerubbabel; or at least sitting on the thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David, as Nehemiah. But certainly this has a farther meaning. The Chaldee paraphrase reads it, 'They shall obey or hearken to the Messiah, or Christ, the Son of David, their king.' To him the Jewish interpreters apply it. That dispensation which commenced at their return out of captivity brought them to the Messiah. He is called David their king, because he was the Son of David, Mat. xxii. 42; and he answered to the name, Mat. xx. 31, 32. David was an illustrious type of him, both in his humiliation and his exaltation. The covenant of royalty made with David had principal reference to him, and in him the promises of that covenant had their full accomplishment. God gave him the throne of his father David, he raised him up unto them, set him upon the holy hill of Zion. God is often in the New Testament said to have raised up Jesus, raised him up as a king, Acts iii. 26; xiii. 23, 33. Observe, First. Those that serve the Lord as their God must also serve David their king, must give up themselves to Jesus Christ, to be ruled by him; for all men must honour the Son as they honour the Father, and come into the service and worship of God by him as Mediator. Secondly. Those that are delivered out of spiritual bondage must make it to appear that they are so by giving up themselves to the service of Christ. They to whom he gives rest must take his yoke upon them.

10 Therefore fear thou not, O my servant Jacob, saith the Neither be dismayed, O Israel: [LORD;
For, lo, I will save thee from afar,
And thy seed from the land of their captivity;
And Jacob shall return,
And shall be in rest, and be quiet,
And none shall make him afraid.
11 For I am with thee, saith the LORD, to save thee:
Though I make a full end of all nations whither I have scattered thee,
Yet will I not make a full end of thee:
But I will correct thee in measure,
And will not leave thee altogether unpunished.
12 For thus saith the LORD,
Thy bruise is incurable,
And thy wound is grievous. [bound up:
13 There is none to plead thy cause, that thou mayest be Thou hast no healing medicines.
14 All thy lovers have forgotten thee;
They seek thee not;
For I have wounded thee with the wound of an enemy,
With the chastisement of a cruel one,
For the multitude of thine iniquity;
Because thy sins were increased.
15 Why criest thou for thine affliction?
Thy sorrow is incurable for the multitude of thine iniquity:
Because thy sins were increased, I have done these things unto thee.
16 Therefore all they that devour thee shall be devoured;
And all thine adversaries, every one of them, shall go into captivity;
And they that spoil thee shall be a spoil,
And all that prey upon thee will I give for a prey.

had been deported to Babylon. As stated in 2 Kings xxiv. 14, Nebuchadnezzar had removed into captivity the most important of the Jews, from the king and his mother to the skilled artisans. Jeremiah sent his letter to his brethren by means of a messenger or ambassador, whom king Zedekiah had entrusted with a communication for Nebuchadnezzar. The nature of that communication does not transpire. The objects of Jeremiah's document are sufficiently evident: to declare, in God's name, that the captivity should be long-continued, and that they should act accordingly; to inspire them with hope of deliverance when seventy years have elapsed; to show the evil that would overtake the refractory; and to warn them against false prophets. Some suppose that two letters are combined in this chapter, and some such supposition is necessary. Verse 24, where the second letter is thought to begin, is apparently a rejoinder to one in answer to the first. The concluding verses, 30—32, relate to what may be called the consequences of Shemaiah's missive.

17 For I will restore health unto thee,
And I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith the LORD;
Because they called thee an Outcast, saying,
This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after.

In these verses, as in the foregoing, the deplorable case of the Jews in captivity is set forth; but many precious promises given them, that in due time they should be relieved, and a glorious salvation should be wrought for them.

First. God himself appeared against them; he scattered them, ver. 11; he did all these things unto them, ver. 15. All their calamities came from his hands; whoever were the instruments, he was the principal agent. And this made their case very sad, that God, even their own God, spoke concerning them, to pull down and to destroy. Now, 1. This was intended by him as a fatherly chastisement, and no other; ver. 11, "I will correct thee in measure," or, according to judgment; with discretion, no more than thou deservest, nay, no more than thou canst well bear. What God does against his people is in a way of correction; and that correction is always moderated, and always proceeds from love. "I will not leave thee altogether unpunished," as thou art ready to think I should, because of thy relation to me. Note, A profession of religion, though never so plausible, will be far from securing to us impunity in sin. God is no respecter of persons, but will shew his hatred of sin wherever he finds it; and that he hates it most in those that are nearest to him. God here corrects his people for the multitude of their iniquity, and because their sins were increased, ver. 14, 15. Are our sorrows multiplied at any time, and do they increase? We must acknowledge it is because our sins have been multiplied, and they have increased. Iniquities grow in us, and therefore troubles grow upon us. But, 2. What God intended as a fatherly chastisement they and others interpreted as an act of hostility. They looked upon him as having "wounded him with the wound of an enemy," and "with the chastisement of a cruel one," ver. 14, as if he had designed their ruin, and neither mitigated the correction nor had any mercy in reserve for them. It did indeed seem as if God had dealt thus severely with them, as if he had turned to be their enemy, and had fought against them, Isa. lxiii. 10. Job complains that God was become cruel to him, and multiplied his wounds. When troubles are great and long we have need carefully to watch over our own hearts, that we entertain not such hard thoughts as these of God, and his providence. His are the chastisements of a merciful one, not of a cruel one, however they may appear.

Secondly. Their friends forsook them, and were shy of them. None of those who had courted them in their prosperity would take notice of them now in their distress, ver. 13. It is commonly thus when families go to decay; those hang off from them that had been their hangers-on. In two cases we are glad of the assistance of our friends, and need their service. 1. If we be impeached, accused, or reproached, our friends we expect should appear in vindication of us, should speak a good word for us when we cannot put on a face to speak for ourselves. But here there is none to plead thy cause, none to stand up in thy defence, none to intercede for thee with thine oppressors. Therefore God will plead their cause; for he might well wonder there was none to uphold a people that had been so much the favourites of heaven, Isa. lxiii. 5. 2. If we be sick, or sore, or wounded, we expect our friends should attend us, advise us, sympathize with us, and if occasion be, lend a hand for the applying of healing medicines. But here there is none to do that, none to bind up thy wounds, and by counsels and comforts to make proper applications to thy case. Nay, ver. 11, "All thy lovers have forgotten thee;" out of sight out of mind; instead of seeking thee, they forsake thee. Such as this has often been the case of religion, and serious godliness in the world. Those that from their education, profession, and hopeful beginnings, one might have expected should have been its friends and lovers, its patrons and protectors, desert it, forget it, and have nothing to say in its defence; nor will do any thing towards the healing of its wounds. Observe, "thy lovers have forgotten thee, for I have wounded thee." When God is against a people, who will be for them? Who can be for them so as to do them any kindness? see Job xxx. 11. Now upon this account their case seemed desperate, and past relief; ver. 12, "Thy bruise is incurable, and thy wound is grievous;" and ver. 15, "Thy sorrow is incurable," that is, the condition of the Jews in captivity was such as no human power could redress the grievance of. There they were like a valley full of dead and dry bones, which nothing less than Omnipotence can put life into. Who could imagine that a people so diminished, so impoverished, should ever be restored to their own land, and re-established there? So many were the aggravations of their calamity, that their sorrow would not admit of any alleviation; but they seemed to be hardened in it, and their souls refused to be comforted, till Divine consolations proved strong ones, too strong to be borne down, even by the floods of grief that overwhelmed them. "Thy sorrow is incurable;" because thy sins, instead of being repented of, and forsaken, were increased. Note, Incurable griefs are owing to incurable lusts. Now, in this deplorable condition they were looked upon with disdain; ver. 17, "They called thee an outcast," abandoned by all, abandoned to ruin; they said, "This is Zion, whom no man seeketh after." When they looked on the place where the city and temple had been built, they called that an outcast; now all was in ruins, there was no resort to it, no residence in it, none asked the way to Zion, as formerly, no man seeketh after it. When they looked on the people that formerly dwelt in Zion, but were now in captivity, (and we read of Zion dwelling with the daughter of Babylon, Zec. ii. 7,) they called them outcasts; these are they who belong to Zion, and use to talk much of it, and weep at the remembrance of it, but no man seeketh after them, or inquires concerning them. Note, It is often the lot of Zion to be deserted and despised by those about her.

Thirdly. For all this God will work deliverance and salvation for them in due time. Though no other hand, nay, because no other hand, can cure their wound, his will and shall. 1. Though he seemed to stand at a distance from them, yet he assures them of his presence with them, his powerful and gracious presence. "I will save thee," ver. 10; "I am with thee to save thee," ver. 11. When they are in their troubles he is with them to save them from sinking under them. When the time is come for their deliverance he is with them, to be ready upon the first opportunity to save them out of their trouble. 2. Though they were at a distance, remote from their own land, afar off in the land of their captivity, yet there shall salvation find them out, thence shall it fetch them, them and their seed; for they also shall be known among the Gentiles, and distinguished from them, that they may return, ver. 10. 3. Though they were now full of fears, and continually alarmed, yet the time shall come when they shall be in rest and quiet, safe and easy, and none shall make them afraid, ver. 10. 4. Though the nations into which they were dispersed should be brought to ruin, yet they should be preserved from that ruin; ver. 11, "Though I make a full end of the nations whither I have scattered thee," and there might be danger of thy being lost among them, yet "I will not make a full end of thee." It was promised that in the peace of these nations they should have peace, ch. xxix. 7; and yet in the destruction of these nations they should escape destruction. God's church may sometimes be brought very low, but he will not make a full end of it, ch. v. 10, 18. 5. Though God correct them, and justly, for their sins, their manifold transgressions, and mighty sins, yet he will return in mercy to them, and even their sin shall not prevent their deliverance, when God's time is come. 6. Though their adversaries were mighty, God will bring them down, and break their power; ver 16, "All that devour thee shall be devoured;" and thus Zion's cause will be pleaded, and will be made to appear to all the world a righteous cause. Thus Zion's deliverance will be brought about by the destruction of her oppressors. And thus her enemies will be recompensed for all the injury they have done her. For there is a God that judgeth in the earth, a God to whom vengeance belongs; they shall every one of them, without exception, go into captivity, and they that now spoil thee, the day will come when they shall be a spoil. They that lead into captivity shall go into captivity, Rev. xiii. 10. This might serve to oblige the present conquerors to use their captives well; because the wheel would turn round, and the day would come when they also should be captives; and let them do now as they would be done by. 7. Though the wound seem incurable, God will make a cure of it; ver. 17, "I will restore health unto thee." Be the disease never so dangerous, the patient is safe if God undertake the cure.

Fourthly. Upon the whole matter they are cautioned against inordinate fear and grief; for in these precious promises there is enough to silence both. 1. They must not tremble, as those that have no hope, in the apprehension of future farther troubles that might threaten them; ver. 10, "Fear thou not, O my servant Jacob, neither be dismayed." Note, Those that are God's servants must not give way to disquieting fears, whatever difficulties and dangers may be before them. 2. They must not sorrow as those that have no hope, for the troubles which at present they lie under; ver. 15, "Why criest thou for thine affliction?" It is true thy carnal confidences fail thee; creatures are physicians of no value, but I will heal thy wound, and therefore, Why criest thou? Why dost thou fret and complain thus? It is for thy sin, ver. 14, 15; and therefore instead of repining thou shouldest be repenting: Wherefore should a man complain for the punishment of his sin? The issue will be good at last, and therefore rejoice in hope.

18 Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will bring again the captivity of Jacob's tents,
And have mercy on his dwellingplaces;
And the city shall be builded upon her own heap,
And the palace shall remain after the manner thereof.
19 And out of them shall proceed thanksgiving
And the voice of them that make merry:
And I will multiply them, and they shall not be few;
I will also glorify them, and they shall not be small.
20 Their children also shall be as aforetime,
And their congregation shall be established before me,
And I will punish all that oppress them.
21 And their nobles shall be of themselves,
And their governor shall proceed from the midst of them;
And I will cause him to draw near, and he shall approach unto me:
For who is this that engaged his heart to approach unto me?
Saith the LORD.
22 And ye shall be my people,
And I will be your God.
23 Behold, the whirlwind of the LORD goeth forth with fury,
A continuing whirlwind: it shall fall with pain upon the head of the wicked.
24 The fierce anger of the LORD shall not return, until he have done it,
And until he have performed the intents of his heart:
In the latter days ye shall consider it.

We have here farther intimations of the favour God had in reserve for them, after the days of their calamity were over. It is promised,

First. That the city and temple should be rebuilt, ver. 18. Jacob's tents and his dwelling-place felt the effects of the captivity; for they lay in ruins when the inhabitants were carried away captives. But when they are returned the habitations shall be repaired, and raised up out of their ruins; and therein God will have mercy upon their dwelling-places that had been monuments of his justice. "Then the city" of Jerusalem "shall be built upon her own heap," her own hill, though it be no better than a ruinous heap. The situation was unexceptionable, and therefore it shall be rebuilt upon the same spot of ground. He that can make of a city a heap, Isa. xxv. 1, can when he pleaseth make of a heap a city again. The palace, that is, the temple, God's palace, "shall remain after the manner thereof;" it shall be built after the old model; and the service of God shall be constantly kept up there, and attended as formerly.

Secondly. That the sacred feasts should again be solemnized, ver. 19. Out of the city, and the temple, and all the dwelling-places of Jacob, "shall proceed thanksgiving, and the voice of them that make merry." They shall go with expressions of joy to the temple service, and with the like shall return from it. Observe, The voice of thanksgiving is the same with the voice of them that make merry; for whatever is the matter of our joy should be the matter of our praise. "Is any merry? let him sing psalms." What makes us cheerful, let it make us thankful; serve the Lord with gladness.

Thirdly. That the people should be multiplied and increased, and made considerable; "They shall not be few—they shall not be small," but shall become numerous and illustrious, and make a figure among the nations, for I will multiply them, and I will glorify them; it is for the honour of the church to have many added to it that shall be saved. This would make them to be of some weight among their neighbours. Let a people be never so much diminished and despised, God can multiply and glorify them. They shall be restored to

xxx. 1. There is nothing to show whether this prophecy was written early or late in the captivity, but it was certainly written at a time of public depression and misgiving. This chapter and the next, however, form a continuous document. Some have supposed the date of the composition to be that of the approach of the Medo-Persian army against Babylon, but there is no good ground for the idea.

xxx. 8. "His yoke" is the yoke of the foreign oppressor, consequently "thy neck" must be the neck of the Jewish people personified. So "thy bonds" are the bonds of the Jews, who, by a not unusual change of person, are in the last clause spoken of as "him."

xxx. 9. The natural sense of this is that the Jews should serve the Lord and their own king, here called David. It is admitted that the term David at least implies a king of his family, but no such king has occupied the Jewish throne. Has the prophecy then failed? Zerubbabel has been suggested, but he was not a king. The Jews under-their former honour; their children shall be as aforetime, playing in the streets, Zec. viii. 5; they shall inherit their parents' estates and honour, as formerly. And their congregation shall, both in civil and sacred things, be established before me. There shall be a constant succession of faithful magistrates in the congregation of the elders to establish that, and of faithful worshippers in the congregation of the saints. As one generation passeth away another shall be raised up, and so the congregation shall be established before God.

Fourthly. That they shall be blessed with a good government, ver. 21. Their nobles and judges shall be of themselves, of their own nation, and they shall no longer be ruled by strangers and enemies; "Their governor shall proceed from the midst of them," shall be one that has been a sharer with them in the afflictions of their captive state. And this has reference to Christ our governor, David our king, ver. 9. He is of ourselves, in all things made like unto his brethren; "and I will cause him to draw near." This may be understood either, 1. Of the people, Jacob and Israel. I will cause them to draw near to me in the temple service, as formerly; to come into covenant with me, as my people, ver. 22; to approach to me in communion; for who hath engaged his heart, made a covenant with it, and brought it into bonds, to approach unto me? How few are there that do so! None can do it but by the special grace of God, causing them to draw near. Note, Whenever we approach to God in any holy ordinance we must engage our hearts to do it; the heart must be prepared for the duty, employed in it, and kept close to it. The heart is the main thing that God looks at and requires; but it is deceitful, and will start aside, if a great deal of care and pains be not taken to engage it, to bind this sacrifice with cords. Or, 2. It may be understood of the governor; for it is a single person that is spoken of. Their governor shall be duly called to his office, shall draw near to God, to consult him upon all occasions. God will cause him to approach to him, for otherwise who would engage to take care of so weak a people, and let this ruin come under their hand? But when God has work to do, though attended with many discouragements, he will raise up instruments to do it. But it looks farther to Christ; to him as Mediator. Note, 1st. The proper work and office of Christ, as Mediator, is to draw near and approach unto God; not for himself only, but for us, and in our name and stead, as the high priest of our profession. The priests are said to draw nigh to God, Lev. x. 3; xxi. 17. Moses drew near, Ex. xx. 21. 2nd. God the Father did cause Jesus Christ thus to draw near and approach to him as Mediator. He commanded and appointed him to do it; he sanctified and sealed him, anointed him for this purpose, and accepted of him, and declared himself well pleased in him. 3rd. Jesus Christ, being caused by the Father to approach unto him as Mediator, did engage his heart to do it, that is, he bound and obliged himself to it, undertook for his heart, so some read it, for his soul, that in the fulness of time it should be made an offering for sin. His own voluntary susception in compliance with his Father's will, and in compassion to fallen man, engaged him, and then his own honour kept him to it. It also intimates that he was hearty and resolute, free and cheerful in it, and made nothing of the difficulties that lay in his way, Isa. lxiii. 3—5. 4th. Jesus Christ was in all this truly wonderful. We may well ask with admiration, Who is this that thus engageth his heart to such an undertaking?

Fifthly. That they shall be taken again into covenant with God, according to the covenant made with their fathers; ver. 22, "Ye shall be my people;" and it is God's good work in us that makes us to him a people, a people for his name, Acts xv. 14; "And I will be your God," and it is his good will to us that is the summary of that part of the covenant.

Sixthly. That their enemies shall be reckoned with and brought down; ver. 20, "I will punish all that oppress them;" so that it shall appear to all a dangerous thing to touch God's anointed, Ps. cv. 15. The last two verses come under this head, "The whirlwind of the Lord shall fall with pain upon the head of the wicked." These two verses we had before, ch. xxiii. 19, 20; there they were a denunciation of God's wrath against the wicked hypocrites in Israel; here, against the wicked oppressors of Israel. The expressions exactly agreeing speak the same with that, Isa. li. 22, 23, "I will take the cup of trembling out of thy hand, and put it into the hand of them that afflict thee." The wrath of God against the wicked is here represented to be, 1. Very terrible, like a whirlwind, surprising, and irresistible. 2. Very grievous; it shall fall with pain upon their heads, they shall be as ill hurt as frightened. 3. It shall pursue them. Whirlwinds use to be short, but this shall be a continuing whirlwind. 4. It shall accomplish that for which it is sent; "the anger of the Lord shall not return till he have done it." The purposes of his wrath, as well as the purposes of his love, will all be fulfilled. He will perform the intents of his heart. And, 5. Those that will not lay this to heart now will then be unable to put off the thoughts of it; "In the latter days ye shall consider it," when it will be too late to prevent it.

CHAPTER XXXI.

This chapter goes on with the good words and comfortable words which we had in the chapter before, for the encouragement of the captives, assuring them that God would in due time return them or their children to their own land, and make them a great and happy nation again; especially by sending them the Messiah, in whose kingdom and grace many of these promises were to have their full accomplishment. I. They shall be restored to peace, and honour, and joy, and great plenty, ver. 1—14. II. Their sorrow for the loss of their children shall be at an end, ver. 15—17. III. They shall repent of their sins, and God will graciously accept them in their repentance, ver. 18—20. IV. They shall be multiplied and increased, both their children and their cattle, and not be cut off and diminished as they had been, ver. 21—30. V. God will renew his covenant with them, and enrich it with spiritual blessings, ver. 31—34. VI. These blessings shall be secured to theirs after them, even to the spiritual seed of Israel for ever, ver. 35—37. VII. As an earnest of this, the city of Jerusalem shall be rebuilt, ver. 38—40. These exceeding great and precious promises were firm foundations of hope, and full fountains of joy, to the poor captives; and we also may apply them to ourselves, and mix faith with them.

AT the same time, saith the LORD,
Will I be the God of all the families of Israel,
And they shall be my people.
2 Thus saith the LORD,
The people which were left of the sword found grace in the wilderness;
Even Israel, when I went to cause him to rest.
3 The LORD hath appeared of old unto me, saying,
Yea, I have loved thee with an everlasting love:
Therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee.
4 Again I will build thee,
And thou shalt be built, O virgin of Israel:
Thou shalt again be adorned with thy tabrets,
And shalt go forth in the dances of them that make merry.
5 Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria:
The planters shall plant, and shall eat them as common [things.
6 For there shall be a day,
That the watchmen upon the mount Ephraim shall cry.
Arise ye, and let us go up to Zion
Unto the LORD our God.
7 For thus saith the LORD;
Sing with gladness for Jacob,
And shout among the chief of the nations:
Publish ye, praise ye, and say,
O LORD, save thy people, the remnant of Israel.
8 Behold, I will bring them from the north country,
And gather them from the coasts of the earth,
And with them the blind and the lame,
The woman with child and her that travaileth with child together:
A great company shall return hither
9 They shall come with weeping,
And with supplications will I lead them:
I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters
In a straight way, wherein they shall not stumble:
For I am a father to Israel,
And Ephraim is my firstborn.

God here assures his people,

First. That he will again take them into a covenant relation to himself, from which they seemed to have been cut off. At the same time when God's anger breaks out against the wicked, ch. xxx. 24, his own people shall be owned by him as the children of his love; "I will be the God," that is, I will shew myself to be "the God of all the families of Israel," ver. 1, not of the two tribes only, but of all the tribes; not of the house of Aaron only, and the families of Levi, but of all their families. Not only their state in general, but their particular families, and the interests of them, shall have the benefit of a special relation to God. Note, The families of good people, in their family capacity, may apply themselves to God, and stay themselves upon him as their God. If we and our houses serve the Lord, we and our houses shall be protected and blessed by him, Pr. iii. 33.

Secondly. That he will do for them in bringing them out of Babylon, as he had done for their fathers when he delivered them out of Egypt, and as he had purposed to do when he first took them to be his people. 1. He puts them in mind what he did for their fathers when he brought them out of Egypt, ver. 2. They were then, as these were, a people left of the sword, that sword of Pharaoh with which he cut off all the male children as soon as they were born, a bloody sword indeed they had narrowly escaped, and that sword with which he threatened to cut them off when he pursued them to the Red sea. They were then in the wilderness, where they seemed to be lost and forgotten, as these were now in a strange land, and yet they found grace in God's sight, were owned and highly honoured by him, and blessed with wonderful instances of his peculiar favour, and he was at this time going to cause them to rest in Canaan. Note, When we are brought very low, and insuperable difficulties appear in the way of our deliverance, it is good to remember that it has been so with the church formerly, and yet it has been raised up from its low estate, and has got to Canaan through all the hardships of a wilderness; and God is still the same. 2. They put him in mind of what God had done for their fathers, intimating that they now saw not such signs, and were ready to ask, as Gideon did, Where are all the wonders that our fathers told us of? ver. 3. It is true "the Lord hath appeared of old unto me," in Egypt, in the wilderness, hath appeared with me and for me, hath been seen in his glory as my God. The years of ancient times were glorious years, but now it is otherwise; what good will it do us that he appeared of old to us, when now he is a God that hides himself from us? Isa. xlv. 15. Note, It is hard to take comfort from former smiles, under present frowns. 3. To this he answers with assurance of the constancy of his love; "Yea, I have loved thee," not only with an ancient love, but with an everlasting love, a love that shall never fail, however the comforts of it may for a time be suspended. It is an everlasting love, therefore have I extended or drawn out lovingkindness unto thee also, as well as to thine ancestors. Or, With lovingkindness have I drawn thee to myself as thy God, from all the idols to which thou hadst turned aside. Note, It is the happiness of those who are through grace interested in the love of God, that it is an everlasting love; from everlasting in the counsels of it to everlasting in the continuance and consequences of it; and that nothing can separate them from that love; and those whom God loves with this love he will draw them into covenant and communion with himself by the influences of his Spirit upon their souls; he will draw them with lovingkindness, with the cords of men and bands of love, than which no attraction can be more powerful.

Thirdly. That he will again form them into a people, and give them a very joyful settlement in their own land, ver. 4, 5. Is the church of God his house, his temple? Is it now in ruins? It is so; but, "Again I will build thee, and thou shalt be built." Are the parts of this building dispersed? They shall be collected and put together again, each in its place. If God undertake to build them they shall be built, whatever opposition may be given to it. Is Israel a beautiful virgin? Is she now stripped of her ornaments, and reduced to a melancholy state? She is so; but "thou shalt again be adorned" and made fine, stood it of the Messiah, as the Targum shows; and this has been the predominant explanation among both Jews and Christians. (Compare with this Ezek. xxxiv. 23; xxxvii. 24; Hosea iii. 5.)

xxx. 11. The kingdoms to whom the Hebrews were subject have, in effect, all disappeared, and the nationalities of the peoples have long been lost. But amid the changes, and interminglings, and perishing of nations, the Jews have preserved their identity.

xxx. 21. This remarkable and emphatic verse is too feebly rendered by our translators. The Hebrew for "nobles" is not plural but singular, and denotes a mighty or illustrious one—the one immediately after called a "governor" or ruler. Moreover, the words for "engaged his heart" have been better translated "pledged his heart." Many critics have explained this of Christ in his mediatorial capacity. He had been before predicted as a king (verse 9), and now he is foretold as a priest.

xxxi. 1. Here, once again, Israel is introduced as the object of adorned with thy tabrets or timbrels; the ornaments of thy chamber, and made merry. They shall resume their harps, which had been hung upon the willow-trees, shall tune them, and shall themselves be in tune to make use of them. They shall be adorned with their tabrets, for now their mirth and music shall be seasonable; it shall be a proper time for it. God in his providence shall call them to it, and then it shall be an ornament to them; whereas tabrets, at a time of common calamity, when God called to mourning, were a shame to them. Or it may refer to their use of tabrets in the solemnizing of their religious feasts, and their going forth in dances then, as the daughters of Shiloh, Jud. xxi. 19, 21. And then our mirth is indeed an ornament to us, when we serve God and honour him with it. Is the joy of the city maintained by the products of the country? It is so, and therefore it is promised, ver. 5, "Thou shalt yet plant vines upon the mountains of Samaria;" which had been the head city of the kingdom of Israel, in opposition to that of Judah; but they shall now be united, Eze. xxxvii. 22. And there shall be such a perfect peace and security, that men shall apply themselves wholly to the improvement of their ground; the planters shall plant, not fearing the soldiers coming to eat the fruits of what they had planted, or to pluck it up; but they themselves shall eat them freely, as common things, not forbidden fruits, not forbidden by the law of God, as they were till the fifth year, Lev. xix. 13—15; not forbidden by the owners, because there shall be such plenty as to yield enough for all, for each.

Fourthly. That they shall have liberty and opportunity to worship God in the ordinances of his own appointment, and shall have both invitations and inclinations to do so; ver. 6, "There shall be a day," and a glorious day it will be, "when the watchmen upon mount Ephraim," that are sent to stand sentinel there to give notice of the approach of the enemy, finding that all is very quiet, and there is no appearance of danger, shall desire for a time to be discharged from their post, that they may go up to Zion, to praise God for the public peace. Or the watchmen that tend the vineyards, spoken of ver. 5, shall stir up themselves, and one another, and all their neighbours, to go and keep the solemn feasts at Jerusalem. Now this implies that the service of God shall be again set up in Zion, that there shall be a general resort to it, with much affection and mutual excitement, as in David's time, Ps. cxxii. 1. But that which is most observable here is that the watchmen of Ephraim are forward to promote the worship of God at Jerusalem, whereas, when time was, the watchman of Ephraim was hatred against the house of his God, Hos. ix. 8; and, instead of inviting people to Zion, laid snares for those that set their faces thitherward, Hos. v. 1. Note, God can make those who have been enemies to religion, and the true worship of God, to become encouragers of it, and leaders in it. This promise was to have its full accomplishment in the days of the Messiah, when the Gospel should be preached to all these countries, and a general invitation thereby given unto the church of Christ, of which Zion was a type.

Fifthly. That God shall have the glory, and the church both the honour and comfort, of this blessed change; ver. 7, "Sing with gladness for Jacob;" that is, let all her friends and well-wishers rejoice with her, Deu. xxxii. 43; "Rejoice ye Gentiles with his people," Rom. xv. 10. The restoration of Jacob will be taken notice of by all the neighbours, it will be matter of joy to them all, and they shall all join with Jacob in his joys, and thereby pay him respect, and put a reputation upon him. Even the chief of the nations, that make the greatest figure, shall think it an honour to them to congratulate the restoration of Jacob, and shall do themselves the honour to send their ambassadors on that errand. "Publish ye, praise ye;" in publishing these tidings, praise the God of Israel, praise the Israel of God, speak honourably of both. The publishers of the Gospel must do it with praise; and therefore it is often spoken of in the Psalms as mingled with praises, Ps. lxvii. 2, 3; xcvi. 2, 3. What we either bring to others or take to ourselves the comfort of, we must be sure to give God the praise of; "Praise ye, and say, O Lord, save thy people;" that is, perfect their salvation, go on to save the remnant of Israel that are yet in bondage, as Ps. cxxvi. 3, 4. Note, When we are praising God for what he has done we must call upon him for the future favours which his church is in need and expectation of. And in praying to him we really praise him, and give him glory; he takes it so.

Sixthly. That in order to a happy settlement in their own land they shall have a joyful return out of the land of their captivity, and a very comfortable passage homeward, ver. 8, 9. And this beginning of mercy should be to them a pledge of all the other blessings here promised. 1. Though they are scattered to places far remote, yet they shall be brought together from the north country, and from the coasts of the earth; wherever they are God will find them out. 2. Though many of them are very unfit for travel, yet that shall be no hindrance to them. The blind and the lame shall come; such a good-will shall they have to their journey, and such a good heart upon it, that they shall not make their blindness and lameness an excuse for staying where they are. Their companions will be ready to help them, will be eyes to the blind and legs to the lame, as good Christians ought to be to one another in their travels heavenward, Job xxix. 15. But, above all, their God will help them; and let none plead he is blind that has God for his guide; or lame that has God for his strength. The women with child are heavy, and it is not fit they should undertake such a journey, much less those that travail with child; and yet, when it is to return to Zion, neither the one nor the other shall make any difficulty of it. Note, When God calls we must not plead any inability to come; for he that calls us will help us, will strengthen us. 3. Though they seem to be diminished, and to become few in numbers, yet when they come all together they shall be a great company; and so will God's spiritual Israel be, when there shall be a general rendezvous of them, though now they are but a little flock. 4. Though their return will be matter of joy to them, yet prayers and tears will be both their stores and their artillery; ver. 9, "They shall come with weeping, and with supplication," weeping for sin, supplication for pardon; for the goodness of God shall lead them to repentance, and they shall weep with more bitterness, and more tenderness for sin, when they are delivered out of their captivity than ever they did when they were groaning under it. Weeping and praying do well together; tears put life into prayers, and express the liveliness of them, and prayers help to wipe away tears. 'With favours will I lead them,' so the margin reads it; in their journey they shall be compassed with God's favours, the fruits of his favour. 5. Though they have a perilous journey, yet they shall be safe under a Divine conduct and convoy. Is the country they pass through dry and thirsty? "I will cause them to walk by the rivers of waters," not the waters of a landflood, which fail in summer. Is it a wilderness where there is no road, no track? I will cause them to walk in a straight way, which they shall not miss. Is it a rough and rocky country? Yet they shall not stumble. Note, Whithersoever God gives his people a clear call, he will either find them or make them a ready way; and while we are following providence we may be sure providence will not be wanting to us. And, 6. Here is a reason given why God will take all this care of his people; "for I am a father to Israel," a father that begat him, and therefore will maintain him, that have the care and compassion of a father for him, Ps. ciii. 13. "And Ephraim is my first-born," even Ephraim, that, having gone astray from God, was no more worthy to be called a son, yet shall be owned as a first-born, particularly dear, and heir of a double portion of blessings. The same reason that was given for their release out of Egypt is given for their release out of Babylon; they are freeborn, and therefore must not be enslaved; are born to God, and therefore must not be the servants of men; Ex. iv. 22, 23, "Israel is my son, my first-born, let my son go, that he may serve me." If we take God for our father, and join ourselves to the church of the first-born, we may be assured that we shall want nothing that is good for us.

10 Hear the word of the LORD, O ye nations,
And declare it in the isles afar off, and say,
He that scattered Israel will gather him,
And keep him, as a shepherd doth his flock.
11 For the LORD hath redeemed Jacob,
And ransomed him from the hand of him that was stronger than he.
12 Therefore they shall come and sing in the height of Zion,
And shall flow together to the goodness of the LORD,
For wheat, and for wine, and for oil,
And for the young of the flock, and of the herd:
And their soul shall be as a watered garden;
And they shall not sorrow any more at all

WATERED GARDEN.

13 Then shall the virgin rejoice in the dance,
Both young men and old together:
For I will turn their mourning into joy,
And will comfort them, and make them rejoice from their sorrow.
14 And I will satiate the soul of the priests with fatness,
And my people shall be satisfied with my goodness, saith the LORD.
15 Thus saith the LORD;
A voice was heard in Ramah,
Lamentation, and bitter weeping;
Rahel weeping for her children [were not Refused to be comforted for her children, because they
16 Thus saith the LORD;
Refrain thy voice from weeping,
And thine eyes from tears:
For thy work shall be rewarded, saith the LORD,
And they shall come again from the land of the enemy
17 And there is hope in thine end, saith the LORD,
That thy children shall come again to their own border.

This paragraph is much to the same purpose with the last, publishing to the world, as well as to the church, the purposes of God's love concerning his people. This is a "word of the Lord," which the nations must hear, for it is a prophecy of a work of the Lord, which the nations cannot but take notice of; let them hear the prophecy that they may the better understand and improve the performance. And let them that hear it themselves declare it to others, "declare it in the isles afar off;" it will be a piece of news that will spread all the world over. It will look very great in history, let us see how it looks in prophecy. It is foretold,

First. That those that are dispersed shall be brought together again from their dispersions. He that scattered Israel will gather him, for he knows whither he scattered them, and therefore where to find them, ver. 10. Una eademque manus vulnus opemque tulit,—'The hand that inflicted the wound shall heal it.' And when he has gathered him into one body, one fold, he will keep him as a shepherd doth his flock from being scattered again.

Secondly. That those that are sold and alienated shall be redeemed and brought back, ver. 11. Though the enemy that had got possession of him was stronger than he, yet the Lord, who is stronger than all, hath redeemed and ransomed him, not by price, but by power, as of old out of the Egyptian's hands.

promise. Not only was Judah to be restored, but Israel also, as will be seen by referring only to verses 3, 4, and 10 of the preceding chapter, and is implied wherever Jacob alone is named.

xxxi. 2. The wilderness here referred to is by some thought to be the one traversed after the Egyptian bondage; but others understand it to mean the Arabian desert, which the exiles, returning from Babylon, would have to cross. It may point to both.

xxxi. 4. The tabret, or timbrel, seems to have most nearly resembled the tambourine, and was, like it, commonly played by women.

xxxi. 5. According to the law (Lev. xix. 23—25) the fruit of young trees was not to be eaten during the first three years; it was to be consecrated to God the fourth year; in the fifth year it might be used as common food. For this common use there was a peculiar Hebrew phrase, which occurs in Deut. xx. 6, xxviii. 30, and in the verse before us. The whole verse implies long peaceful possession.

Thirdly. That with their liberty they shall have plenty and joy, and God shall be honoured and served with it, ver. 12, 13. When they are returned to their own land, "they shall come and sing in the high place of Zion;" on the top of that holy mountain they shall sing to the praise and glory of God. We read they did so when the foundation of the temple was laid there; they "sang together, praising and giving thanks to the Lord," Ezr. iii. 11. They shall "flow together to the goodness of the Lord;" that is, they shall flock in great numbers, and with great forwardness and cheerfulness, as streams of water, "to the goodness of the Lord;" that is, to the temple, where he causeth his goodness to pass before his people. They shall come together in solemn assemblies, to praise him for his goodness, and to pray for the fruits of it, and the continuance of it; they shall come to bless him for his goodness, in giving them wheat, and wine, and oil, and the young of the flock, and of the herd, which, now they have obtained their freedom, they have an incontested property in, and the quiet and peaceable enjoyment of; and which therefore they honour God with the firstfruits of, and out of which they bring offerings to his altar. Note, It is comfortable to observe the goodness of the Lord in the gifts of common providence, and even in them to taste covenant-love. And having plenty, plenty out of want and scarcity, they shall greatly rejoice; "their soul shall be as a watered garden," flourishing and fruitful, Isa. lviii. 11, pleasant and fragrant, and abounding in all good things. Note, Our souls are never valuable as gardens but when they are watered with the dews of God's Spirit and grace. It is a precious promise that follows, and which will not have its full accomplishment any where on this side the height of the heavenly Zion, that they "shall not sorrow any more at all;" for it is only in that New Jerusalem that "all tears shall be wiped away," Rev. xxi. 4. However, so far it was fulfilled to the returned captives, that they had not any more those causes for sorrow that they had had; and therefore, ver. 13, young men and old shall rejoice together; so grave shall the young men be in their joys as to keep company with the old men, and so transported shall the old men be as to associate with the young. Salva res est, saltat senex,—'The state prospers, and the aged dance.' God will "turn their mourning into joy," their fasts into solemn feasts, Zec. viii. 19. It was in the return out of Babylon that they who sowed in tears were made to reap in joy, Ps. cxxvi. 5, 6. Those are comforted indeed whom God comforts, and may forget their troubles when he makes them to rejoice from their sorrow; not only rejoice after it, but rejoice from it. Their joy shall borrow lustre from their sorrow, which shall serve as a foil to it; and the more they think of their troubles the more shall they rejoice in their deliverance.

Fourthly. That both the ministers and those they minister to shall have abundant satisfaction in what God gives them; ver. 14, "I will satiate the soul of the priests with fatness," that is, There shall be such plenty of sacrifices brought to the altar, that they who live upon the altar shall live very comfortably. They and their families shall be satiated with fatness, they shall have enough, and that of the best; and "my people shall be satisfied with my goodness," and shall think there is enough in that to make them happy; and so there is. God's people have an abundant satisfaction in God's goodness, though they have but little of this world. Let them be satisfied of God's lovingkindness and they will be satisfied with it, and desire no more to make them happy. All this is applicable to the spiritual blessings which the redeemed of the Lord enjoy by Jesus Christ, infinitely more valuable than corn, and wine, and oil, and the satisfaction of soul which they have in the enjoyment of them.

Fifthly. That those particularly who had been in sorrow for the loss of their children that were carried into captivity, should have that sorrow turned into joy upon their return, ver. 15—17. Here we have,

1. The sad lamentation which the mothers made for the loss of their children, ver. 15. "In Ramah was there a voice heard" at the time when the general captivity was, nothing but "lamentation and bitter weeping," more there than in other places, because there Nebuzaradan had the general rendezvous of his captives, as appears ch. xl. 1, where we find him sending Jeremiah back from Ramah. Rachel is there said to weep for her children. The sepulchre of Rachel was between Ramah and Bethlehem. Benjamin, one of the two tribes, and Ephraim, head of the ten tribes, were both descendants from Rachel. She had but two sons, the elder of which was one for whom his father grieved, and "refused to be comforted," Gen. xxxvii. 35; the other she herself called Benoni, the 'son of my sorrow.' Now the inhabitants of Ramah did in like manner grieve for their sons and their daughters that were carried away, as 1 Sam. xxx. 6, and such a voice of lamentation was there as, to speak poetically, might even have raised Rachel out of her grave, to mourn with them. The tender parents even "refused to be comforted for their children, because they were not," were not with them, but were in the hands of their enemies; they were never likely to see them more. This is applied by the evangelists to the great mourning that was at Bethlehem, for the murder of the infants there by Herod, Mat. ii. 17, 18; and this scripture is said to be then fulfilled. They wept for them and would not be comforted, supposing the case would not admit any ground of comfort, because they were not. Note, Sorrow for the loss of children cannot but be great sorrow, especially if we so far mistake as to think they are not.

2. Seasonable comfort administered to them in reference hereunto, ver. 16, 17. They are advised to moderate that sorrow, and to set bounds to it; "Refrain thy voice from weeping, and thine eyes from tears." We are not forbidden to mourn in such a case. Allowances are made for natural affection, but we must not suffer our sorrow to run into an extreme, to hinder our joy in God, or take us off from our duty to him. Though we mourn we must not murmur, nor must we resolve, as Jacob did, to go to the grave in mourning: and to repress inordinate grief we must consider that there is hope in our end; hope that there will be an end, the trouble will not last always; that it will be a happy end, the end will be peace. Note, It ought to support us under our troubles that we have reason to hope they will end well. The righteous has hope in his death; that will be the blessed period of his griefs and the blessed passage to his joys. There is hope for thy posterity, so some read it; though thou mayest not live to see these glorious days thyself, there is hopes that thy posterity shall. Though one generation falls in the wilderness, the next shall enter Canaan. Two things thou mayest comfort thyself with the hope of: 1st. The reward of thy work; Thy suffering work shall be rewarded. The comforts of the deliverance shall be sufficient to balance all the grievances of the captivity. God makes his people glad according to the days wherein he has afflicted them, and so there is a proportion between the joys and the sorrows, as between the reward and the work. The glory to be revealed, which the saints hope for in their end, will abundantly countervail the sufferings of this present time, Rom. viii. 18. 2nd. The restoration of thy children; "They shall come again from the land of the enemy," ver. 16; they "shall come again to their own border," ver. 17. There is hope that children at a distance may be brought home; Jacob had a comfortable meeting with Joseph, after he had despaired of ever seeing him. There is hope concerning children removed by death, that they shall return to their own border, to the happy lot assigned them in the resurrection; a lot in the heavenly Canaan, that border of his sanctuary. We shall see reason to repress our grief for the death of our children, that are taken into covenant with God, when we consider the hopes we have of their resurrection to eternal life; they are not lost, but gone before.

18 I have surely heard Ephraim bemoaning himself thus;
Thou hast chastised me, [yoke:
And I was chastised, as a bullock unaccustomed to the Turn thou me, and I shall be turned;
For thou art the LORD my God.
19 Surely, after that I was turned, I repented;
And after that I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh:
I was ashamed, yea, even confounded,
Because I did bear the reproach of my youth
20 Is Ephraim my dear son?
Is he a pleasant child?
For since I spake against him,
I do earnestly remember him still:
Therefore my bowels are troubled for him;
I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the LORD.
21 Set thee up waymarks,
Make thee high heaps:
Set thine heart toward the highway,
Even the way which thou wentest:
Turn again, O virgin of Israel,
Turn again to these thy cities. [ter?
22 How long wilt thou go about, O thou backsliding daugh-
For the LORD hath created a new thing in the earth,
A woman shall compass a man.
23 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
As yet they shall use this speech in the land of Judah
And in the cities thereof, when I shall bring again their captivity;
The LORD bless thee, O habitation of justice, and mountain of holiness.
24 And there shall dwell in Judah itself, and in all the cities thereof together, Husbandmen, and they that go forth with flocks.
25 For I have satiated the weary soul,
And I have replenished every sorrowful soul.
26 Upon this I awaked, and beheld;
And my sleep was sweet unto me.

We have here,

First. Ephraim's repentance, and return to God. Not only Judah, but Ephraim, the ten tribes, shall be restored, and therefore shall thus be prepared and qualified for it; Hos. xiv. 8, "Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols?" Ephraim the people is here spoken of as a single person, to denote their unanimity; they shall be as one man in their repentance, and shall glorify God in it with one mind and one mouth, one and all. It is likewise thus expressed that it might be the better accommodated to particular penitents, for whose direction and encouragement this passage is intended. Ephraim is here brought in weeping for sin, perhaps because Ephraim, the person from whom that tribe had its denomination, was a man of a tender spirit, mourned for his children many days, 1 Chr. vii. 21, 22, and sorrow for sin is compared to that for an only son. This penitent is here brought in, 1. Bemoaning himself and the miseries of his present case. True penitents do thus bemoan themselves. 2. Accusing himself, laying a load upon himself, as a sinner, a great sinner. He chargeth upon himself in the first place that sin which his conscience told him he was more especially guilty of at this time, and that was impatience under correction. "Thou hast chastised me;" I have been under the rod, and I needed it, I deserved it. I was justly chastised, chastised as a bullock who had never felt the goad, if he had not first rebelled against the yoke. True penitents look upon their afflictions as fatherly chastisements; "Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised;" that is, it was well I was chastised, otherwise I had been undone; it did me good, or at least was intended to do me good, and yet I have been impatient under it. Or it may speak his unaffectedness under the affliction; "Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised," that was all; not, I was awakened by it and quickened by it: I looked no farther than the chastisement. I have been under the chastisement "as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke," unruly and unmanageable, kicking against the pricks, "like a wild bull in a net," Isa. li. 20. This is the sin he finds himself guilty of now; but, ver. 19, he reflects upon his former sins, and looks as far back as the days of his youth. The discovery of one sin should put us upon searching out more. Now he remembers the reproach of his youth; Ephraim as a people reflects upon the miscarriages of their ancestors, when they were first formed into a people. It is applicable to particular persons. Note, The sin of our youth was the reproach of our youth, and we ought often to remember it against ourselves, and to bear it in a penitential sorrow and shame. 3. He is here brought in angry at himself, having a holy indignation at himself for his sin and folly. He smote upon his thigh, as the publican upon his breast; he was even amazed at himself and at his own stupidity and forwardness; he was ashamed, yea, even confounded, could not with any confidence look up to God, nor with any comfort reflect upon himself. 4. He is here recommending himself to the mercy and grace of God. He finds he is bent to backslide from God, and cannot by any power of his own keep himself close xxxi. 6. Judah and Israel would worship together at Jerusalem. The ancient custom of summoning people to their devotions by means of watchmen is still retained in one form among the Mahometans by criers from the mosques.

xxxi. 15. Upon this verse we simply give the remark of Dr. Henderson:—"Ramah, the town here mentioned, was situated in the tribe of Benjamin, on the east of the great northern road, at the distance of two hours' journey from Jerusalem. By a beautiful figure, Rachel, the mother of the Ephraimites, who was buried at this place, is personified, and represented as risen from her grave, and bitterly lamenting the absence of her descendants, who had all been carried into exile. As her death took place during Jacob's journey from Padan-aram to Mamre, and express mention is made of Bethlehem (Gen. xxxv. 19), nothing was more natural than for the Evangelist Matthew (ii. 18) to quote the words of Jeremiah as applicable to the massacre of the children in Bethlehem and its vicinity with God, much less when he is revolted bring himself back to God; and therefore he prays, "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned," which implies that unless God do turn him by his grace he shall never be turned, but wander endlessly; that therefore he is very desirous of converting grace, has a dependence upon it, and doubts not but that that grace will be sufficient for him, to help him over all the difficulties that were in the way of his return to God: see ch. xvii. 14, "Heal me, and I shall be healed." God works with power, can make the unwilling willing; if he undertake the conversion of a soul it will be converted. 5. He is here pleasing himself with the experience he had had of the blessed effect of Divine grace; "Surely after that I was turned I repented." Note, All the pious workings of our hearts towards God are the fruit and consequence of the powerful working of his grace in us. And observe, he was turned, he was instructed, his will was bowed to the will of God, by the right informing of his judgment concerning the truths of God. Note, The way God takes of converting souls to himself is by opening the eyes of their understandings, and all good follows thereupon; "After that I was instructed," I yielded, "I smote upon my thigh." When sinners come to a right knowledge, they will come to a right way. Ephraim was chastised, and that did not produce the desired effect, it went no farther; I was chastised, and that was all. But when the instructions of God's Spirit accompanied the corrections of his providence, then the work was done, then he smote upon his thigh; was so humbled for sin as to have no more to do with it.

Secondly. God's compassion on Ephraim, and the kind reception he finds with God, ver. 20. 1. He owns him for a child, though he has been an undutiful child and a prodigal; "Is Ephraim my dear son? Is he a pleasant child?" Thus, when Ephraim bemoans himself, God bemoans him, as one whom his mother comforts, though she had chidden him, Isa. lxvi. 13. Is this Ephraim my dear son? Is this that pleasant child? Is it he that is thus sad in spirit, and that complains so bitterly? So it is like that of Saul, 1 Sam. 16, 17, "Is this thy voice, my son David?" Or, as it is sometimes supplied, Is not Ephraim my dear son? Is he not a pleasant child? Yes, now he is, now he repents and returns. Note, Those that have been undutiful backsliding children, if they sincerely return and repent, however they have been under the chastisement of the rod, shall be accepted of God as dear and pleasant children. Ephraim had afflicted himself, but God thus heals him; had abased himself, but God thus honours him; as the returning prodigal, who thought himself no more worthy to be called a son, yet by his father had the best robe put upon him, and a ring on his hand. 2. He relents towards him, and speaks of him with a great deal of tender compassion; "Since I spake against him," by the threatening of the word and the rebukes of providence, "I do earnestly remember him still," my thoughts towards him are thoughts of peace. Note, When God afflicts his people, yet he doth not forget them; when he casts them out of their land yet he doth not cast them out of sight nor out of mind. Even then when God is speaking against us, yet he is acting for us, and designing our good in all; and this is our comfort in our affliction, that the Lord thinketh upon us, though we have forgotten him. "I remember him still," and therefore "my bowels are troubled for him," as Joseph's yearned towards his brethren, even then when he spake roughly to them. When Israel's afflictions extorted a penitent confession and submission, it is said his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel, Jud. x. 16, for he always afflicts with the greatest tenderness. It was God's compassion that mitigated Ephraim's punishment, "My heart is turned within me," Hos. xi. 8, 9; and now the same compassion accepted Ephraim's repentance. Ephraim had pleaded, ver. 18, "Thou art the Lord my God," therefore to thee will I return, therefore on thy mercy and grace will I depend; and God shews it was a valid plea, and prevailing, for he makes it appear both that he is God, and not man, and that he is his God. 3. He resolves to do him good; "I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord." Note, God hath mercy in store, rich mercy, sure mercy, suitable mercy, for all that in sincerity seek him and submit to him. And the more we are afflicted for sin the better prepared we are for the comforts of that mercy.

Thirdly. Gracious excitements and encouragements given to the people of God in Babylon to prepare for their return to their own land. Let them not tremble and lose their spirit, let them not trifle and lose their time; but with a firm resolution and a close application address themselves to their journey, ver. 21, 22. 1. They must think of nothing but of coming back to their own country, out of which they had been driven; "Turn again, O virgin of Israel," a virgin to be again espoused to my God, "turn again to these thy cities;" though they are laid waste in the ruins, they are thy cities, which thy God gave thee, and therefore turn again to them. They must be content in Babylon no longer than till they had liberty to return to Zion. 2. They must return the same way that they went, that the remembrance of the sorrows that attended them, or which their fathers had told them of in such and such places on the road, the sight of which would, by a local memory, put them in mind of them, might make them the more thankful for their deliverance. Those that have departed from God into the bondage of sin must return by the same way in which they went astray, to the same duties they neglected; must do their first works. 3. They must engage themselves, and all that is within them, in this affair; "Set thine heart towards the highway," bring thy mind to it, consider thy duty, thine interest, and go about it with a goodwill. Note, The way from Babylon to Zion, from the bondage of sin to the glorious liberty of God's children, is a highway, it is right, it is plain, it is safe, it is well-tracked, Isa. xxxv. 8, yet none are likely to walk in it, unless they set their hearts toward it. 4. They must furnish themselves with all needful accommodations for the journey; "Set thee up waymarks, and make thee high heaps," or pillars; send before to have such set up in all places where there is any danger of missing the road. Let those that go first, and are best acquainted with the way, set up such directions for those that follow. 5. They must compose themselves for their journey; "How long wilt thou go about, O backsliding daughter?" Let not their minds fluctuate or be uncertain about it, but resolve upon it; let them not put themselves into a toss with care and fear; let them not seek about to creatures for assistance, nor hurry here and there in courting them, which has often been an instance of their backsliding from God, but let them cast themselves upon God, and then let their minds be fixed. 6. They are encouraged to do this by an assurance God gives them that he would create a new thing, strange and surprising, in the earth; in that land, "A woman shall compass a man." The church of God is weak and feeble as a woman, altogether unapt for military employments, and of a timorous spirit, yet shall surround, besiege, and prevail against a mighty man, Isa. liv. 6; the church is compared to a woman, Rev. xii. 1. And whereas we find armies compassing the camp of the saints, Rev. xx. 9, now the camp of the saints shall compass them. Many good interpreters understand this new thing created in that land, to be the incarnation of Christ, which God had an eye to in bringing them back to that land, and which had sometimes been given them for a sign, Isa. vii. 14; ix. 6. A woman, the Virgin Mary, inclosed in her womb the Mighty One, for so Geber, the word here used, signifies; and God is called Gibbor, the mighty God, Jer. xxxii. 18, and so is Christ there, where his incarnation is spoken of, as it is supposed to be here, Isa. ix. 6. He is El-Gibbor, the Mighty God. Let this assure them that God would not cast off this people, for that blessing was to be among them, Isa. lxv. 8.

Fourthly. A comfortable prospect given them of a happy settlement in their own land again. 1. They shall have an interest in the esteem and goodwill of all their neighbours, who will give them a good word and put up a good prayer for them; ver. 23, As yet, or rather, Yet again, (though Judah and Jerusalem have long been an astonishment and a hissing,) this speech shall be used as it was formerly, concerning the land of Judah and the cities thereof, "The Lord bless thee, O habitation of justice and mountain of holiness." This intimates that they shall return much reformed and every way better; and this reformation shall be so conspicuous that all about them shall take notice of it. The cities that used to be nests of pirates shall be habitations of justice; the mountain of Israel, (so the whole land is called, Ps. lxxviii. 54,) and especially mount Zion, shall be a mountain of holiness. Observe, Justice towards men and holiness towards God must go together. Godliness and honesty are what God has joined, and let no man think to put them asunder, or to make one atone for the want of the other. It is well with a people when they come out of trouble thus refined, and it is a sure presage of farther happiness. And we may with great comfort pray for the blessing of God upon those houses that are habitations of justice, those cities and countries that are mountains of holiness; there the Lord will undoubtedly command the blessing. 2. There shall be great plenty of all good things among them; ver. 24, 25, "There shall dwell in Judah itself, even in it, though it has now long lain waste, both husbandmen and shepherds, the two ancient and honourable employments of Cain and Abel, Gen. iv. 2. It is a comfortable dwelling, an "habitation of justice," and a "mountain of holiness." And the husbandmen and shepherds shall eat of the fruit of their labours, for I have satiated the weary and sorrowful soul; that is, they that came weary from their journey, and have been long sorrowful in their captivity, shall now enjoy great plenty. This is applicable to the spiritual blessings God has in store for all true penitents, for all that are just and holy; they shall be abundantly satisfied with Divine graces and comforts. In the love and favour of God the weary soul shall find rest, and the sorrowful soul joy.

Fifthly. The prophet tells us what pleasure the discovery of this brought to his mind, ver. 26. The foresights God had given him sometimes of the calamities of Judah and Jerusalem were an exceeding pain to him, as ch. iv. 19; but these views were pleasing ones, though at a distance. "Upon this I awaked," overcome with joy, which burst the fetters of sleep, and I reflected upon my dream, and it was such as had made my sleep sweet to me; I was refreshed, as men use to be with quiet sleep. Those may sleep sweetly that lie down and rise up in the favour of God, and in communion with him. Nor is any prospect in this world more pleasing to good men and good ministers than that of the flourishing state of the church of God. What can we see with more satisfaction than "the good of Jerusalem all the days of our life and peace upon Israel?"

27 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will sow the house of Israel and the house of [Judah
With the seed of man, and with the seed of beast.
28 And it shall come to pass, that like as I have watched over them,
To pluck up, and to break down, and to throw down,
And to destroy, and to afflict;
So will I watch over them,
To build, and to plant, saith the LORD.
29 In those days they shall say no more,
The fathers have eaten a sour grape,
And the children's teeth are set on edge.
30 But every one shall die for his own iniquity:
Every man that eateth the sour grape,
His teeth shall be set on edge.
31 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will make a new covenant
With the house of Israel, and with the house of Judah:
32 Not according to the covenant that I made with their
In the day that I took them by the hand [fathers
To bring them out of the land of Egypt;
Which my covenant they brake,
Although I was an husband unto them, saith the LORD:
33 But this shall be the covenant
That I will make with the house of Israel;
After those days saith the LORD,
I will put my law in their inward parts,
And write it in their hearts;
And will be their God,
And they shall be my people.
34 And they shall teach no more
Every man his neighbour, and every man his brother,
Saying, Know the LORD:
For they shall all know me, [LORD:
From the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the
For I will forgive their iniquity,
And I will remember their sin no more.

The prophet having found his sleep sweet, made so by the revelations of Divine grace, sets himself to sleep again, in hopes of farther discoveries, and is not disappointed; for it is here farther promised,

First. That the people of God shall become both numerous and prosperous.

of which they furnished an apt description. The prediction and the quotation relate to totally different events, but the language in itself is equally descriptive of both."

xxxi. 19. Smiting on the thigh was an action indicative of astonishment and of sorrow, and seems to have been common among several ancient nations.

xxxi. 22. Many explanations of the last clause have been proposed, and it is difficult to decide certainly which is correct. The modern critics, for the most part, object to the old view that it referred to the incarnation of Christ. Some consider, with Gesenius, that it means, "a woman shall protect a man"—enemies will be so few and feeble that such protection will suffice. Adam Clarke thinks it is a proverbial expression.

xxxi. 26. Each of the three possible applications of the words of this verse has been adopted. That Jeremiah himself is the sleeper who awakes is the more probable opinion. Jerome thought it was Both Israel and Judah shall be replenished both with men and cattle, as if they were sown with the seed of both, ver. 27. They shall increase and multiply like a field sown with corn; and this is the product of God's blessing, ver. 23; for whom God blessed, to them he said, Be fruitful. This should be a type of the wonderful increase of the Gospel church. God will build them, and plant them, ver. 28; he will watch over them to do them good, that is, no opportunity shall be lost that may further their prosperity. Every thing for a long time had turned so much against them, and all occurrences did so conspire to ruin them, that it seemed as if God had "watched over them to pluck up and to throw down;" but now every thing that falls out shall happily fall in to strengthen and advance their interests. God will be as ready to comfort those that repent of their sins, and are humbled for them, as he is to punish those that continue in love with their sins, and are hardened in them.

Secondly. That they shall be reckoned with no farther for the sins of their fathers; ver. 29, 30, "They shall say no more," that is, they shall have no more occasion to say, that God "visits the iniquity of the parents upon the children," which God had done in the captivity; for the sins of their ancestors came into the account against them, particularly those of Manasseh: this they had complained of as a hardship. Other scriptures justify God in this method of proceeding; and our Saviour tells the wicked Jews in his days, that they should smart for their fathers' sins, because they persisted in them, Mat. xxiii. 35, 39; but it is here promised that this severe dispensation with them should now be brought to an end, that God would proceed no farther in his controversy with them for their fathers' sins, but remember for them his covenant with their fathers, and do them good according to that covenant. They shall no more complain as they have done, that "the fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge; "which speaks something of an absurdity, and is an invidious reflection upon God's proceedings, but "every one shall die for his own iniquity" still. Though God will cease to punish them in their national capacity, yet he will still reckon with particular persons that provoke him. Note, Public salvations will give no impunity, no security to private sinners; still "every man that eats the sour grapes, his teeth shall be set on edge." Note, Those that eat forbidden fruit, how temptingly soever it looks, will find it a sour grape, and it will set their teeth on edge; sooner or later they will feel from it, and reflect upon it with bitterness. There is as direct a tendency in sin to make a man uneasy as there is in sour grapes to set the teeth on edge.

Thirdly. That God will renew his covenant with them, so that all these blessings they shall have not by providence only, but by promise, and thereby they shall be both sweetened and secured; but this covenant refers to gospel times, the latter days that shall come; for of gospel grace the apostle understands it, Heb. viii. 8, &c., where this whole passage is quoted, as a summary of the covenant of grace made with believers in Jesus Christ. Observe,

1. Who the persons are with whom this covenant is made. "With the house of Israel and Judah," that is, with the gospel church, the Israel of God on which peace shall be, Gal. vi. 16; with the spiritual seed of believing Abraham, and praying Jacob. Judah and Israel had been two separate kingdoms, but were united after their return, in the joint favours God bestowed upon them; so Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church and covenant.

2. What is the nature of this covenant in general. It is "a new covenant," and "not according to the covenant made with them, when they came out of Egypt;" not as if that made with them at mount Sinai were a covenant of nature and innocency, such as was made with Adam in the day he was created. No, that was for substance a covenant of grace, but it was a dark dispensation of that covenant, in comparison with this in gospel times; sinners were saved by that covenant upon their repentance, and faith in a Messiah to come, whose blood confirming that covenant was typified by that of the legal sacrifices, Ex. xxiv. 7, 8. Yet this may upon many accounts be called new in comparison with that; the ordinances and promises are more spiritual and heavenly, and the discoveries much more clear. That covenant God made with them, when he took them by the hand, as if they had been blind, or lame, or weak, to lead them out of the land of Egypt; "which covenant they brake." Observe, It was God that made this covenant, but it was the people that brake it; for our salvation is of God, but our sin and ruin is of ourselves. It was an aggravation of their breach of it, that God "was a husband to them," that he had espoused them to himself; it was a marriage covenant that was between him and them, which they broke by idolatry, that spiritual adultery. It is a great aggravation of our treacherous departure from God, that he has been a husband to us, a loving, tender, careful husband; faithful to us, and yet we false to him.

3. What are the particular articles of this covenant. They all contain spiritual blessings; not, I will give them the land of Canaan, and a numerous issue; but, I will give them pardon, and peace, and grace; good heads and good hearts. He promiseth, 1st. That he will incline them to their duty; "I will put my law in their inward part, and write it in their heart." Not, I will give them a new law, (as Mr. Gataker well observes,) for Christ came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it; but the law shall be written in their hearts by the finger of the Spirit, as formerly it was written in the tables of stone. God writes his law in the hearts of all believers, makes it ready and familiar to them, at hand when they have occasion to use it, as that which is written in the heart, Pr. iii. 3. He makes them in care to observe it; for that which we are solicitous about is said to lie near our heart. He works in them a disposition to obedience, a conformity of thought and affection to the rules of Divine law, as that of the copy the original. This is here promised, and ought to be prayed for; that our duty may be done conscientiously, and with delight.

2nd. That he will take them into relation to himself; "I will be their God," a God all-sufficient to them, "and they shall be my people," a loyal obedient people to me. God's being to us a God is the summary of all happiness, heaven itself is no more, Heb. xi. 16; Rev. xxi. 3. Our being to him a people, may be taken either as the condition on our part, (those and those only shall have God to be to them a God, that are truly willing to engage themselves to be to him a people,) or as a farther branch of the promise, that God will by his grace make us his people, a willing people in the day of his power; and whoever are his people it is his grace that makes them so.

3rd. That there shall be an abundance of the knowledge of God among all sorts of people; and this will have an influence upon all good, for they that rightly know God's name will seek him, and serve him, and put their trust in him; ver. 34, "All shall know me." All shall be welcome to the knowledge of God, and shall have the means of that knowledge; his "way shall be known upon earth," whereas for many ages "in Judah only was God known." Many more shall know God than did in the Old Testament times, which among the Gentiles were times of ignorance, the true God being to them an unknown God. The things of God shall in gospel times be made more plain and intelligible, and level to the capacities of the meanest, than they had been, while Moses had a veil upon his face. There shall be such a general knowledge of God, that there shall not be so much need as had formerly been of teaching. Some take it as an hyperbolical expression (and the dulness of the Jews needed such expressions to awake them) designed only to shew that the knowledge of God in gospel times should vastly exceed that knowledge of him, which they had under the law. Or perhaps it intimates, that in gospel times there shall be such great plenty of public preaching, statedly and constantly, by men authorized and appointed to preach the word in season, and out of season, much beyond what was under the law, that there shall be less need than there was then of fraternal teaching, by a neighbour and a brother. The priests preached but now and then, and in the temple to a few in comparison; but now all shall or may know God by frequenting the assemblies of Christians, wherein through all parts of the church the good knowledge of God shall be taught. Some give this sense of it, (Mr. Gataker mentions it,) that many shall have such clearness of understanding in the things of God that they may seem rather to have been taught by some immediate irradiation than by any means of instruction. In short, the things of God shall by the Gospel of Christ be brought to a clearer light than ever, 2 Tim. i. 10; and the people of God shall by the grace of Christ be brought to a clearer sight of those things than ever, Eph. i. 17, 18.

4th. That, in order to all these blessings, sin shall be pardoned. This is made the reason of all the rest, "For I will forgive their iniquity," will not impute that to them, nor deal with them according to the desert of that, will forgive and forget; "I will remember their sin no more." It is sin that keeps good things from us, that stops the current of God's favours; let sin be taken away by pardoning mercy, and the obstruction is removed, and Divine grace runs down like a river, like a mighty stream.

35 Thus saith the LORD,
Which giveth the sun for a light by day,
And the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night,
Which divideth the sea when the waves thereof roar;
The LORD of hosts is his name:
36 If those ordinances depart from before me, saith the LORD,
Then the seed of Israel also shall cease
From being a nation before me for ever.
37 Thus saith the LORD;
If heaven above can be measured,
And the foundations of the earth searched out beneath,
I will also cast off all the seed of Israel
For all that they have done, saith the LORD.
38 Behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That the city shall be built to the LORD
From the tower of Hananeel unto the gate of the corner.
39 And the measuring line shall yet go forth
Over against it upon the hill Gareb,
And shall compass about to Goath.
40 And the whole valley of the dead bodies, and of the ashes.
And all the fields unto the brook of Kidron,
Unto the corner of the horse gate toward the east,
Shall be holy unto the LORD;
It shall not be plucked up,
Nor thrown down any more for ever.

Glorious things have been spoken in the foregoing verses concerning the gospel church, which that epocha of the Jewish church that was to commence at the return from captivity would at length terminate in, and which all those promises were to have their full accomplishments in; but may we depend upon these promises? Yes, we have here a ratification of them, and the utmost assurance imaginable given of the perpetuity of the blessings contained in them. The great thing here secured to us is, that while the world stands God will have a church in it, which, though sometimes it may be brought very low, yet shall be raised again, and its interests re-established; "It is built upon a rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Now here are two things offered, for the confirmation of our faith in this matter: the building of the world, and the rebuilding of Jerusalem.

First. The building of the world, and the firmness and lastingness of that building, is an evidence of the power and faithfulness of that God who has undertaken the establishment of his church. He that built all things at first is God, Heb. iii. 4; and the same is he that makes all things now. The constancy of the glories of the kingdom of nature may encourage us to depend upon the Divine promise for the continuance of the glories of the kingdom of grace; for "this is as the waters of Noah," Isa. liv. 9. Let us observe here,

1. The glories of the kingdom of nature, and infer from thence how happy they are that have this God, the God of nature, to be their God for ever and ever. Take notice, 1st. Of the steady and regular motion of the heavenly bodies, which God is the first mover and supreme director of. "He giveth the sun for a light by day," ver. 35; not only made it at first to be so, but still gives it to be so; for the light, and heat, and all the influences of the sun, continually depend upon its great Creator. He gives "the ordinances of the moon and stars for a light by night," their motions are called ordinances, both because they are regular, and by rule, and because they are determined, and under rule: see Job xxxviii. 31—33. 2nd. Take notice of the government of the sea, and the check that is given to its proud billows. The Lord of hosts divideth the sea; or, as some read it, 'settles the sea, when the waves thereof roar,' (divide et impera,—'divide and rule;') when it is most tossed God keeps it within compass, Jer. v. 22; and soon quiets it, and makes it calm again. The power of God is to be magnified by us, not only in maintaining the regular motions of the heavens, but in controlling the irregular motions of the seas. 3rd. Take notice of the vastness of the heavens, and the immeasurable extent of the firmament, (he must needs be a great God who manageth such a great world as this is;) "the heavens above cannot be measured," ver. 37, and yet God fills them. 4th. Take notice of the mysteriousness, even of that part of the creation in which our lot is cast, and which we are most conversant with. "The foundations of the earth cannot be searched out beneath," for the Creator "hangeth the earth upon nothing," Job xxvi. 7; and we "know not how the foundations thereof are fastened," Job xxxviii. 6.

the language of the Hebrews; and several have supposed the Lord to be the speaker, but without sufficient reason.

xxxi. 31. Bishop Chandler thinks there might have been a doubt as to what or whom this promise applied to, until Malachi predicted the coming of the "Messenger of the Covenant." The application of the whole to the Christian dispensation is clearly shown in Heb. viii. 8, x. 16. It may, however, still be asked whether the promise belongs here specially to Israel, or includes all the heirs of grace. On this point opinions continue to differ. Under all the circumstances, the Gentiles seem not to be included, although they actually enjoy the same blessings. The whole current of the prediction is without any reference to that wider plan which we mean when we speak of the Gospel. It is gospel, but it is the gospel of the Hebrews, or so far as they are concerned in a national capacity. As a fact, God made no such covenant with the Gentiles as that described in verse 32, and it is inconsistent with the nature of language and the laws

5th. Take notice of the immovable steadfastness of all these; ver. 36, "These ordinances cannot depart from before God." He hath all the hosts of heaven and earth continually under his eye, and all the motions of both; he has established them, and they abide, abide "according to his ordinance, for all are his servants," Ps. cix. 90, 91. The heavens are often clouded, and the sun and moon often eclipsed, the earth may quake, and the sea be tossed; but they all keep their place,—are moved, but not removed. Herein we must acknowledge the power, and goodness, and faithfulness of the Creator.

2. The securities of the kingdom of grace inferred from hence. We may be confident of this very thing, that the seed of Israel shall not cease from being a nation; for the spiritual Israel, the gospel church, shall be a holy nation, a peculiar people, 1 Pet. ii. 9. When Israel according to the flesh is no longer a nation, "the children of the promise are counted for the seed," Rom. ix. 8; and God will not "cast off all the seed of Israel," no not "for all that they have done," though they have done very wickedly, ver. 37; he justly might cast them off, but he will not. Though he cast them but from their land, and cast them down for a time, yet he will not cast them off. Some of them he casts off, but not all. To this the apostle seems to refer, Rom. xi. 5, "Hath God cast away his people?" God forbid that we should think so! for, ver. 5, "At this time there is a remmant," enough to save the credit of the promise, that God will not cast off all the seed of Israel, though many among them throw away themselves by unbelief. Now we may be assisted in the belief of this by considering, 1st. That the God that has undertaken the preservation of the church is a God of almighty power, that upholds all things by his almighty word. Our help stands in his name, who made heaven and earth, and therefore can do any thing. 2nd. That God would not take all this care of the world, but that he designs to have some glory to himself out of it; and how shall he have it but by securing to himself a church in it, a people that shall be to him for a name and a praise? 3rd. That if the order of the creation therefore continues firm because it was well fixed at first, and is not altered because it needs no alteration, the method of grace shall for the same reason continue invariable, as it was at first well settled. 4th. That he who hath promised to preserve a church for himself has approved himself faithful to the word which he has spoken, concerning the stability of the world. He that is true to his covenant with Noah and his sons, because he established it for an everlasting covenant, Gen. ix. 9, 16, we may be sure will not be false to his covenant with Abraham and his seed, his spiritual seed, for that also is an everlasting covenant. Even that which they have done, though they have done much amiss, shall not prevail to defeat the gracious intentions of the covenant: see Ps. lxxxix. 30, &c.

Secondly. The rebuilding of Jerusalem, which was now in ruins; and the enlargement and establishment of that shall be an earnest of these great things that God will do for the gospel church, the heavenly Jerusalem, ver. 30—32. The days will come, though they may be long in coming, 1. When Jerusalem shall be entirely built again, as large as ever it was. The dimensions are here exactly described, by the places through which the circumference passed; and no doubt the wall which Nehemiah built, and which, the more punctually to fulfil the prophecy, began about the tower of Hananeel here mentioned, Neh. iii. 1, inclosed as much ground as is here intended, though we cannot certainly determine the places here called the gate of the corner, the hill Gareb, &c. 2. When, being built, it shall be consecrated to God and to his service. It shall be built to the Lord, ver. 38; and even the suburbs and fields adjacent shall be holy unto the Lord. It shall not be polluted with idols, as formerly; but God shall be praised and honoured there. The whole city shall be as it were one temple, one holy place, as the New Jerusalem is, which therefore has no temple, because it is all temple. 3rd. Being thus built by virtue of the promise of God, and then devoted to praise of God, "it shall not be plucked up, or thrown down any more for ever;" that is, it shall continue very long; the time of the new city, from the return to its last destruction, being full as long as that of the old from David to the captivity. But this promise was to have its full accomplishment in the gospel church, which, as it is the spiritual Israel, and therefore God will not cast it off, so it is the holy city, and therefore all the powers of men shall not pluck it up, or throw it down. It may lie waste for a time as Jerusalem did, but shall recover itself, shall weather the storm and gain its point, and "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

CHAPTER XXXII.

In this chapter we have, I. Jeremiah imprisoned for foretelling the destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of king Zedekiah, ver. 1—5. II. We have him buying land, by Divine appointment, as an assurance that in due time a happy end should be put to the present troubles, ver. 6—15. III. We have his prayer, which he offered up to God upon that occasion, ver. 16—25. IV. We have a message, which God thereupon intrusted him to deliver to the people. 1. He must foretell the utter destruction of Judah and Jerusalem for their sins, ver. 26—35; but, 2. At the same time he must assure them that, though the destruction was total, it should not be final; but at length their posterity should recover the peaceable possession of their own land, ver. 36—44. The predictions of this chapter, both threatenings and promises, are much the same with what we have already met with again and again; but here are some circumstances that are very particular and remarkable.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD in the tenth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, which was the eighteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar. 2 For then the king of Babylon's army besieged Jerusalem: and Jeremiah the prophet was shut up in the court of the prison, which was in the king of Judah's house. 3 For Zedekiah king of Judah had shut him up, saying, Wherefore dost thou prophesy, and say, Thus saith the LORD, Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall take it; 4 And Zedekiah king of Judah shall not escape out of the hand of the Chaldeans, but shall surely be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon, and shall speak with him mouth to mouth, and his eyes shall behold his eyes; 5 And he shall lead Zedekiah to Babylon, and there shall he be until I visit him, saith the LORD: though ye fight with the Chaldeans, ye shall not prosper. 6 And Jeremiah said, The word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 7 Behold, Hanameel the son of Shallum thine uncle shall come unto thee, saying, Buy thee my field that is in Anathoth: for the right of redemption is thine to buy it. 8 So Hanameel mine uncle's son came to me in the court of the prison according to the word of the LORD, and said unto me, Buy my field, I pray thee, that is in Anathoth, which is in the country of Benjamin: for the right of inheritance is thine, and the redemption is thine; buy it for thyself. Then I knew that this was the word of the LORD. 9 And I bought the field of Hanameel my uncle's son, that was in Anathoth, and weighed him the money, even seventeen shekels of silver. 10 And I subscribed the evidence, and sealed it, and took witnesses, and weighed him the money in the balances. 11 So I took the evidence of the purchase, both that which was sealed according to the law and custom, and that which was open: 12 And I gave the evidence of the purchase unto Baruch the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, in the sight of Hanameel mine uncle's son, and in the presence of the witnesses that subscribed the book of the purchase, before all the Jews that sat in the court of the prison. 13 And I charged Baruch before them, saying, 14 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both which is sealed, and this evidence which is open; and put them in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days. 15 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of of criticism to explain the passage of the whole human race. It should also be noticed that the specific appellations employed here, "house of Israel" and "house of Judah," are the proper designations of the northern and southern kingdoms, and it is but reasonable that such well-known phrases should bear their ordinary sense.

xxxi. 36. Hereupon it has been judiciously observed that the continual preservation of the Jews as a distinct people, "though scattered among all nations, exposed to every kind of maltreatment, and even cut off by thousands and tens of thousands, is nothing less than a standing miracle. While the celebrated nations of antiquity —the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes, Romans, Egyptians, Carthaginians, Goths, and others—have all become extinct, the posterity of Abraham still exist, unamalgamated, among the nations." Here is one prophecy, at least, not unfulfilled.

xxxi. 38, 39. The word for "come" is not found in all Hebrew copies, but is represented by the ancient versions, and is in various Israel; Houses and fields and vineyards shall be possessed again in this land.

It appears by the date of this chapter, that we are now coming very nigh to the fatal year which completed the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem, by the Chaldeans. God's judgments came gradually upon them, but, they not meeting him by repentance in the way of his judgments, he proceeded in his controversy till all was laid waste, which was in the eleventh year of Zedekiah; now what is here recorded happened in the tenth. The king of Babylon's army had now invested Jerusalem, and was carrying on the siege with vigour, not doubting but in a little time to make themselves masters of it; while the besieged had taken up a desperate resolution not to surrender, but to hold it out to the last extremity. Now,

First. Jeremiah prophesieth that both the city and the court shall fall into the hands of the king of Babylon. He tells them expressly that the besiegers should take the city as prize; for God, whose city it was in a peculiar manner, will give it into their hands, and put it out of his protection, ver. 3;—that, though Zedekiah attempt to make his escape, he shall be overtaken, and shall be delivered a prisoner into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar; shall be brought into his presence to his great confusion and terror, he having made himself so obnoxious by breaking his faith with him; he shall hear the king of Babylon pronounce his doom, and see with what fury and indignation he will look upon him, "his eyes shall behold his eyes," ver. 4;—that Zedekiah shall be carried to Babylon, and continue a miserable captive there, until God visit him, that is, till God put an end to his life by a natural death, as Nebuchadnezzar had long before put an end to his days by putting out his eyes. Note, Those that live in misery may be truly said to be visited in mercy, when God by death takes them home to himself. And, lastly, he foretells that all their attempts to force the besiegers from their trenches should be ineffectual; "Though ye fight with the Chaldeans, ye shall not prosper." How should they, when God did not fight for them? ver. 5: see ch. xxxiv. 2, 3.

Secondly. For prophesying thus he is imprisoned, not in the common gaol, but in the more creditable prison, that was within the verge of the palace, "in the king of Judah's house," and there not closely confined, but in custodia libera, in the 'court of the prison,' where he might have good company, good air, and good intelligence brought him, and would be sheltered from the abuses of the mob; but, however, it was a prison, and Zedekiah shut him up in it for prophesying as he did, ver. 2, 3. So far was he from humbling himself before Jeremiah, as he ought to have done, (2 Chr. xxvi. 12,) that he hardened himself against him. Though he had formerly so far owned him to be a prophet as to desire him to inquire of the Lord for them, (ch. xxi. 2,) yet now he chides him for prophesying, ver. 3, and shuts him up in prison; perhaps not with design to punish him any farther, but only to restrain him from prophesying any farther, which was crime bad enough. Silencing God's prophets, though it is not so ill as mocking and killing them, yet is a great affront to the God of heaven. See how wretchedly the hearts of sinners are hardened by the deceitfulness of sin; persecution was one of the sins for which God was now contending with them, and yet Zedekiah persists in it, even now he was in the depth of distress. No providences, no afflictions, will of themselves part between men and their sins, unless the grace of God work with them. Nay, some are made worse by those very judgments that should make them better.

Thirdly. Being in prison, he purchaseth a piece of ground from a near relation of his, that lay in Anathoth, ver. 6, &c. One would not have expected, 1. That a prophet should concern himself so far in the business of this world; but why not? Though ministers must not entangle themselves, yet they may concern themselves in the affairs of this life. 2. That one who had neither wife nor children should buy land. We find (ch. xvi. 2) that he had no family of his own, yet he may purchase for his own use while he lives, and leave it to the children of his relations when he dies. 3. One would little have thought that a prisoner should be a purchaser; how should he get money beforehand to buy land with? It is probable he lived frugally, and saved something out of what belonged to him as a priest, which is no blemish at all to his character; but we have no reason to think that the people were kind, or that his being beforehand was owing to their generosity. Nay, 4. It was most strange of all that he should buy a piece of land, when he himself knew that the whole land was now to be laid waste, and fall into the hands of the Chaldeans, and then what good would this do him? But it was the will of God he should buy it, and he submitted, though the money seemed to be thrown away. His kinsman came to offer it him; it was not of his own seeking, he coveted not to lay house to house, and field to field, but providence brought it to him, and it is likely it was a good bargain. Besides, the right of redemption belonged to him, ver. 8, and if he refused, he did not do the kinsman's part. It is true he might lawfully refuse; but, being a prophet, in a thing of this nature he must do that which would be for the honour of his profession; it became him to fulfil all righteousness. It was land that lay within the suburbs of a priests' city, and if he should refuse it there was danger lest in these times of disorder it might be sold to one of another tribe, which was contrary to law; to prevent which it was convenient for him to buy it. It would likewise be a kindness to his kinsman, who probably was at this time in great want of money. Jeremiah had but a little, but what he had he was willing to lay out in such a manner as might tend most to the honour of God, and the good of his friends and country, which he preferred before his own private interests. Observe,

1st. How fairly the bargain was made. When Jeremiah knew, by Hanameel's coming to him, as God had foretold he would, that "it was the word of the Lord," that it was his mind he should make this purchase, he made no more difficulty of it, but bought the field. And, First. He was very honest and exact in paying the money. He "weighed him the money," did not press him to take it upon content, though he was his near kinsman, but weighed it to him, current money; it was "seventeen shekels of silver," amounting to about forty shillings of our money. It is likely it was but a little field, and of small yearly value, when the purchase was so low. Besides, the right of inheritance was in Jeremiah, so that he was only to buy out his kinsman's life, the reversion was his already. Some think this was only the earnest of a greater sum; but we shall not wonder at the smallness of the price, if we consider what scarcity there was of money at this time, and how little lands were counted upon. Secondly. He was very prudent and discreet in preserving the writings. They were subscribed before witnesses; one copy was sealed up, the other was open; one was the original, and the other the counterpart; or perhaps that which was sealed up was for his own private use, the other that was open was to be laid up in the public register of conveyances for any person concerned to consult. Due care and caution in things of this nature might prevent a great deal of injustice and contention. The deeds of purchase were lodged in the hands of Baruch, before witnesses, and he was ordered to lay them up in an earthen vessel, (an emblem of the nature of all the securities this world can pretend to give us, brittle things, and soon broken,) that they might continue many days, for the use of Jeremiah's heirs, after the return out of captivity; for they might then have the benefit of this purchase. Purchasing reversions may be a kindness to those that come after us; and a good man thus lays up an inheritance for his children's children.

2nd. What was the design of having this bargain made. It was to signify that, though Jerusalem was now besieged, and the whole country was likely to be laid waste, yet the time should come when "houses, and fields, and vineyards should again be possessed in this land," ver. 15. As God appointed Jeremiah to confirm his predictions of the approaching destruction of Jerusalem, by his own practice in living unmarried, so he now appointed him to confirm his predictions of the future restoration of Jerusalem, by his own practice in purchasing this field. Note, It concerns ministers to make it to appear in their whole conversation that they do themselves believe that which they preach to others; and that they may do so, and impress it the deeper upon their hearers, they must many a time deny themselves, as Jeremiah did in both these instances. God having promised that this land should again come into the possession of his people, Jeremiah will, on the behalf of his heirs, put in for a share. Note, It is good to manage even our worldly affairs in faith, and to do common business with an eye to the providence and promise of God. Lucius Florus relates it as a great instance of the bravery of the Roman citizens, that in the time of the second Punic war, when Hannibal besieged Rome, and was very near making himself master of it, a field on which part of his army lay, being offered to sale at that time, was presently purchased, in a firm belief that the Roman valour would raise the siege, lib. 2, cap. 6. And have not we much more reason to venture our all upon the word of God, and to embark in Zion's interests, which will undoubtedly be the prevailing interests at last. Non si male nunc et olim sic erit,—'Though now we suffer, we shall not suffer always.

16 Now when I had delivered the evidence of the purchase unto Baruch the son of Neriah, I prayed unto the LORD, saying, 17 Ah Lord GOD! behold, thou hast made the heaven and the earth by thy great power and stretched out arm, and there is nothing too hard for thee: 18 Thou shewest loving-kindness unto thousands, and recompensest the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom of their children after them: the Great, the Mighty God, the LORD of hosts, is his name, 19 Great in counsel, and mighty in work: for thine eyes are open upon all the ways of the sons of men: to give every one according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings: 20 Which hast set signs and wonders in the land of Egypt, even unto this day, and in Israel, and among other men; and hast made thee a name, as at this day; 21 And hast brought forth thy people Israel out of the land of Egypt with signs, and with wonders, and with a strong hand, and with a stretched out arm, and with great terror; 22 And hast given them this land, which thou didst swear to their fathers to give them, a land flowing with milk and honey; 23 And they came in, and possessed it; but they obeyed not thy voice, neither walked in thy law; they have done nothing of all that thou commandedst them to do: therefore thou hast caused all this evil to come upon them: 24 Behold the mounts, they are come unto the city to take it; and the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans, that fight against it, because of the sword, and of the famine, and of the pestilence: and what thou hast spoken is come to pass; and, behold, thou seest it. 25 And thou hast said unto me, O Lord GOD, Buy thee the field for money, and take witnesses; for the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans.

We have here Jeremiah's prayer to God, upon occasion of the discoveries God had made to him of his purposes concerning this nation, to pull it down, and in process of time to build it up again, which puzzled the prophet himself, who, though he delivered his messages faithfully, yet in reflecting upon them was mightily at a loss within himself how to reconcile them; and in that perplexity he poured out his soul before God in prayer, and so gave himself ease. That which disturbed him was not the ill bargain he seemed to have made for himself, in purchasing a field that he was likely to have no good of, but the case of his people, for whom he was still a kind and faithful intercessor; and he was willing to hope that if God had so much mercy in store for them hereafter as he had promised, he would not proceed with so much severity against them now as he had threatened. Before Jeremiah went to prayer, he delivered the deeds that concerned his new purchase to Baruch, which may intimate to us, that Hebrew manuscripts and editions. The tower of Hananeel is thought to have been at the north-west of the Temple enclosure. The gate of the corner was at the north-west angle of the city wall. Mr. Lewin thinks the hill Gareb was that now called Bezetha, on the north of Jerusalem; and that Goath was Golgotha, on the west of the second wall of the city. Neither Gareb nor Goath are mentioned elsewhere by these names in the Bible.

xxxi. 40. The valley of the dead bodies and of the ashes is supposed to have been that called Tophet, which was a part of the valley of Hinnom, running round the south-west and south of Jerusalem to the brook Kidron, which lies under the east wall of the city. The horse gate is by some placed on the north of the city; but others think it was near the south-east corner of the Temple, which the text seems to imply.

xxxii. 1—5. The imprisonment of Jeremiah while the Babylonians were besieging Jerusalem was no doubt thought politic, because his when we are going to worship God we should get our minds as clear as may be from the cares and encumbrances of this world. Jeremiah was in prison, in distress, in the dark about the meaning of God's providences, and then he prays. Note, Prayer is a salve for every sore. Whatever is a burthen to us, we may by prayer cast it upon the Lord, and then be easy. In this prayer or meditation,

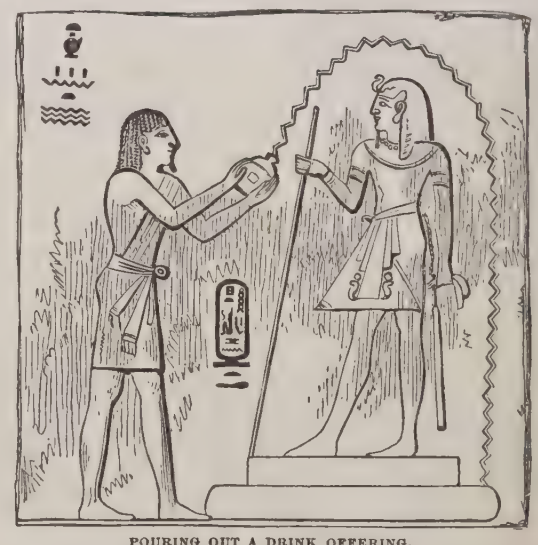
First. Jeremiah adores God and his infinite perfections, and gives him the glory due to his name as the Creator, upholder, and benefactor of the whole creation; thereby owning his irresistible power, that he can do what he will; and his incontestable sovereignty, that he may do what he will, ver. 17—19. Note, When at any time we are perplexed about the particular methods and dispensations of Providence, it is good for us to have recourse to our first principles, and to satisfy ourselves with the general doctrines of God's wisdom, power, and goodness. Let us consider as Jeremiah doth here, 1. That God is the fountain of all being, power, life, motion and perfection; he "made the heaven and the earth with his outstretched arm," and therefore who can control him? Who dares contend with him? 2. That with him nothing is impossible, no difficulty insuperable; "Nothing is too hard for thee," when human skill and power are quite nonplussed. "With God is strength and wisdom" sufficient to master all the opposition. 3. That he is a God of boundless, bottomless mercy. That is his darling attribute; it is his goodness that is his glory. Thou not only art kind, but shewest lovingkindness, not to a few, to here and there one, but to thousands, thousands of persons, thousands of generations. 4. That he is a God of impartial and inflexible justice. His reprieves are not pardons; but if in mercy he spares the parents that they may be led to repentance, yet such a hatred has he to sin, and such a displeasure against sinners, that he "recompenseth their iniquity into the bosom of their children," and yet doth them no wrong. So hateful is the unrighteousness of man, and so jealous of its own honour is the righteousness of God. 5. That he is a God of universal dominion and command. He is the great God, for he is the mighty God; and might among men makes them great. He is the Lord of hosts, of all hosts; that is his name, and he answers his name, for all the hosts of heaven and earth, of men and angels, are at his beck. 6. That he contrives every thing for the best, and effects every thing as he contrived it. He is great in counsel, so vast are the reaches, and so deep are the designs of his wisdom; and he is mighty in doing, according to the counsel of his will. Now, such a God as this is not to be quarrelled with. His service is to be constantly adhered to, and all his disposals cheerfully acquiesced in.



Secondly. He acknowledgeth the universal cognizance God takes of all the actions of the children of men, and the unerring judgment he passeth upon them; ver. 19, "Thine eyes are open upon all the sons of men," wherever they are, beholding the evil and the good; and upon all their ways, both the course they take and every step they take, not as an unconcerned spectator, but as an observing judge, "to give every one according to his ways, and according to" his deserts, which are "the fruit of his doings;" for men shall find God as they are found of him.

Thirdly. He recounts the great things God had done for his people Israel formerly. 1. He brought them out of Egypt, that house of bondage, with signs and wonders, which remain, if not in the marks of them, yet in the memorials of them, even unto this day: for it would never be forgotten, not only in Israel, who were minded of it every year by the ordinance of the passover, but among other men. All the neighbour nations spake of it, as that which redounded exceedingly to the glory of the God of Israel, and made him a name "as at this day." This is repeated again, ver. 21, that God brought them forth, not only with comforts and joys to them, but with glory to himself, with signs and wonders, (witness the ten plagues,) with a strong hand, too strong for the Egyptians themselves, and with a stretched-out arm, that reached Pharaoh, as proud as he was, and with great terror to them and all about them. This seems to refer to Deu. iv. 34. 2. He brought them into Canaan, that good land, that land flowing with milk and honey. He sware to their fathers to give it them; and, because he would perform his oath, he did give it to the children, ver. 22, and they came in and possessed it Jeremiah mentions this both as an aggravation of their sin and disobedience, and also as a plea with God to work deliverance for them. Note, It is good for us often to reflect upon the great things that God did for his church formerly, especially the first erecting of it, that work of wonder.

Fourthly. He bewails the rebellions they had been guilty of against God, and the judgments God had brought upon them for these rebellions. It is a sad account he here gives of the ungrateful carriage of that people towards God. He had done every thing that he had promised them to do, (they had acknowledged it, 1 Kin. viii. 56,) but they had "done nothing of all that he commanded them to do," ver. 23. They made no conscience of any of his laws, they walked not in them, paid no respect to any of his calls by his prophets, for they obeyed not his voice; and therefore he owns that God was righteous in causing "all this evil to come upon them." The city is besieged, is attacked by the sword without, is weakened and wasted by the famine and pestilence within, so that it is ready to fall "into the hand of the Chaldeans that fight against it," ver. 24; it is given into their hands, ver 25. Now, 1. He compares the present state of Jerusalem with the Divine predictions, and finds that what God hath spoken is come to pass. God had given them fair warning of it before, which if they had regarded the ruin had been prevented; but if they will not do what God has commanded they can expect no other but that he should do what he has threatened. 2. He commits the present state of Jerusalem to the Divine consideration and compassion; ver. 24, "Behold the mounts," or ramparts, or the engines which they make use of to batter the city, and beat down the wall of it. And again, "Behold, thou seest it," and takest cognizance of it. Is this the city that thou hast chosen to put thy name there? and shall it be thus abandoned? He neither complains of God for what he had done nor prescribes to God what he should do, but desires he would behold their case, and is pleased to think that he doth behold it. Whatever trouble we are in upon a personal or public account, we may comfort ourselves with this, that God sees it, and sees how to remedy it.

Fifthly. He seems desirous to be let farther into the meaning of this order God had now given him to purchase his kinsman's field; ver. 25, Though "the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans," and no man is likely to enjoy what he has, yet "thou hast said unto me, Buy thee the field." As soon as he understood that it was the mind of God, he did it, and made no objections, was not disobedient to the heavenly vision; but when he had done it, he desired better to understand why God had ordered him to do it because the thing looked odd and unaccountable. Note, Though we are bound to follow God with an implicit obedience, yet we should endeavour that it may be more and more an intelligent obedience. We must never dispute God's statutes and judgments, but we may and must inquire, "What mean these statutes and judgments?" Deu. vi. 20.

26 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying, 27 Behold, I am the LORD, the God of all flesh: is there any thing too hard for me? 28 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the Chaldeans, and into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, and he shall take it: 29 And the Chaldeans, that fight against this city, shall come and set fire on this city, and burn it with the houses, upon whose roofs they have offered incense unto Baal, and poured out drink offerings unto other gods, to provoke me to anger.

POURING OUT A DRINK OFFERING.

30 For the children of Israel and the children of Judah have only done evil before me from their youth: for the children of Israel have only provoked me to anger with the work of their hands, saith the LORD. 31 For this city hath been to me as a provocation of mine anger and of my fury from the day that they built it even unto this day; that I should remove it from before my face, 32 Because of all the evil of the children of Israel and of the children of Judah, which they have done to provoke me to anger, they, their kings, their princes, their priests, and their prophets, and the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. 33 And they have turned unto me the back, and not the face: though I taught them, rising up early and teaching them, yet they have not hearkened to receive instruction. 34 But they set their abominations in the house, which is called by my name, to defile it. 35 And they built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of the son of Hinnom, to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded them not, neither came it into my mind, that they should do this abomination, to cause Judah to sin. 36 And now therefore thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, concerning this city, whereof ye say, It shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence; 37 Behold, I will gather them out of all countries, whither I have prophecies tended to hasten the surrender of the city. He was in the court of the prison, so that he was not actually confined to a cell or dungeon.

xxxii. 6—15. The Levites could not possess and cultivate land like the other tribes, but they could use the produce of the ground near the cities which they occupied. Although they could not alienate the lands belonging to them, so as to transfer them to other tribes, property could be passed from one to another among themselves. This sale would be not of the land, but of the use and produce of it. Jeremiah was the next relation of Hanameel, and as such had a right to the first offer of the field. The prophet, though a prisoner, and in a besieged city, bought the field, because he believed prosperity and peace would return again. The sum paid for the conveyance was only about forty shillings. This amount is said to have been weighed, no doubt because coined money was not yet in use among the Hebrews. The drawing up of formal deeds, and the sealing and signing of them driven them in mine anger, and in my fury, and in great wrath; and I will bring them again unto this place, and I will cause them to dwell safely: 38 And they shall be my people, and I will be their God: 39 And I will give them one heart, and one way, that they may fear me for ever, for the good of them, and of their children after them: 40 And I will make an everlasting covenant with them, that I will not turn away from them, to do them good; but I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me. 41 Yea, I will rejoice over them to do them good, and I will plant them in this land assuredly with my whole heart and with my whole soul. 42 For thus saith the LORD; Like as I have brought all this great evil upon this people, so will I bring upon them all the good that I have promised them. 43 And fields shall be bought in this land, whereof ye say, It is desolate without man or beast; it is given into the hand of the Chaldeans. 44 Men shall buy fields for money, and subscribe evidences, and seal them, and take witnesses in the land of Benjamin, and in the places about Jerusalem, and in the cities of Judah, and in the cities of the mountains, and in the cities of the valley, and in the cities of the south: for I will cause their captivity to return, saith the LORD.

We have here God's return to Jeremiah's prayer, designed to quiet his mind and make him easy, and it is a full discovery of the purposes of God's wrath against the present generation, and the purposes of his grace concerning the future generations. Jeremiah knew not how to sing both of mercy and judgment; but God here teacheth him, and to sing unto him of both. When we know not how to reconcile one word of God with another, yet we may be sure that both are true, both are pure, both shall be made good, and not one iota or tittle of either shall fall to the ground. When Jeremiah was ordered to buy the field in Anathoth, he was willing to hope that God was about to revoke the sentence of his wrath, and to order the Chaldeans to raise the siege; No, saith God, the execution of the sentence shall go on, Jerusalem shall be laid in ruins. Note, Assurances of future mercy must not be interpreted as securities from present troubles. But, lest Jeremiah should think that his being ordered to buy this field intimated that all the mercy God had in store for his people after their return was only that they should have the possession of their own land again, he farther acquaints him that that was but a type and figure of those spiritual blessings which should then be abundantly bestowed upon them, unspeakably more valuable than fields and vineyards. So that in this word of the Lord which came here to Jeremiah we have first as dreadful threatenings, and then as precious promises, as perhaps any we have in all the Old Testament. Life and death, good and evil, are here set before us; let us consider and choose wisely.

First. The ruin of Judah and Jerusalem is here pronounced; the decree is gone forth, and shall not be recalled.

1. God here asserts his own sovereignty and power; ver. 27, "Behold, I am Jehovah," a self-existent, self-sufficient being; "I am that I am, I am the God of all flesh;" that is, of all mankind, here called flesh, because weak and unable to contend with God, Ps. lvi. 4, and because wicked and corrupt, and unapt to comply with God. God is the Creator of all, and makes what use he pleaseth of all. He that is the God of Israel is the God of all flesh, and of the spirits of all flesh; and, if Israel were cast off, could raise up a people to his name out of some other nation. If he be the God of all flesh, he may well ask, "Is any thing too hard for me?" What cannot he do from whom all the powers of men are derived, and on whom they depend, and by whom all their actions are directed and governed? Whatever he designs to do, whether in wrath or in mercy nothing can hinder him, or defeat his designs.

2. He abides by what he had often said of the destruction of Jerusalem by the king of Babylon; ver. 28, "I will give this city into his hand," now he is grasping at it, "and he shall take it," and make a prey of it; ver. 29, "The Chaldeans shall come and set fire to it," shall burn it and all the houses in it, God's house not excepted, nor the king's neither.

3. He assigns the reason for these severe proceedings against the city that had been so much in his favour. It is sin, it is that and nothing else, that ruins it. 1st. They were impudent and daring in sin. They offered incense to Baal, not in corners, as men ashamed or afraid of being discovered, but upon the tops of their houses, ver. 29, in defiance of God's justice. 2nd. They designed an affront to God herein. They did it "to provoke me to anger," ver. 29. "They have only provoked me to anger with the work of their hands," ver. 30; they could not promise themselves any pleasure, profit, or honour out of it, but did it on purpose to offend God. And again, ver. 32, "All the evil which they have done was to provoke me to anger." They knew he was a jealous God in the matters of his worship, and there they resolved to try his jealousy, and dare him to his face. Jerusalem has been "to me a provocation of my anger and fury," ver. 31. Their carriage in every thing was provoking. 3rd. They began by times, and had continued all along provoking to God. They have "done evil before me from their youth," ever since they were first formed into a people, ver. 30; witness their murmurings and rebellions in the wilderness. And as for Jerusalem, though it was the holy city, it has been a provocation to the holy God "from the day that they built it, even to this day," ver. 32. O what reason have we to lament the little honour God has from this world, and the great dishonour that is done him, when even in Judah, where he is known, and his name is great, and in Salem where his tabernacle is, there was always that found that was a provocation to him. 4th. All orders and degrees of men contributed to the common guilt, and therefore were justly involved in the common ruin; not only the children of Israel that had revolted from the temple, but the children of Judah too, that still adhered to it. Not only the common people, the men of Judah, and inhabitants of Jerusalem, but those that should have reproved and restrained sin in others, were themselves ringleaders in it,—their kings and princes, their priests and prophets. 5th. God had again and again called them to repentance, but they turned a deaf ear to his calls, and rudely turned their back on him that called them, though he was their master to whom they were bound in duty, and their benefactor to whom they were bound in gratitude and interest; ver. 33, "I taught them" better manners, with as much care as ever any tender parent taught a child, "rising up early, and teaching them," studying to adapt the teaching to their capacities, taking them betimes, when they might have been most pliable, but all in vain; they "turned not the face to me," would not so much as look upon me; nay, they "turned the back upon me," an expression of the highest contempt. "As he called them," like froward children, "so they went from him," Hos. xi. 2. "They have not hearkened to receive instruction;" they regarded not a word that was said to them, though it was designed for their own good. 6th. There was in their idolatries an impious contempt of God; for, ver. 34, "They set their abominations," their idols, which they knew to be in the highest degree abominable to God, they set them "in the house which is called by my name, to defile it." They had their idols not only in their high places and groves, but even in God's temple. 7th. They were guilty of the most unnatural cruelty to their children, for they "sacrificed them to Moloch," ver. 35. Thus, because they liked not to retain God in their knowledge, but changed his glory into shame, they were justly given up to vile affections, and stripped of natural ones, and their glory was turned into shame. 8th. What was the consequence of all this? First. They "caused Judah to sin," ver. 35. The whole country was infected with the contagious idolatries and iniquities of Jerusalem. Secondly. They brought ruin upon themselves. It was as if they had done it on purpose that God "should remove them from before his face," ver. 31; they would throw themselves out of his favour.

Secondly. The restoration of Judah and Jerusalem is here promised, ver. 36, &c. God will in judgment remember mercy, and there will a time come, a set time to favour Zion. Observe, 1st. The despair to which this people were now at length brought. When the judgment was threatened at a distance, they had no fear; when it attacked them, they had no hope. They said concerning the city, ver. 36, "It shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon," not by any cowardice or ill conduct of ours, but by "the sword, famine, and pestilence." Concerning the country, they said with vexation, ver. 43, "It is desolate without man or beast;" there is no relief, there is no remedy; "it is given into the hand of the Chaldeans." Note, Deep security commonly ends in deep despair; whereas those that keep up a holy fear at all times have a good hope to support themselves in the worst of times. 2nd. The hope that God gives them of mercy he had in store for them hereafter. Though their carcases must fall in captivity, yet their children after them should again see this good land, and the goodness of God in it.

1. They shall be brought up from their captivity, and shall come and settle again in this land, ver. 37. They had been under God's anger, and fury, and great wrath, but now they shall partake of his grace, and love, and great favour. He had dispersed them, and driven them into all countries: those that fled dispersed themselves, those that fell into the enemies' hands were dispersed by them in policy, to prevent combinations among them. God's hand was in both. But now God will find them out, and gather them out of all the "countries whither they were driven," as he promised in the law, Deu. xxx. 3, 4; and the saints had prayed, Ps. cvi. 47; Neh. i. 9. He had banished them, but he will bring them again to this place, which they could not but have an affection for. For many years past, while they were in their own land, they were continually exposed, and terrified with the alarms of war; but now "I will cause them to dwell safely." Being reformed and returned to God, neither their own consciences within nor their enemies without shall be a terror to them. He promiseth, ver. 41, "I will plant them in this land assuredly;" not only I will certainly do it, but they shall here enjoy a holy security and repose, and they shall take root here, shall be planted in stability, and not again be unfixed and shaken.

2. God will renew his covenant with them, a covenant of grace, the blessings of which are spiritual, and such as will work good things in them, to qualify them for the great things God intended to do for them. It is called an everlasting covenant, ver. 40, not only because God will be for ever faithful to it, but because the consequences of it will be everlasting: for, doubtless, here the promises look farther than to Israel according to the flesh, and are sure to all believers, to every Israelite indeed. Good Christians may apply them to themselves, and plead them with God, may claim the benefit, and take the comfort of them.

1st. God will own them for his, and make over himself to them to be theirs; ver. 38, "They shall be my people." He will make them his, by working in them all the characters and dispositions of his people, and then he will protect, and guide, and govern them as his people. And to make them truly, completely, and eternally happy, "I will be their God." They shall serve and worship God as theirs, and cleave to him only; and he will approve himself theirs. All he is, all he has, shall be engaged and employed for their good.

2nd. God will give them a heart to fear him, ver. 39. That which he requires of those whom he takes into covenant with him as his people is, that they fear him, that they reverence his majesty, dread his wrath, stand in awe of his authority, pay homage to him, and give him the glory due unto his name. Now what God requires of them he here promiseth to work in them, pursuant to his choice of them as his people. Note, As it is God's prerogative to fashion men's hearts, so it is his promise to his people to fashion theirs aright. And a heart to fear God is indeed a good heart and well fashioned. It is repeated again, ver. 40, "I will put my fear in their hearts;" that is, work in them gracious principles and dispositions, that shall influence and govern their whole conversation. Teachers may put good things into our heads, but it is God only that can put them into our hearts; that can work in us both to will and to do.

3rd. He "will give them one heart and one way." In order to their walking in one way, he will give them one heart. As the heart is so will the way be, and both shall be one; that is, First. They shall be each of them one with themselves. One heart is the same with a new heart, Eze. xi. 19. The heart is then one when it is fully determined for God, and entirely devoted to God; when the eye is single, and God's glory is alone aimed at. When our hearts are fixed, trusting in God, and we are uniform and universal in our obedience to him, then the heart is one, and the way one; and unless the heart be thus steady the goings will not be stedfast. From this promise we may take direction and encouragement to pray with David, Ps. lxxxvi. 11, "Unite my heart to before witnesses, illustrates the care with which the rights of ownership were protected. The modern Orientals, it is said, still observe the custom of writing out two copies of a contract, one being sealed, after signing before witnesses, and the other or counterpart left open. The depositing of the documents in an earthen vessel was for the sake of security and better preservation.

xxxii. 24. For "mounts" our translators suggest in the margin "engines of shot;" but mount, or rather "mound," is the proper term. In ancient sieges mounds of earth were raised both for offence and defence. Behind them the assailants readily sheltered themselves when convenient, and upon them they placed the engines by means of which they cast missiles into the city. These mounts were pushed nearer the walls as the siege progressed.

xxxii. 29. The practice of performing idolatrous rites upon the flat roofs of the houses has also been mentioned in chap. xix. 13.

xxxii. 34, 35. A similar passage to this occurs before, in chap.

fear thy name;" for God saith, "I will give them one heart, that they may fear me." Secondly. They shall be all of them one with each other. All good Christians shall be incorporated into one body, Jews and Gentiles shall become one sheepfold; and they shall all, as far as they are sanctified, have a disposition to love one another; the Gospel they profess having in it the strongest inducements to mutual love, and the Spirit that dwells in them being the Spirit of love. Though they may have different apprehensions about lesser things, they shall be all one in the great things of God, being renewed after the same image. Though they may have many paths, they have but one way, that of serious godliness.

4th. He will effectually provide for their perseverance in grace, and the perpetuating of the covenant between him and them. They had been happy when they were first planted in Canaan, like Adam in Paradise, if they had not departed from God; and therefore, now they are restored to their happiness, they shall be confirmed in it, by the preventing of their departures from God. And this will complete their bliss, First. God will never leave nor forsake them, "I will not turn away from them to do them good." Earthly princes are fickle, and their greatest favourites have fallen under their frowns; but God's mercy endureth for ever; whom he loves, he loves to the end. God may seem to turn from his people, (Isa. liv. 8,) but even then he doth not turn from doing and designing them good. Secondly. They shall never leave nor forsake him. That is the thing we are in danger of; we have no reason to distrust God's fidelity and constancy, but our own. And therefore it is here promised, that God will give them a heart to fear him for ever,—all days; to be in his fear every day, and all the day long, (Pr. xxiii. 17,) and to continue so to the end of their days. He will put such a principle into their hearts as that they shall not depart from him. Even those who have given up their names to God, if they be left to themselves, will depart from him; but the fear of God ruling in the heart will prevent their departure; that and nothing else will do it. If we continue close and faithful to God, it is owing purely to his almighty grace, and not to any strength or resolution of our own.

5th. He will entail a blessing upon their seed, will give them grace to fear him, "for the good of them, and of their children after them." As their departures from God had been to the prejudice of their children, so their adherence to God should be to the advantage of their children. We cannot better consult the good of posterity, than by setting up, and keeping up, the fear and worship of God in our families.

6th. He will take a pleasure in their prosperity, and will do everything to advance it; ver. 41, "I will rejoice over them to do them good." God will therefore do them good because he rejoiceth over them; they are dear to him, he makes his boast of them, and therefore will not only do them good, but will delight in doing them good. When he punisheth them it is with reluctancy: "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim?" But when he restores them it is with satisfaction: he rejoiceth in doing them good. We ought therefore to serve him with pleasure, and to rejoice in all opportunities of serving him. He is himself a cheerful giver, and therefore loves a cheerful servant, "I will plant them," saith God, "with my whole heart, and with my whole soul." He will be intent upon it, and take delight in it; he will make it the business of his providence to settle them in Canaan, and the various dispensations of providence shall concur to it. All things shall appear at last so to have been working for the good of the church, that it will be said, the Governor of the world was entirely taken up with the care of his church.

7th. These promises shall as surely be performed as the foregoing threatenings were; and the accomplishment of those, notwithstanding the security of the people, might confirm their expectation of the performance of these, notwithstanding their present despair; ver. 42, "As I have brought all this great evil upon them," pursuant to the threatenings, and for the glory of Divine justice, "so I will bring upon them all this good," pursuant to the promise, and for the glory of Divine mercy. He that is faithful to his threatening will much more be so to his promises; and he will comfort his people "according to the time that he has afflicted them." The churches shall have rest after the days of adversity.

8th. As an earnest of all this, houses and lands shall again take a good price in Judah and Jerusalem; and, though now they are a drug, there shall again be purchasers enough for them; ver. 43, 44, "Fields shall be bought in this land," and people will covet to have lands here rather than anywhere else. Lands wherever they lie will go off, not only in the places about Jerusalem, but in the cities of Judah and of Israel too, whether they lie on mountains, or in valleys, or in the south; in all parts of the country men shall buy fields and subscribe evidences. Trade shall revive, for they shall have money enough to buy land with; husbandry shall revive, for those that have money shall covet to lay it out upon lands; laws shall again have their due course, for they shall subscribe evidences and seal them. This is mentioned to reconcile Jeremiah to his new purchase; though he had bought a piece of ground, and could not go see it, yet he must believe that was the pledge of many a purchase, and those but faint resemblances of the purchased possessions in the heavenly Canaan reserved for all those who have God's fear in their hearts, and do not depart from him.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

The scope of this chapter is much the same with that of the foregoing chapter, to confirm the promise of the restoration of the Jews, notwithstanding the present desolations of their country, and dispersions of their people. And these promises have both in type and tendency a reference as far forward as to the gospel church, to which this second edition of the Jewish church was at length to resign its dignities and privileges. It is here promised, I. That the city shall be rebuilt, and re-established in statu quo—'in its former state,' ver. 1—6. II. That the captives, having their sins pardoned, shall be restored, ver. 7, 8. III. That this shall redound very much to the glory of God, ver. 9. IV. That the country shall have both joy and plenty, ver. 10—14. V. That way shall be made for the coming of the Messiah, ver. 15, 16. VI. That the house of David, the house of Levi, and the house of Israel shall flourish again, and be established, and all three in the kingdom of Christ, a gospel ministry; and the gospel church shall continue while the world stands, ver. 17—26.

MOREOVER the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah the second time, while he was yet shut up in the court of the prison, saying,

2 Thus saith the LORD the maker thereof,
The LORD that formed it, to establish it;
The LORD is his name;
3 Call unto me, and I will answer thee,
And shew thee great and mighty things,
Which thou knowest not

4 For thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel,
Concerning the houses of this city,
And concerning the houses of the kings of Judah,
Which are thrown down by the mounts, and by the sword;
5 They come to fight with the Chaldeans,
But it is to fill them with the dead bodies of men,
Whom I have slain in mine anger and in my fury,
And for all whose wickedness
I have hid my face from this city. [them,
6 Behold, I will bring it health and cure, and I will cure
And will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth.
7 And I will cause the captivity of Judah
And the captivity of Israel to return,
And will build them, as at the first.
8 And I will cleanse them from all their iniquity,
Whereby they have sinned against me;
And I will pardon all their iniquities,
Whereby they have sinned,
And whereby they have transgressed against me.
9 And it shall be to me a name of joy,
A praise and an honour before all the nations of the earth,
Which shall hear all the good that I do unto them:
And they shall fear and tremble for all the goodness
And for all the prosperity that I procure unto it.

Observe here, First. The date of this comfortable prophecy which God intrusted Jeremiah with. It is not exact in the time, only that it was after that in the foregoing chapter, when things were still growing worse and worse; it was the second time. God speaketh once, yea, twice, for the encouragement of his people. We are not only so disobedient that we have need of precept upon precept to bring us to our duty, but so distrustful that we have need of promise upon promise to bring us to our comfort. This word, as the former, came to Jeremiah when he was in prison. Note, No confinement can deprive God's people of his presence, no locks or bars can shut out his gracious visits. Nay, oftentimes "as their afflictions abound, their consolations much more abound," and they have the most reviving communications of his favour then when the world frowns upon them. Paul's sweetest epistles were those that bare date out of a prison.

Secondly. The prophecy itself. A great deal of comfort is wrapped up in it, for the relief of the captives, to keep them from sinking into despair. Observe,

1. Who it is that secures this comfort to them, ver. 2. It is "the Lord the maker thereof, the Lord that framed it." He is the maker and former of heaven and earth, and therefore has all power in his hands: so it refers to Jeremiah's prayer, ch. xxxii. 17. He is the maker and former of Jerusalem, of Zion; built them at first, and therefore can rebuild them; built them for his own praise, and therefore will. He formed it to establish it, and therefore it shall be established till those things be introduced which cannot be shaken, but shall remain for ever. He is the maker and former of this promise; he has laid the scheme for Jerusalem's restoration, and he that has formed it will establish it, that has made the promise will make it good, for Jehovah is his name,—a God giving being to his promises by the performance of them, which when he doth he is known by that name, Ex. vi. 3; a perfecting God. When the heavens and the earth were finished, then and not till then, the Creator is called Jehovah, Gen. ii. 1.

2. How this comfort must be obtained and fetched in. By prayer; ver. 3, "Call upon me, and I will answer thee." The prophet having received some intimations of this kind, must be humbly earnest with God for farther discoveries of his kind intentions. He had prayed, ch. xxxii. 16, but he must pray again. Note, Those that expect to receive comforts from God must "continue instant in prayer;" we must call upon him, and then he will answer us. Christ himself must ask, and it shall be given him, Ps. ii. 8. "I will shew thee great and mighty things," that is, give thee a clear and full prospect of them; hidden things, which, though in part discovered already, yet thou knowest not, thou canst not understand or give credit to. Or, this may refer not only to the prediction of these things which Jeremiah, if he desire it, shall be favoured with, but to the performance of the things themselves, which the people of God, encouraged by this prediction, must pray for. Note, Promises are given not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage prayer: see Eze. xxxvi. 37.

3. How deplorable the condition of Jerusalem was, which made it necessary that such comforts as these should be provided for it; and notwithstanding which its restoration should be brought about in due time, ver. 4, 5. "The houses of this city," not excepting those of "the kings of Judah, are thrown down by the mounts," or engines of battery, and by the sword, or axes, or hammers. It is the same word that is used Eze. xxvi. 9, "With his axes he shall break down thy towers." The strongest, stateliest houses, and those that were best furnished, were levelled with the ground. The fifth verse comes in in a parenthesis, giving a farther instance of the present calamitous state of Jerusalem. They that came to fight with the Chaldeans, to beat them off from the siege, did more hurt than good, provoked the enemy to be more fierce and furious in their assaults, so that the houses in Jerusalem were filled with the dead bodies of men that died of the wounds they received in sallying out upon the besiegers. God saith, they were such as he had slain in his anger, for the enemies' sword was his sword, and their anger his anger. But it seems the men that were slain were generally such as had distinguished themselves by their wickedness, for they were the very men for whose wickedness God did now hide himself from this city, so that he was just in all he brought upon them.

4. What the blessings are which God has in store for Judah and Jerusalem; such as will redress all their grievances.

1st. Is their state diseased? is it wounded? God will provide effectually for the healing of it, though the disease was thought mortal and incurable, ch. viii. 22. "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint;" but, ver. 6, I

vii. 30—32, but this differs from it in the mention of Molech, and in other details.

xxxii. 44. The enumeration of localities here includes the whole of the kingdom of Judah. The mountains or hill country of Judea lay to the south of Jerusalem; the plain was towards the Mediterranean, on the west; and the south was the south-west region, or Negeb.

xxxiii. 3. For "mighty things" our translators have in the margin "or, hidden," which sense is given by a various reading here. "Mighty" means "hard to understand," or difficult. The Syriac translates the word "strong;" but, as in our version, the idea of the word is that effort or energy must be made to understand the things declared.

xxxiii. 4. As observed on chap. xxxii. 24, the "mounts" were erected for offensive and defensive purposes. This applies to the besieged as well as to the besiegers. The besieged acted precisely as was done in the siege of Paris in 1870-71, for example, where a good will bring it health and cure, I will prevent the death, remove the sickness, and set all to rights again, ch. xxx. 17. Note, Be the case never so desperate, if God undertake the cure he will effect it. The sin of Jerusalem was the sickness of it, Isa. i. 6; its reformation therefore will be its recovery. And the following words tell us how that is wrought: "I will reveal unto them the abundance of peace and truth," that is, I will give it them in due time, and give them an encouraging prospect of it in the meantime. Peace stands here for all good; peace and truth is peace according to the promise, and in pursuance of that. Or, peace and truth is peace and the true religion; peace and the true worship of God, in opposition to the many falsehoods and deceits by which they had been led away from God. We may apply it more generally, and observe, First. That peace and truth are the great subject matter of Divine revelation. These promises here lead us to the Gospel of Christ, and in that God has revealed to us peace and truth, the method of true peace; truth to direct us, peace to make us easy. Grace and truth, and abundance of both, come by Jesus Christ. Peace and truth are the life of the soul, and Christ came that we might have that life, and might have it more abundantly. Christ rules by the power of truth, Jno. xviii. 37, and by it he gives abundance of peace, Ps. lxxii. 7, and lxxxv. 10. Secondly. That the Divine revelation of peace and truth brings health and cure to all those that by faith receive it. It heals the soul of the diseases it has contracted, as it is a means of sanctification, Jno. xvii. 17, ("He sent his word and healed them," Ps. cvii. 20;) and it puts the soul into good order, and keeps it in frame, and fit for the employments and enjoyments of the spiritual and Divine life.

2nd. Are they scattered and enslaved, and is their nation laid in ruins? "I will cause their captivity to return," ver. 7, both that of Israel and that of Judah; for, though those who returned under Zerubbabel were chiefly of Judah, and Benjamin, and Levi, yet afterwards many of all the other tribes returned. And I will rebuild them, as I built them at first. When they by repentance do their first works, God will by their restoration do his first works.

3rd. Is sin the procuring cause of all their troubles? That shall be pardoned and subdued, and so the root of the judgments shall be killed, ver. 8. First. By sin they are become filthy, and odious to God's holiness; but God will cleanse them, and purify them from their iniquity. As those that were ceremonially unclean, and were therefore shut out from the tabernacle, when they were sprinkled with the water of purification, had liberty of access to it again, so had they to their own land and the privileges of it, when God had cleansed them from their iniquities. In allusion to that sprinkling, David prays, "Purge me with hyssop." Secondly. By sin they are become guilty, and obnoxious to his justice; but he "will pardon all their iniquities," will remove the punishment to which for sin they were bound over. All that by sanctifying grace are cleansed from the filth of sin, by pardoning mercy are freed from the guilt of it.

4th. Have both their sins and their sufferings turned to the dishonour of God? Their reformation and restoration shall redound as much to his praise, ver. 9. Jerusalem thus rebuilt, Judah thus repeopled, shall be to me a name of joy, as pleasing to God as ever they had been provoking, and "a praise and an honour before all the nations." They, being thus restored, shall glorify God by their services of him, and he shall glorify himself by his favours to them. This renewed nation shall be as much a reputation to religion as formerly it has been a reproach to it. The nations shall hear of all the good that God has wrought in them by his grace, and of all the good he has wrought for them by his providence. The wonders of their return out of Babylon shall make as great a noise in the world as ever the wonders of their deliverance out of Egypt did. And "they shall fear and tremble for all this goodness." First. The people of God themselves shall fear and tremble; they shall be much surprised at it, shall be afraid of offending so good a God, and of forfeiting his favour; Hos. iii. 5, "They shall fear the Lord and his goodness." Secondly. The neighbour nations shall fear because of the prosperity of Jerusalem; shall look upon the growing greatness of the Jewish nation as really formidable, and shall be afraid of making them their enemies. When the church is "fair as the moon, and clear as the sun," she is "terrible as an army with banners."

STEWARD NUMBERING THE HERDS.—ver. 13.

Here is a farther prediction of the happy state of Judah and Jerusalem after their glorious return out of captivity, issuing gloriously at length in the kingdom of the Messiah.

First. It is promised that the people that were long in sorrow shall again be filled with joy. Every one concluded now that the country would lie for ever desolate, that no beasts should be found in the land of Judah, no inhabitants in the streets of Jerusalem; and, consequently, there would be nothing but an universal and perpetual melancholy, ver. 10. But though weeping may endure for a time, joy will return. It was threatened, ch. vii. 34, and xvi. 9, that the voice of joy and gladness should cease there; but here it is promised that they shall revive again, that the voice of joy and gladness shall be heard there, because the captivity shall be returned, for then was their mouth filled with laughter, Ps. cxxvi. 1, 2. 1. There shall be common joy there, "the voice of the bridegroom, and the voice of the bride." Marriages shall again be celebrated as formerly with songs, which in Babylon they had laid aside; for their harps were hung on the willow trees. 2. There shall be religious joy there; temple songs shall be revived, the Lord's songs, which they could not sing in a strange land. There shall be heard in their private houses, and in the cities of Judah, as well as in the temple, "the voice of them that shall say, Praise the Lord of hosts." Note, Nothing is more the praise and honour of a people than to have God praised and honoured amongst them. This shall complete the mercy of their return and restoration, that with it they shall have hearts to be thankful for it, and give God the glory of it, the glory both of the power and of the goodness by which it is effected; they shall praise him, both as the Lord of hosts and as the God who is good, and whose "mercy endureth for ever." This, though a song of old, yet, being sung upon this fresh occasion, will be a new song. We find this literally fulfilled at their return out of Babylon, Ezr. iii. 11. They sung together in praising the Lord, "because he is good, for his mercy endures for ever." The public worship of God shall be diligently and constantly attended upon: they "shall bring the sacrifice of praise to the house of the Lord." All the sacrifices were intended for the praise of God; but this seems to be meant of the spiritual sacrifices of humble adorations, and joyful thanksgivings, "the calves of our lips," Hos. xiv. 2; which shall "please the Lord better than an ox or bullock." The Jews say, that in the days of the Messiah all sacrifices shall cease, but the sacrifice of praise; and to those days this promise has a farther reference.

Secondly. It is promised that the country, which had lain long depopulated, should be replenished and stocked again. It was now desolate, without man, and without beast; but after their return the pastures shall again be clothed with flocks, Ps. lxv. 13. In "all the cities of Judah and Benjamin there shall be an habitation of shepherds," ver. 12, 13. This speaks, 1. The wealth of the country after their return. It shall not be a habitation of beggars, that have nothing; but of shepherds and husbandmen, men of substance, with good stocks upon the ground they are returned to. 2. The peace of the country. It shall not be a habitation of soldiers, nor shall there be tents and barracks set up to lodge them, but they shall be shepherds' tents; for they shall hear no more the alarms of war, nor shall there be any to make even the shepherds afraid: see Ps. cxliv. 13, 14. 3. The industry of the country, and their return to their original plainness and simplicity, from which in the corrupt ages they had sadly degenerated. The seed of Jacob in their beginning gloried in this, that they were shepherds, Gen. xlvii. 3; and so they shall now be again, giving themselves wholly to that innocent employment; "causing their flocks to lie down," ver. 12, and to "pass under the hands of him that telleth them," ver. 13. For, though their flocks are numerous, they are not numberless, nor shall they omit to number them, that they may know if any be missing, and may seek after it. Note, It is the prudence of those who have never so much of the world to keep an account of what they have. Some think they "pass under the hand of him that telleth them," that they may be tithed, Lev. xxvii. 32. Then we may take the comfort of what we have when God has had his due out of it. Now, because it seemed incredible that a people reduced as they now were should ever recover such a degree of peace and plenty as this, here is subjoined a general ratification of these promises; ver. 14, "I will perform that good thing which I have promised." Though the promise may sometimes work slowly towards an accomplishment, it works surely. "The days will come," though they are long in coming.

Thirdly. To crown all these blessings which God has in store for them, here is a promise of the Messiah, and of that everlasting righteousness which he should bring in, ver. 15, 16. And probably this is that good thing, that great good thing, which in the latter days, days that were yet to come, God would perform, as he had promised, to Judah and Israel, and which their return out many houses were pulled down in order that the defenders of the city might erect their siege-works. So at Jerusalem private houses were pulled down that earthworks might be raised for the better defence of the place. Our translation has "thrown down by the mounts," but we prefer to explain the words "for the mounts," i.e., to make room for them. So also with the next expression, "by the sword;" we understand it to mean "for the sword," i.e., for men who use the sword.

xxxiii. 13. Here, as in chap. xxxii. 44, we find an enumeration of the various districts into which the kingdom of Judah was divided.

xxxiii. 14—16. That the promise of the Messiah is repeated here can scarcely be doubted. The words closely correspond with chap. xxiii. 5, 6, but are not precisely the same. Some have doubted their genuineness, because they are not found in the Greek version; but see the next note.

xxxiii. 17—26. Dr. Henderson says of these verses that, together of captivity, and their settlement again in their own land, was in order to. From the captivity to Christ is one of the famous periods, Mat. i. 17. This promise of the Messiah we had before, ch. xxiii. 5, 6; and there it came in as a confirmation of the promise of the shepherds which God would set over them; which would make one think that the promise here concerning the shepherds and their flocks, which introduceth it, is to be understood figuratively. Christ is here prophesied of, 1. As a rightful King. He is a "Branch of righteousness," not an usurper; for he grows up unto David, descends from his loins, with whom the covenant of royalty was made, and is that seed with whom that covenant should be established, so that his title is unexceptionable. 2. As a righteous King. Righteous in enacting laws, waging wars, and giving judgment, righteous in vindicating those that suffer wrong, and punishing those that do wrong; "He shall execute judgment and righteousness in the land." This may point at Zerubbabel in the type, who governed with equity, not as Jehoiakim had done, ch. xxii. 17; but it has a farther reference to him to whom all judgment is committed, and who shall judge the world in righteousness. 3. As a King that shall protect his subjects from all injury. By him Judah shall be saved from wrath and the curse; and, being so saved, Jerusalem shall dwell safely, quiet from the fear of evil, and enjoying a holy security and serenity of mind, in a dependence upon the conduct of this Prince of peace, this Prince of their peace. 4. As a King that shall be praised by his subjects. "This is the name whereby they shall call him," so the Chaldee reads it, the Syriac, and vulgar Latin; this name of his they shall celebrate, and triumph in, and by this name they shall call upon him. It may be read, more agreeably to the original, 'This is he who shall call her, the Lord our righteousness;' as Moses' altar is called Jehovah Nisse, Ex. xvii. 15; and Jerusalem, Jehovah Shammah, Eze. xlviii. 35; intimating that they glory in Jehovah, as present with them, and their banner. So here the city is called, "The Lord our righteousness," because they glory in Jehovah as their righteousness. That which was before said to be the name of Christ (saith Mr. Gataker) is here made the name of Jerusalem, the city of the Messias, the church of Christ. He it is that imparts righteousness to her, for he is made of God to us righteousness; and she by bearing that name professeth to have her whole righteousness, not from herself, but from him; "In the Lord have I righteousness and strength," Isa. xlv. 24; and we are "made the righteousness of God in him." The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall have this name of the Messias so much in their mouths that they shall themselves be called by it.

17 For thus saith the LORD;
David shall never want a man
To sit upon the throne of the house of Israel;
18 Neither shall the priests the Levites want a man before me
To offer burnt offerings, and to kindle meat offerings,
And to do sacrifice continually.
19 And the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah, saying,
20 Thus saith the LORD;
If ye can break my covenant of the day,
And my covenant of the night, [season;
And that there should not be day and night in their 21 Then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant,
That he should not have a son to reign upon his throne;
And with the Levites the priests, my ministers.
22 As the host of heaven cannot be numbered,
Neither the sand of the sea measured:
So will I multiply the seed of David my servant,
And the Levites that minister unto me.
23 Moreover the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah, saying,
24 Considerest thou not what this people have spoken, say-
The two families which the LORD hath chosen, [ing,
He hath even cast them off?
Thus they have despised my people,
That they should be no more a nation before them.
25 Thus saith the LORD;
If my covenant be not with day and night,
And if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth; [servant, 26 Then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David my
So that I will not take any of his seed to be rulers
Over the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob:
For I will cause their captivity to return, and have mercy on them.

Three of God's covenants, that of royalty with David and his seed, that of the priesthood with Aaron and his seed, and that of peculiarity with Abraham and his seed, seemed to have been all broken and lost while the captivity lasted; but it is here promised that, notwithstanding that interruption and discontinuance for a time, they shall all three take place again; and the true intents and meaning of them all shall be abundantly answered in the New Testament blessings, typified by those conferred on the Jews after their return out of captivity.

First. The covenant of royalty shall be secured, and the promises of it shall have their full accomplishment in the kingdom of Christ, the Son of David, ver. 17. The throne of Israel was overturned in the captivity, the crown was fallen from their head, there was not a man to sit on the throne of Israel,—Jeconiah was written childless. After their return the house of David made a figure again. But it is in the Messiah that this promise is performed, that "David shall never want a man to sit on the throne of Israel;" and that David shall have always a son to reign upon his throne. For as long as the man Christ Jesus sits on the right hand of the throne of God, rules the world, and rules it for the good of the church, to which he is a quickening Head, and glorified Head over all things; as long as he is King upon the holy hill of Zion, David doth not want a successor, nor is the covenant with him broken. When the first-begotten was brought into the world, it was declared concerning him, that "the Lord God shall give him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever," Lu. i. 32, 33.

For the confirmation of this it is promised, 1. That the covenant with David shall be as firm as the ordinances of heaven, to the stability of which that of God's promise is compared, ch. xxxi. 35, 36. There is a covenant of nature, by which the common course of providence is settled, and on which it is founded, here called a covenant of the day and the night, ver. 20, 25; because that is one of the articles of it, that there shall be day and night in their season, according to the distinction put between them in the creation, when God divided between the light and the darkness, and established their mutual succession, and a government to each, that the sun should rule by day, and the moon and the stars by night, Gen. i. 4, 5, 16; which establishment was renewed after the flood, Gen. viii. 22, and has continued ever since, Ps. xix. 2; the morning and the evening have both of them their regular outgoings, Ps. lxv. 8. The day-spring knows its place, knows its time, and keeps both; so do the shadows of the evening; and while the world stands, this course shall not be altered, this covenant shall not be broken. The ordinances of heaven and earth, (of this communication between heaven and earth, the dominion of these ordinances of heaven upon the earth,) which God has appointed, ver. 25, (compare Job xxxviii. 33,) shall never be disappointed. Thus firm shall the covenant of redemption be with the Redeemer, God's servant, but David our king, ver. 21. This intimates that Christ shall have a church on earth to the world's end; he shall see a seed in which he shall prolong his days, till time and days shall be no more. Christ's kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and when the end cometh, and not until then, it shall be delivered up to God, even the Father. But it intimates that the condition of it in this world shall be intermixed, and counterchanged; prosperity and adversity succeeding each other, as light and darkness, day and night. But this is plainly taught us, that as sure as we may be that, though the sun will set to-night, it will rise again to-morrow morning, whether we live to see it or no, so sure we may be that, though the kingdom of the Redeemer in the world may for a time be clouded and eclipsed by corruptions and persecutions, yet it will shine forth again, and recover its lustre in the time appointed. 2. That the seed of David shall be as numerous as the host of heaven; that is, the spiritual seed of the Messiah, that shall be born to him by the efficacy of his Gospel, and his Spirit working with it. From the womb of the morning he shall have the dew of their youth, to be his willing people, Ps. cx. 3. Christ's seed are not, as David's were, his successors, but his subjects; yet the day is coming when they also shall reign with him; ver. 22, "As the host of heaven cannot be numbered, so will I multiply the seed of David," so that there shall be no danger of the kingdoms being extinct, or extirpated, for want of heirs. The children are numerous; and if children than heirs.

Secondly. The covenant of priesthood shall be secured, and the promises of that also shall have their full accomplishment. This seemed likewise to be forgotten during the captivity, when there was no altar, no temple service for the priests to attend upon; but this also shall revive. It did so immediately upon their coming back to Jerusalem; there were priests and Levites ready to offer burnt offerings, and to do sacrifice continually, Ezr. iii. 2, 3; as is here promised, ver. 18. But that priesthood soon grew corrupt, the covenant of Levi was profaned, as appears, Mal. ii. 8, and in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans it came to a final period; we must, therefore, look elsewhere for the performance of this word, that the covenant with the Levites, the priests, God's ministers, shall be as firm and last as long as the covenant with the day and the night. And we find it abundantly performed, 1. In the priesthood of Christ, which supersedes that of Aaron, and is the substance of that shadow. While that great High Priest of our profession is always appearing in the presence of God for us, representing the virtue of his blood by which he made atonement in the incense of his intercession, it may truly be said, that the Levites do not want a man before God to offer continually, Heb. viii. 3; he is a priest for ever. The covenant of the priesthood is called a covenant of peace, Num. xxv. 12; of life and peace, Mal. ii. 5. Now we are sure this covenant is not broken, nor in the least weakened, while Jesus Christ is himself our life and our peace. This covenant of priesthood is here again and again joined with that of royalty, for Christ is a priest upon his throne, as Melchizedek. 2. In a settled Gospel ministry. While there are faithful ministers to preside in religious assemblies, and to offer up the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise, the priests, the Levites, do not want successors, and such as have obtained a more excellent ministry. The apostle makes those that preach the Gospel to come in the room of those that served at the altar, 1 Cor. ix. 13, 14. 3. In all true believers; who are a holy priesthood, a royal priesthood, 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9; who are made to our God kings and priests, Rev. i. 6. They offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God; and themselves in the first place, living sacrifices. Of these Levites this promise here must be understood, ver. 22, that they shall be as numerous as the sand of the sea; the same that is promised concerning Israel in general, Gen. xxii. 17, for all God's spiritual Israel are spiritual priests, Rev. v. 9, 10; vii. 9, 15.

Thirdly. The covenant of peculiarity likewise shall be secured, and the promises of that covenant shall have their full accomplishment in the Gospel Israel. Observe, 1. How this covenant was looked upon as broken during the captivity, ver. 24. God asks the prophet, Hast thou not heard, and dost thou not consider, what this people have spoken, (either the enemies of Israel who triumph in the extirpation of a people that had made such a noise in the world, or the unbelieving Israelites themselves,) this people among whom thou dwellest? they have broken covenant with God, and then quarrel with him, as if he had not dealt faithfully with them. "The two families which the Lord hath chosen," Israel and Judah, (whereas they were but one when he chose them,) "he hath even cast them off." "Thus have they despised my people;" that is, despised the privilege of being my people, as if it were a privilege of no value at all. The neighbour nations despised them as now no more a nation, but the ruins of a nation; and looked upon all their honour as laid in the dust. But, 2. See how firm the covenant stands notwithstanding; as firm as that with day and night. Sooner will God suffer day and night to cease than he will cast away the seed of Jacob. This cannot refer to the seed of Jacob according to the flesh, for they are cast away; but to the Christian church, in which all these promises were to be lodged, as appears by the apostle's discourse, Rom. xi. 1, &c. Christ is that seed of David that is to be perpetual dictator to the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and, as this people shall never want such a king, so this king shall never want such a people. Christianity shall continue in the dominion of Christ, and the subjection of Christians to him, until day and night come to an end. And, as a pledge of this, that promise is again repeated, "I will cause their captivity to return," and, having brought them back, "I will have mercy on them." Whom this promise refers to, appears, Gal. vi. 16; where all that walk according to the Gospel rule are made to be the Israel of God, on whom peace and mercy shall be.

with verses 14—16, they are altogether wanting in the Septuagint; "yet they are found in the version of Theodotion, as exhibited by Origen, in the Hexaplar Syriac and the Arabic versions, and in the Commentary of Theodoret. They are also printed in the Complutensian edition of the Septuagint." The verses are found not only in the Hebrew, but in the Chaldee, Syriac, Latin, and some Arabic copies; they must therefore be received as genuine. The chief difficulty they involve is one of interpretation. If they refer to Messianic times, how can we understand them of the literal maintenance of Mosaic rites and ceremonies? If literally explained at all, how can it be true that David has never wanted a man to sit on the throne of the house of Judah? As to the former question, it is a fact that the Levitical institutions were abolished at the fall of Jerusalem under Titus. As to the second question, it is a fact that the king reigning when Jeremiah wrote, Zedekiah, was the last lineal descendant of David who occupied the throne. No future restoration of a Jewish throne

CHAPTER XXXIV.

In this chapter we have two messages which God sent by Jeremiah: I. One to foretell the fate of Zedekiah king of Judah, that he should fall into the hands of the king of Babylon, that he should live a captive, but should at last die in peace in his captivity, ver. 1—7. II. Another to read the doom both of prince and people for their treacherous dealing with God, in bringing back their servants into bondage, whom they had released according to the law, and so playing fast and loose with God. They had walked at all adventures with God, ver. 8—11; and therefore God would walk at all adventures with them, in bringing the Chaldean army upon them again, then when they began to hope they were got clear of them, ver. 12—22.

THE word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, when Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and all his army, and all the kingdoms of the earth of his dominion, and all the people, fought against Jerusalem, and against all the cities thereof, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; Go and speak to Zedekiah king of Judah, and tell him, Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire: 3 And thou shalt not escape out of his hand, but shalt surely be taken, and delivered into his hand; and thine eyes shall behold the eyes of the king of Babylon, and he shall speak with thee mouth to mouth, and thou shalt go to Babylon. 4 Yet hear the word of the LORD, O Zedekiah king of Judah; Thus saith the LORD of thee, Thou shalt not die by the sword: 5 But thou shalt die in peace: and with the burnings of thy fathers, the former kings which were before thee, so shall they burn odours for thee; and they will lament thee, saying, Ah lord! for I have pronounced the word, saith the LORD. 6 Then Jeremiah the prophet spake all these words unto Zedekiah king of Judah in Jerusalem, 7 When the king of Babylon's army fought against Jerusalem, and against all the cities of Judah that were left, against Lachish, and against Azekah: for these defenced cities remained of the cities of Judah.

This prophecy concerning Zedekiah was delivered to Jeremiah, and by him to the parties concerned, before he was shut up in the prison; for we find this prediction here made the ground of his commitment, as appears by the recital of some passages out of it, ch. xxxii. 4. Observe,

First. The time when this message was sent to Zedekiah. It was when the king of Babylon, with all his forces, some out of all the kingdoms of the earth that were within his jurisdiction, fought against Jerusalem, and the cities thereof, ver. 1, designing to destroy them, having often plundered them. The cities that now remained, and yet held out, are named, ver. 7, Lachish and Azekah. This intimates that things were now brought to the last extremity, and yet Zedekiah obstinately stood it out, his heart being hardened to his destruction.

Secondly. The message itself that was sent him.

1. Here is a threatening of wrath. He is told that again which he had been often told before, that the city shall be taken by the Chaldeans, and burnt with fire, ver. 2. That he shall himself fall into the enemy's hands, shall be made a prisoner, shall be brought before that furious prince Nebuchadnezzar, and be carried away captive into Babylon, ver. 3; yet Ezekiel prophesied that he should not see Babylon; nor did he, for his eyes were put out, Eze. xii. 13. This Zedekiah brought upon himself from God by his other sins, and from Nebuchadnezzar by his breaking of his faith with him.

2. Here is a mixture of mercy. He shall die a captive, but he shall not die by the sword; he shall die a natural death, ver. 4. He shall end his days with some comfort, shall die in peace, ver. 5. He never had been one of the worst of the kings, but we are willing to hope that what evil he had done in the sight of the Lord he repented of it in his captivity, as Manasseh had done, and it was forgiven to him, and God being reconciled to him he might truly be said to die in peace. A man may die in a prison, and yet die in peace. Nay, he shall end his days with some reputation, more than one would expect, all things considered. He shall be buried with the burnings of his fathers; that is, with the respects usually shewed to their kings, especially those that had done good in Israel. It seems in his captivity he had carried himself so well towards his own people, that they were willing to do him this honour, and towards Nebuchadnezzar, that he suffered it to be done. If Zedekiah had continued in his prosperity, perhaps he would have grown worse, and would have departed at last without being desired; but his afflictions wrought such a change in him that his death was looked upon as a great loss. It is better live and die penitent in a prison, than live and die impenitent in a palace. "They will lament thee, saying, Ah, lord!" an honour which his brother Jehoiakim had not, ch. xxii. 18. "The Jews say, they lamented thus over him, 'Alas, Zedekiah is dead, who drunk the dregs of all the ages that went before him;' that is, who suffered for the sins of his ancestors, the measure of iniquity being filled up in his days. They shall thus lament him, "saith the Lord; for I have pronounced the word;" and what God hath spoken, shall, without fail, be made good.

Thirdly. Jeremiah's faithfulness in delivering this message. Though he knew it would be ungrateful to the king, and might prove, as indeed it did, dangerous to himself, for he was clapped up for it, yet he "spake all these words to Zedekiah," ver. 6. It is a mercy to great men to have those about them that will deal faithfully with them, and tell them the evil consequences of their evil courses, that they may reform and live.

8 This is the word that came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, after that the king Zedekiah had made a covenant with all the people which were at Jerusalem, to proclaim liberty unto them; 9 That every man should let his manservant, and every man his maidservant, being an Hebrew or an Hebrewess, go free; that none should serve himself of them, to wit, of a Jew his brother. 10 Now when all the princes, and all the people, which had entered into the covenant, heard that every one should let his manservant, and every one his maidservant, go free, that none should serve themselves of them any more, then they obeyed, and let them go. 11 But afterward they turned, and caused the servants and the handmaids, whom they had let go free, to return, and brought them into subjection for servants and for handmaids. 12 Therefore the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 13 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; I made a covenant with your fathers in the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondmen, saying, 14 At the end of seven years let ye go every man his brother an Hebrew, which hath been sold unto thee; and when he hath served thee six years, thou shalt let him go free from thee: but your fathers hearkened not unto me, neither inclined their ear. 15 And ye were now turned, and had done right in my sight, in proclaiming liberty every man to his neighbour; and ye had made a covenant before me in the house which is called by my name: 16 But ye turned and polluted my name, and caused every man his servant, and every man his handmaid, whom he had set at liberty at their pleasure, to return, and brought them into subjection, to be unto you for servants and for handmaids. 17 Therefore thus saith the LORD; Ye have not hearkened unto me, in proclaiming liberty, every one to his brother, and every man to his neighbour: behold, I proclaim a liberty for you, saith the LORD, to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine; and I will make you to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth. 18 And I will give the men that have transgressed my covenant, which have not performed the words of the covenant which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof. 19 The princes of Judah, and the princes of Jerusalem, the eunuchs, and the priests, and all the people of the land, which passed between the parts of the calf; 20 I will even give them into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of them that seek their life: and their dead bodies shall be for meat unto the fowls of the heaven, and ritual would remove the difficulties, because the tribes have intermarried, and their genealogies are utterly lost. Besides, the real restoration of the Levitical system would be a return to types and shadows after their necessity was gone for ever through the advent of the Messiah. To the Christian, at least, only one way seems open, and it is that of regarding the entire imagery as symbolical of Christ and the Gospel. This principle renders the passage clear and consistent.

xxxiii. 24. Not unnaturally some have held that the "two families" spoken of here are "the seed of David" and "the Levites," concerning whom the foregoing promise chiefly treats. Others, however, are of opinion that the two families so called are the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. This view is on the whole preferable, because of the final words of the chapter, which include of necessity the whole of the Hebrew nation.

xxxiv. 5. The burnings meant here were those of fragrant per-and to the beasts of the earth. 21 And Zedekiah king of Judah and his princes will I give into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of them that seek their life, and into the hand of the king of Babylon's army, which are gone up from you. 22 Behold, I will command, saith the LORD, and cause them to return to this city; and they shall fight against it, and take it, and burn it with fire: and I will make the cities of Judah a desolation without an inhabitant.

We have here another prophecy upon a particular occasion, the history of which we must take notice of, as necessary to give light to the prophecy.

First. When Jerusalem was closely besieged by the Chaldean army, the princes and people agreed upon a reformation in one instance, and that was concerning their servants.

1. The law of God was very express, that those of their own nation should not be held in servitude above seven years, but after they had served one apprenticeship they should be discharged, and have their liberty; yea, though they had sold themselves into servitude for the payment of their debts, or though they were sold by the judges for the punishment of their crimes. This difference was put between their brethren and strangers, that those of other nations taken in war, or bought with money, might be held in perpetual slavery, they and theirs; but their brethren must serve but for seven years at the longest. This God calls the covenant that he had made with them when he brought them out of the land of Egypt, ver. 12, 14. This was the first of the judicial laws which God gave them, Ex. xxi. 2, and there was good reason for that law. 1st. God had put honour upon that nation, and he would have them thus to preserve the honour of it themselves, and to put a difference between it and other nations. 2nd. God had brought them out of slavery in Egypt, and he would have them thus to express their grateful sense of that favour by letting those go to whom their houses were houses of bondage, as Egypt had been to their forefathers. That deliverance is therefore mentioned here, ver. 13, as the ground of that law. Note, God's compassions towards us should engage our compassions towards our brethren; we must release as we are released, forgive as we are forgiven, and relieve as we are relieved. And this is called a covenant; for our performance of the duty required is the condition of the continuance of the favours God hath bestowed.

2. This law they and their fathers had broken. Their worldly profit swayed more with them than God's command or covenant. When their servants had lived seven years with them, they understood their business, and how to apply themselves to it better than they did when they first came to them, and therefore they would then by no means part with them, though God himself by his law had made them free. "Your fathers hearkened not to me" in this matter, ver. 14; so that "from the days of their fathers" they had been "in this trespass;" and they thought they might do it because their fathers did it, and their servants had by disuse lost the benefit of the provision God made for them; whereas, against an express law, especially against an express law of God, no custom, usage, or prescription, is to be admitted in plea. For this sin of theirs and their fathers God now brought them into servitude, and justly.

3. When they were besieged, and closely shut in by the army of the Chaldeans, they, being told of their fault in this matter, presently reformed, and let go all their servants that were entitled to their freedom by the law of God; as Pharaoh, who, when the plague was upon him, consented to let the people go, and bound themselves in a covenant to do so. 1st. The prophets faithfully admonished them concerning their sin. From them they heard that they should let their Hebrew servants go free, ver. 2. They might have read it themselves in the book of the law, but did not, or did not heed it; therefore the prophets told them what the law was. See what need there is of the preaching of the word. People must hear the word preached, because they will not make the use they ought to make of the word written. 2nd. All orders and degrees of men concurred in this reformation. The king, and the princes, and all the people agree to let go their servants, whatever loss or damage they might sustain by so doing. When the king and princes led in this good work, the people could not for shame but follow. The example and influence of great men would go very far towards the extirpating of the most inveterate corruption. 3rd. They bound themselves by a solemn oath and covenant that they would do this, whereby they engaged themselves to God and one another. Note, What God hath bound us to by his precept it is good for us to bind ourselves to by our promise. This covenant was very solemn; it was made in a sacred place, "made before me, in the house which is called by my name," ver. 15, in the special presence of God; the tokens of which in the temple ought to strike an awe upon them, and make them very sincere in their appeals to him. It was ratified by a significant sign; they "cut a calf in two, and passed between the parts thereof," ver. 18, 19, with this dreadful imprecation, Let us be in like manner cut in sunder if we do not perform what we now promise. And this calf was probably offered up in sacrifice to God, who was thereby made a party to the covenant. When God covenanted with Abram, for the ratification of it, a smoking furnace and a burning lamp passed between the pieces of the sacrifice, in allusion to this federal rite, Gen. xv. 17. Note, That we may effectually oblige ourselves to our duty, it is good to frighten ourselves with the apprehensions of the terror of that wrath and curse to which we expose ourselves if we live in the contempt of it, that wrath which will cut sinners asunder, Mat. xxiv. 15; and sensible signs may be of use to make the impressions of it deep and durable, as here. 4th. They conformed themselves herein to the command of God, and their covenant with him; they did let their servants go, though at this time, when the city was besieged, they could very ill spare them. Thus they did right in God's sight, ver. 15. Though it was their trouble that drove them to it, yet he was well pleased with it; and if they had persevered in this act of mercy to the poor, to their poor servants, it might have been a lengthening of their tranquillity, Dan. iv. 27.

Secondly. When there was some hope that the siege was raised and the danger over, they repented of their repentance, undid the good they had done, and forced the servants they had released into their respective services again. 1. The king of Babylon's army was now gone up from them, ver. 21. Pharaoh was bringing an army of Egyptians to oppose the progress of the king of Babylon's victories; upon the tidings of which the Chaldeans raised the siege for a time, as we find, ch. xxxvii. 5, "they departed from Jerusalem." See how ready God was to put a stop to his judgments upon the first instance of reformation; so slow is he to anger, and so swift to shew mercy. As soon as ever they let their servants go free, God let them go free. 2. When they began to think themselves safe from the besiegers, they made their servants come back into subjection to them, ver. 11; and again ver. 16. This was a great abuse to their servants, to whom servitude would be more irksome after they had had some taste of the pleasures of liberty. It was a great shame to themselves that they could not keep in a good mind when they were in it. But it was especially an affront to God; in doing this they polluted his name, ver. 16. It was a contempt of the command he had given them, as if that were of no force at all, but they might either keep it or break it as they thought fit. It was a contempt of the covenant they had made with him, and of that wrath which they imprecated upon themselves, in case they should break that covenant. It was jesting with God Almighty, as if he could be imposed upon by fallacious promises; which, when they had gained their point, they would look upon themselves no longer obliged by. It was lying to God with their mouths, and flattering him with their tongues. It was likewise a contempt of the judgments of God, and setting them at defiance; as if when once the course of them was stopped a little, and interrupted, they would never proceed again, and the judgment would never be revived. Whereas reprieves are so far from being pardons, that if they be abused thus, and sinners take encouragement from them to return to sin, they are but preparatives for heavier strokes of Divine vengeance.

Thirdly. For this treacherous dealing with God they are here severely threatened. "Be not deceived, God is not mocked." Those that think to put a cheat upon God by a dissembling repentance, a fallacious covenant, and a partial temporary reformation, will prove in the end to put the greatest cheat upon their own souls; for "the Lord, whose name is jealous, is a jealous God." It is here threatened, with an observable air of displeasure against them, 1. That, since they had not given liberty to their servants to go where they pleased, God would give all his judgments liberty to take their course against them without control; ver. 17, "You have not proclaimed liberty to your servants." Though they had done it, ver. 10, yet they might truly be said not to have done it, because they did not stand to it, but undid it again; and factum non dicitur quod non perseverat,—'that is not said to be done which does not last.' The righteousness that is forsaken and turned away from shall be forgotten, and not mentioned, no more than if it had never been, Eze. xviii. 14. Therefore "I will proclaim a liberty for you;" that is, I will discharge you from my service, and put you out of my protection, which those forfeit that withdraw from their allegiance. You shall have liberty to choose which of these judgments you will be cut off by, sword, famine, or pestilence; such a liberty as was offered to David, which put him into a great strait, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. Note, Those that will not be in subjection to the law of God put themselves into subjection to the wrath and curse of God. But this shews what liberty to sin really is; it is but a liberty to the sorest judgments. 2. That, since they had brought their servants back into confinement in their houses, God would "make them to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth," where they should live in servitude, and, being strangers, could not expect the privileges of freeborn subjects. 3. That, since they had broken the covenant which they ratified by a solemn imprecation, God would bring on them the evil which they imprecated upon themselves in case they should break it. Out of their own mouth will he judge them, and so shall their doom be; the penalty of their bond shall be recovered, because they have not performed the condition; for so some read ver. 18, "I will make the men which have transgressed my covenant as the calf which they cut in twain;" I will divide them in sunder as they divided it in sunder. 4. That, since they would not let go their servants out of their hands, God would deliver them into the hands of those that hated them. Even the princes and nobles, both of Judah and Jerusalem, of the country and of the city; the eunuchs, chamberlains, or great officers of the court, the priests, and all the people, they had all dealt treacherously with God, and therefore shall all be involved in the common ruin without exception, ver. 19. They shall all be given into the hand of their enemies, that seek, not their wealth only, or their service, but their life. And they shall have what they seek; but neither shall that content them. When they have their lives, they shall leave their dead bodies unburied, a loathsome spectacle to all mankind, and an easy prey to the fowls and beasts, a lasting mark of ignominy being hereby fastened on them. 5. That, since they had emboldened themselves in returning to their sin, contrary to their covenant, by the retreat of the Chaldean army from them, God would therefore bring it upon them again. They are now gone up from you, and your fright is over for the present; but I will command them to face about, as they were; they shall return to this city, and take it, and burn it. Note, 1st. As confidence in God is a hopeful presage of approaching deliverance, so security in sin is a sad omen of approaching destruction. 2nd. When judgments are removed from a people before they have done their work, leave them, but leave them unhumbled and unreformed, it is cum animo revertendi,—'with a design to return;' they do but retreat to come on again with so much the greater force; for when God judgeth he will overcome. 3rd. It is just with God to disappoint those expectations of mercy which his providence had given cause for, when we disappoint those expectations of duty which our professions, pretensions, and fair promises had given cause for. If we repent of the good we had purposed, God will repent of the good he had purposed. "With the froward thou wilt shew thyself froward."

CHAPTER XXXV.

A variety of methods is tried, and every stone turned, to awaken the Jews to a sense of their sin, and to bring them to repentance and reformation. The scope and tendency of many of the prophet's sermons was to frighten them out of their disobedience, by setting before them what would be the end thereof, if they persisted in it. The scope of this sermon in this chapter is to shame them out of their disobedience, if they had any sense of honour left in them, for a discourse of this nature to fasten upon. I. He sets before them the obedience of the family of the Rechabites to the commands which were left them by Jonadab their ancestor, and how they persevered in that obedience, and would not be tempted from it, ver. 1—11. II. With this he aggravates the disobedience of the Jews to God, and their contempt of his precepts, ver. 12—15. III. He foretells the judgments of God upon the Jews for their impious disobedience to God, ver. 16, 17. IV. He assures the Rechabites of the blessing of God upon them, for their pious obedience to their father, ver. 18, 19.

THE word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD in the days of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, saying, 2 Go unto the house of the Rechabites, and speak unto them, and bring them into the house of the LORD, into one of the chambers, and give them wine to drink. 3 Then I took Jaazaniah the son of Jeremiah, the son of fumes which it was usual to burn at the funerals of the great. Thus of Asa we read not only that they "laid him in the bed which was filled with sweet odours and divers kinds of spices prepared by the apothecaries' art," but also that "they made a very great burning for him" That this was a custom appears from the case of Jehoram, of whom we read that "his people made no burning for him, like the burning of his fathers" (2 Chron. xxi. 19). It is the opinion of some that the dead body was burned along with the odours, and for this Amos vi. 10 is much relied on. We shall refer to this point when we reach the text in question.

xxxiv. 7. The references to Lachish and Azekah, as defenced or fortified places which had held out against Nebuchadnezzar, are curious. The position of Azekah was south-west of Jerusalem, but its exact locality is uncertain. Lachish, first a royal city of Canaan, then a Levitical city, and afterwards for a time independent, seems to have been north-east of Gaza. It had formerly been besieged Habaziniah, and his brethren, and all his sons, and the whole house of the Rechabites; 4 And I brought them into the house of the LORD, into the chamber of the sons of Hanan, the son of Igdaliah, a man of God, which was by the chamber of the princes, which was above the chamber of Maaseiah the son of Shallum, the keeper of the door: 5 And I set before the sons of the house of the Rechabites pots full of wine, and cups, and I said unto them,

WINE VESSELS, STRAINERS, ETC.

Drink ye wine. 6 But they said, We will drink no wine: for Jonadab the son of Rechab our father commanded us, saying, Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye, nor your sons for ever: 7 Neither shall ye build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any: but all your days ye shall dwell in tents; that ye may live many days in the land where ye be strangers. 8 Thus have we obeyed the voice of Jonadab the son of Rechab our father in all that he hath charged us, to drink no wine all our days, we, our wives, our sons, nor our daughters; 9 Nor to build houses for us to dwell in: neither have we vineyard, nor field, nor seed: 10 But we have dwelt in tents, and have obeyed, and done according to all that Jonadab our father commanded us. 11 But it came to pass, when Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon came up into the land, that we said, Come, and let us go to Jerusalem for fear of the army of the Chaldeans, and for fear of the army of the Syrians: so we dwell at Jerusalem.

This chapter is of an earlier date than many of those before; for what is contained in it was said and done in the days of Jehoiakim, ver. 1, but then it must be in the latter part of his reign, for it was after the king of Babylon with his army came up into the land, ver. 11, which seems to refer to the invasion mentioned, 2 Kin. xxiv. 2, which was upon occasion of Jehoiakim's rebelling against Nebuchadnezzar. After the judgments of God had broken in upon this rebellious people, he continued to deal with them by his prophets, to turn them from sin, that his wrath might turn away from them. He endeavours it by the example of the Rechabites, a family that kept distinct by themselves, and were no more numbered with the families of Israel, than they with the nations. They were originally Kenites, as appears, 1 Chr. ii. 55, "These are the Kenites, that came of Hemath, the father of the house of Rechab." The Kenites, at least those of them that gained a settlement in the land of Israel, were of the posterity of Hobab, Moses' father-in-law, Jud. i. 16. We find them separated from the Amalekites, 1 Sam. xv. 6: see Jud. iv. 17. One family of these Kenites had their denomination from Rechab; his son, or a lineal descendant from him, was Jonadab, a man famous in his time for wisdom and piety; he flourished in the days of Jehu, king of Israel, near three hundred years before this; for there we find him courted by that rising prince, when he affected to appear zealous for God, 2 Kin. x. 15, 16, which he thought nothing more likely to confirm people in the opinion of than to have so good a man as Jonadab ride in the chariot with him. Now here we are told,

First. What the rules of living were which Jonadab, probably by his last will and testament in writing, and duly executed, charged his children and his posterity after him, throughout all generations, religiously to observe; and we have reason to think they were such as he himself had all his days observed. 1. He forbade them to drink wine, according to the law of the Nazarites. Wine is indeed given to make glad the heart of man, and we are allowed the sober and moderate use of it; but we are so apt to abuse it, and get hurt by it, and a good man that has his heart made continually glad with the light of God's countenance, hath so little need of it for that purpose, (Ps. iv. 6, 7,) that it is a commendable piece of self-denial, either not to use it at all, or very sparingly and medicinally, as Timothy used it, 1 Tim. v. 23. 2. He appointed them to dwell in tents, and not to build houses, or purchase lands, or rent or occupy either, ver. 7. This was an instance of strictness and mortification beyond what the Nazarites were obliged to. Tents were mean dwellings, so that this would teach them to be humble; they were cold dwellings, so that this would teach them to be hardy, and not to indulge the body; they were movable dwellings, so that this would teach them not to think of settling or taking root anywhere in this world. They must dwell in tents all their days, not for a few days, as Israel at the feast of tabernacles; not only in summer days, as soldiers and shepherds, but all their days; they must from the beginning thus accustom themselves to endure hardness, and then it would be no difficulty to them, no, not under the decays of old age.

Now why did Jonadab prescribe these rules of living to his posterity? It was not merely to shew his authority, and to exercise a dominion over them, by imposing upon them what he thought fit; but it was to shew his wisdom, and the real concern he had for their welfare, by recommending to them what he knew would be beneficial to them; yet not tying them by any oath or vow, or under any penalty, to observe these rules, but only advising them to conform to this discipline, as far as they found it for edification, yet to be dispensed with in any case of necessity, as here, ver. 11. He prescribed these rules to them, 1. That they might preserve the ancient character of their family, which, however looked upon by some with contempt, he thought its real reputation. His ancestors had addicted themselves to a pastoral life, Ex. ii. 16, and he would have his posterity keep to it, and not degenerate from it, as Israel had done, who originally were shepherds, and dwelt in tents, Gen. xlvi. 34. Note, We ought not to be ashamed of the honest employments of our ancestors, though they were but mean. 2. That they might comport with their lot, and bring their mind to their condition. Moses had put them in hopes that they should be naturalized, Num. x. 32, but it seems they were not. They were still strangers in the land, ver. 7, had no inheritance in it, and therefore must live by their employments, which was a good reason why they should accustom themselves to hard fare and hard lodging; for strangers such as they were must not expect to live as the landed men, so plentifully and delicately. Note, It is our wisdom and duty to accommodate ourselves to our place and rank, and not aim to live above it. What has been the lot of our fathers why may we not be content that it should be our lot, and live according to it? "Mind not high things." 3. That they might not be envied and disturbed by their neighbours among whom they lived. If they that were strangers should live great, raise estates, and fare sumptuously, the natives would grudge them their abundance, and have a jealous eye upon them, as the Philistines had upon Isaac, Gen. xxvi. 14, and would seek occasions to quarrel with them, and do them a mischief. Therefore he thought it would be their prudence to keep low, for that would be the way to continue long; to live meanly, that they might "live many days in the land where they were strangers." Note, Humility and contentment in obscurity is oftentimes the best policy, and men's surest protection. 4. That they might be armed against temptations to luxury and sensuality, the prevailing sin of the age and place they lived in. Jonadab saw a general corruption of manners; the drunkards of Ephraim abounded, and he was afraid lest his children should be debauched and ruined by them, and therefore obliged them to live by themselves, retired in the country; and, that they might not run into any unlawful pleasures, to deny themselves the use even of lawful delights. They must be very sober, and temperate, and abstemious, which would contribute to the health both of mind and body, and to their living many days, and easy ones, and such as they might reflect upon with comfort in the land where they were strangers. Note, The consideration of this, that we are strangers and pilgrims, should oblige us to abstain from all fleshly lusts, to live above the things of sense, and look upon them with a generous and gracious contempt. 5. That they might be prepared for times of trouble and calamity. Jonadab might, without a spirit of prophecy, foresee the destruction of a people so wretchedly degenerated; and he would have his family provide, that if they could not in the peace thereof, yet even in the midst of the troubles thereof, they might have peace. Let them therefore have little to lose, and then losing times would be less dreadful to them; let them sit loose to what they had, and then they might the easier be stripped of it. Note, Those are in the best frame to meet sufferings that are mortified to the world, and live a life of self-denial. 6. That in general they might learn to live by rule, and under discipline. It is good for us all to do so, and teach our children to do so. Those that have lived long, as it is likely Jonadab had done, when he left this charge to his posterity, can speak by experience of the vanity of the world, and the dangerous snares that are in the abundance of its wealth and pleasures, and therefore ought to be regarded, when they warn those that come after them to stand upon their guard.

Secondly. We are here told how strictly his posterity observed these rules, ver. 8—10. They had in their respective generations all of them "obeyed the voice of Jonadab" their father, had done "according to all that he had commanded them." They drank no wine, though they dwelt in a country where there was plenty of it; their wives and children drank no wine, for they that are temperate themselves should take care that all under their charge should be so too. They built no houses, tilled no ground, but lived upon the product by Sennacherib, who mentions it in one of his inscriptions. Its final overthrow probably happened soon after Jeremiah wrote.

xxxiv. 18, 19. It is said to have been usual, when solemn covenants were made, for an animal to be slain and divided, after which the contracting parties passed between the severed portions, to intimate their willingness to be similarly divided if they proved false to their contract. This custom was not confined to the Hebrews, but was followed by several other nations, as ancient writers show.

xxxiv. 21. The language here clearly indicates a withdrawal of the Babylonians, who had probably massed their forces in the south, to resist the approach of the Egyptians. That the Egyptians did undertake an expedition appears from chap. xxxvii. 7.

xxxv. 1. Blayney observes that all the prophecies between chap. xxvi. and this come after it in the order of time.

xxxv. 2. The Rechabites were not Israelites, but, as Dr. Henderson says, "were a tribe of Arabs, of the family of Jethro, Moses' father-of their cattle. This they did partly in obedience to their ancestor, and out of a veneration they had for his name and authority, and partly from the experience they themselves had of the benefit of living such a mortified life. See the force of tradition, and the influence that antiquity, example, and great names, have upon men; and how that which seems very difficult will, by long usage and custom, become easy, and in a manner natural.

Now, 1. As to one of the particulars he had given them in charge, we are here told how in a case of necessity they dispensed with the violation of it; ver. 11, "When the king of Babylon came into the land," with his army, though they had hitherto dwelt in tents, they now quitted their tents, and came and dwelt in Jerusalem, and in such houses as they could furnish themselves with there. Note, The rules of a strict discipline must not be made too strict, but so as to admit of a dispensation when the necessity of the case calls for it; which therefore, in making vows of that nature, it is wisdom to provide expressly for, that the way may be made the more clear, and we may not afterwards be forced to say, It was an error, Eccl. v. 6; and commands of that nature are to be understood with such limitations. These Rechabites had tempted God, and not trusted him, if they had not used proper means for their own safety in a time of common calamity, notwithstanding the law and custom of their family. 2. As to the other particular, we are here told how, notwithstanding the greatest urgency, they religiously adhered to it. Jeremiah took them into the temple, ver. 2, into a prophet's chamber there, rather than into the chamber of the princes, that joined to it, because he had a message from God, which would look more like itself when it was delivered in the chambers of a man of God. There he not only asked the Rechabites, Would they drink any wine, but he set pots full of wine before them, and cups to drink out of; made the temptation as strong as possible, and said, "Drink ye wine," you shall have it on free cost; you have broken one of the rules of your order, in coming to live at Jerusalem, why may you not break this too, and when you are in the city, do as they there do? But they peremptorily refused; they all agreed in the refusal: No, "we will drink no wine," for with us it is against the law. The prophet knew very well they would deny it, and when they did urged it no farther, for he saw that they were stedfastly resolved. Note, Those temptations are of no force with men of confirmed sobriety which yet daily overcome such as, notwithstanding their convictions, are of no resolution in the paths of virtue.

12 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying, 13 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Go and tell the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, Will ye not receive instruction to hearken to my words? saith the LORD. 14 The words of Jonadab the son of Rechab, that he commanded his sons not to drink wine, are performed; for unto this day they drink none, but obey their father's commandment: notwithstanding I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking; but ye hearkened not unto me. 15 I have sent also unto you all my servants the prophets, rising up early and sending them, saying, Return ye now every man from his evil way, and amend your doings, and go not after other gods to serve them, and ye shall dwell in the land which I have given to you and to your fathers: but ye have not inclined your ear, nor hearkened unto me. 16 Because the sons of Jonadab the son of Rechab have performed the commandment of their father, which he commanded them; but this people hath not hearkened unto me: 17 Therefore thus saith the LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring upon Judah and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem all the evil that I have pronounced against them: because I have spoken unto them, but they have not heard; and I have called unto them, but they have not answered. 18 And Jeremiah said unto the house of the Rechabites, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, and kept all his precepts, and done according unto all that he hath commanded you: 19 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man to stand before me for ever.

The trial of the Rechabites' constancy was intended but for a sign. Now here we have the application of it.

First. The Rechabites' observance of their father's charge to them is made use of as an aggravation of the disobedience of the Jews to God. Let them see it, and be ashamed. The prophet asks them in God's name, Will ye not at length receive instruction? ver. 13. Will nothing affect you? Will nothing fasten upon you? Will nothing prevail to discover sin and duty to you? You see how obedient the Rechabites are to their father's commandment; ver. 14, but "you have not inclined your ear to me," ver. 15, though one might much more reasonably expect that the people of God should have obeyed him, than that the sons of Jonadab should have obeyed him; and the aggravation is very high; for, 1. The Rechabites were obedient to one that was but a man like themselves, that had but the wisdom and power of a man, and was only the father of their flesh; but the Jews were disobedient to an infinite and eternal God, that had an absolute authority over them as the Father of their spirits. 2. Jonadab was long since dead, and was ignorant of them, and could neither take cognizance of their disobedience to his orders nor give correction for it. But God lives for ever, to see how his laws are observed, and is in a readiness to revenge all disobedience. 3. The Rechabites were never put in mind of their obligations to their father; but God often sent his prophets to his people, to put them in mind of their duty to him, and yet they would not do it. This is insisted on here as a great aggravation of their disobedience; "I have myself spoken to you, rising early, and speaking," by the written word, and the dictates and admonitions of conscience, ver. 14. Nay, "I have sent unto you all my servants the prophets," men like yourselves, whose terrors shall not make you afraid, rising up early, and sending them, ver. 15, and yet all in vain. 4. Jonadab never did that for his seed that God had done for this people. He left them a charge, but left them no estate to bear the charge; but God had given his people a good land, and promised them, if they would be obedient, they should still dwell in it. So that they were bound both in gratitude and interest to be obedient, and yet they would not hear, they would not hearken. 5. God did not tie up his people to so much hardship, and to such instances of mortification as Jonadab obliged his seed to; and yet Jonadab's orders were obeyed, and God's were not.

Secondly. Judgments are threatened, as often before, against Judah and Jerusalem, for their disobedience thus aggravated. The Rechabites shall rise up in judgment against them, and shall condemn them, for they very punctually "performed the commandment of their father," and continued and persevered in their obedience to it, ver. 16; but "this people," this rebellious and gainsaying people, "has not hearkened to me;" and therefore, ver. 17, because they have not obeyed the precepts of the word, God will perform the threatenings of it: "I will bring upon them," by the Chaldean army, "all the evil pronounced against them," both in the law and the prophets; for "I have spoken to them, I have called to them;" spoken in a still small voice to them that were near, and called aloud to them that were at a distance; tried all ways and means to convince and reduce them, spoke by his word, called by his providence, both to the same purpose, and yet all to no purpose; they have not heard nor answered.

Thirdly. Mercy is here promised to the family of the Rechabites, for their steady and unanimous adherence to the laws of their house. Though it was only for the shaming of Israel that their constancy was tried, yet, being unshaken, it was found unto praise, and honour, and glory. And God takes occasion from it to tell them that he had favours in reserve for them, ver. 18, 19, and they should have the comfort of them. It is promised, 1. That the family shall continue as long as any of the families of Israel, among whom they were strangers and sojourners. It shall never want a man to inherit what they had, though they had no inheritance to leave them. Note, Sometimes those that have the smallest estates have the most numerous progeny; but he that sends mouths will be sure to send meat. 2. That religion shall continue in the family; "He shall not want a man to stand before me" to serve me. Though they are neither priests nor Levites, nor appear to have had any post in the temple service, yet, in a constant course of regular devotion, they stand before God to minister to him. Note, 1st. The greatest blessing that can be entailed upon a family is, to have the worship of God kept up in it, from generation to generation. 2nd. Temperance, and self-denial, and mortification to the world, do very much befriend the exercises of piety, and help to transmit the observance of them to posterity. The more dead we are to the delights of sense, the better disposed we are for the service of God; but nothing is more fatal to the entail of religion in a family than pride and luxury.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Here is another expedient tried to work upon this heedless and untoward people, but it is tried in vain. A roll of a book is provided, containing an abstract or abridgment of all the sermons that Jeremiah had preached to them, that they might be put in mind of what they had heard, and might the better understand it, when they had it all before them at one view. Now here we have, I. The writing of the roll by Baruch, as Jeremiah dictated it, ver. 1—4. II. The reading of the roll by Baruch to all the people publicly on a fast day, ver. 5—10; afterwards by Baruch to the princes privately, ver. 11—19; and lastly, by Jehudi to the king, ver. 20, 21. III. The burning of the roll by the king, with orders to prosecute Jeremiah and Baruch, ver. 22—26. IV. The writing of another roll, with large additions, particularly of Jehoiakim's doom for burning the former, ver. 27—32.

AND it came to pass in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, that this word came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, 2 Take thee a roll of a book, and write therein all the words that I have spoken unto thee against Israel, and against Judah, and against all the nations, from the day I spake unto thee, from the days of Josiah, even unto this day. 3 It may be that the house of Judah will hear all the evil which I purpose to do unto them; that they may return every man from his evil way; that I may forgive their iniquity and their sin. 4 Then Jeremiah called Baruch the son of Neriah: and Baruch wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah all the words of the LORD, which he had in-law, who came into Palestine at the same time with the Israelites, but, in order to maintain their independence, occupied no fixed settlements, but led a nomadic life, and were thus able without difficulty to remove on any attempt being made to subdue them (Judg. i. 16; 1 Sam. xv. 6). Though not incorporated with the Hebrews, Jahn thinks they were proselytes of the gate. They adhered with the most rigorous strictness to the charge of Jonadab, the son of their founder, not to drink wine, and, that they might not be tempted to do so, not to plant any vineyards, nor to have houses and fields. According to Diodorus Siculus (xix. 94), the Nabatheans had the same custom; "It is a law with them neither to sow corn, nor to plant, nor to use wine, nor to prepare a dwelling," to observe which they pledged themselves under pain of death. The Rechabites seem to have taken refuge in the city during the siege.

xxxv. 5. Hereupon Scott remarks that "it was doubtless well known that they had rules of conduct peculiar to themselves; but spoken unto him, upon a roll of a book. 5 And Jeremiah commanded Baruch, saying, I am shut up; I cannot go into the house of the LORD: 6 Therefore go thou, and read in the roll, which thou hast written from my mouth, the words of the LORD in the ears of the people in the LORD's house upon the fasting day: and also thou shalt read them in the ears of all Judah that come out of their cities. 7 It may be they will present their supplication before the LORD, and will return every one from his evil way: for great is the anger and the fury that the LORD hath pronounced against this people. 8 And Baruch the son of Neriah did according to all that Jeremiah the prophet commanded him, reading in the book the words of the LORD in the LORD's house.

In the beginning of Ezekiel's prophecy we meet with a roll written in vision, for discovery of the things therein contained to the prophet himself, who was to receive and digest them, Eze. ii. 10, and iii. 1. Here in the latter end of Jeremiah's prophecy we meet with a roll, written, in fact, for discovery of the things contained therein to the people, who were to hear and give heed to them, for the written word and other good books are of great use both to ministers and people. We have here,

First. The command which God gave to Jeremiah to write a summary of his sermons, of all the reproofs and all the warnings he had given in God's name to his people, ever since he first began to be a preacher, in the thirteenth year of Josiah to this day, which was in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, ver. 2, 3. What had been spoken only must now be written, that it might be reviewed, and that it might spread the farther and last the longer. What had been spoken at large, with frequent repetitions of the same things, perhaps in the same words, which has its advantage one way, must now be contracted and put into less compass, that the several parts of it might be better compared together, which has its advantage another way. What they had heard once must be recapitulated and rehearsed to them again; that what was forgotten might be called to mind again, and what made no impression upon them at the first hearing might take hold of them when they heard it the second time. And what was perhaps already written and published in single sermons must be collected into one volume, that none might be lost. Note, The writing of the Scripture is by Divine appointment. And observe, The reason here given for the writing of this roll; ver. 3, "It may be the house of Judah will hear." Not that the Divine prescience was at any uncertainty concerning the event, with that there is no peradventure, (God knew certainly that they would deal very treacherously, Isa. xlviii. 8,) but the Divine wisdom directed to this as a proper means for attaining the desired end, which, if it did not, they would be the more inexcusable. And though God foresaw they would not hear, he did not tell the prophet so, but prescribes this method to him as a probable one, to be used in hopes they will hear; will hear, that is, will heed and regard what they hear, will take notice of it and mix faith with it, for otherwise our hearing of the word, though an angel from heaven were to read or preach it to us, would stand us in no stead. Now observe here, 1. What it is hoped they will thus hear; "All that evil which I purpose to do unto them." Note, The serious consideration of the certain fatal consequences of sin will be of great use to us to bring us to God. 2. What it is hoped will be produced thereby; "They will hear, that they may return every man from his evil way." Note, The conversion of sinners from their sinful courses is that which ministers should aim at in preaching; and people hear the word in vain if that point be not gained with them. To what purpose do we hear of the evil God will bring upon us for sin if we continue notwithstanding to do evil against him? 3. Of what vast advantage their consideration and conversion will be to them; "That I may forgive their iniquity." This plainly implies the honour of God's justice, with which it is not consistent that he should forgive the sin unless the sinner repent of it, and turn from it; but it plainly expresseth the honour of his mercy, that he is very ready to forgive sin, and only waits till the sinner be qualified to receive forgiveness, and therefore useth various means to bring us to repentance, that he may forgive.

Secondly. The instructions which Jeremiah gave to Baruch his scribe, pursuant to this command he had received from God, and the writing of the roll accordingly, ver. 4. God bade Jeremiah write, but it should seem he had not the pen of a ready writer: he could not write fast, or not fair, so as Baruch could, and therefore he made use of him as his amanuensis. St. Paul wrote few of his epistles with his own hand, Gal. vi. 11; Rom. xvi. 22. God dispenseth his gifts variously; some have a good faculty at speaking, others at writing, and neither can say to the other, We have no need of you, 1 Cor. xii. 21. The Spirit of God dictated to Jeremiah, and he to Baruch, who had been employed by Jeremiah as trustee for him in his purchase of the field, ch. xxxii. 12, and now was advanced to be his scribe and substitute in his prophetical office; and, if we may credit the apocryphal book that bears his name, he was afterwards himself a prophet to the captives in Babylon. Those that begin low are likely to rise high; and it is good for those that are designed for prophets to have their education under prophets, and be serviceable to them. Baruch wrote what Jeremiah dictated in a roll of a book, on pieces of parchment or vellum, which were joined together, the top of one to the bottom of the other, so making one long scroll, which was rolled perhaps upon a staff.

Thirdly. The orders which Jeremiah gave to Baruch, to read what he had written to the people. Jeremiah, it seems, was shut up, and could not go to the house of the Lord himself, ver. 5. Though he was not a close prisoner, for then there had been no occasion to send officers to seize him, ver. 36, yet he was forbidden by the king to appear in the temple, was shut out thence, where he might be serving God and doing good, which was as bad to him as if he had been shut up in a dungeon. Jehoiakim was ripening apace for ruin when he thus silenced God's faithful messengers. But when Jeremiah could not go to the temple himself, he sent one that was deputed by him to read to the people what he would himself have said. Thus St. Paul wrote epistles to the churches which he could not visit in person; nay, it was what he himself had often said to them. Note, The writing and repeating of the sermons that have been preached may contribute very much towards the answering of the great ends of preaching. What we have heard and known it is good for us to hear again, that we may know it better. To preach and write the same thing is safe and profitable, and many times very necessary, Phil. iii. 1; and we must be glad to hear a good word from God, though we have it as here at second hand. Both ministers and people must do what they can when they cannot do what they would. Observe, When God ordered the reading of the roll he said, "It may be they will hear, and return from their evil ways," ver. 3. When Jeremiah orders it he saith, "It may be they will pray," (they will "present their supplication before the Lord,") "and will return from their evil way." Note, Prayer to God for grace to turn us is necessary in order to our turning; and those that are convinced by the word of God of the necessity of returning to him will present their supplications to him for that grace; and the consideration of this, that "great is the anger which God has pronounced against us" for sin, should quicken both our prayers and our endeavours. Now according to these orders Baruch did read "out of the book the words of the Lord," whenever there was a holy convocation, ver. 8.

9 And it came to pass in the fifth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, in the ninth month, that they proclaimed a fast before the LORD to all the people in Jerusalem, and to all the people that came from the cities of Judah unto Jerusalem. 10 Then read Baruch in the book the words of Jeremiah in the house of the LORD, in the chamber of Gemariah the son of Shaphan the scribe, in the higher court, at the entry of the new gate of the LORD's house, in the ears of all the people. 11 When Michaiah the son of Gemariah, the son of Shaphan, had heard out of the book all the words of the LORD, 12 Then he went down into the king's house, into the scribe's chamber: and, lo, all the princes sat there, even Elishama the scribe, and Delaiah the son of Shemaiah, and Elnathan the son of Achbor, and Gemariah the son of Shaphan, and Zedekiah the son of Hananiah, and all the princes. 13 Then Michaiah declared unto them all the words that he had heard, when Baruch read the book in the ears of the people. 14 Therefore all the princes sent Jehudi the son of Nethaniah, the son of Shelemiah, the son of Cushi, unto Baruch, saying, Take in thine hand the roll wherein thou hast read in the ears of the people, and come. So Baruch the son of Neriah took the roll in his hand, and came unto them. 15 And they said unto him, Sit down now, and read it in our ears. So Baruch read it in their ears. 16 Now it came to pass, when they had heard all the words, they were afraid both one and other, and said unto Baruch, We will surely tell the king of all these words. 17 And they asked Baruch, saying, Tell us now, How didst thou write all these words at his mouth? 18 Then Baruch answered them, He pronounced all these words unto me with his mouth, and I wrote them with ink in the book. 19 Then said the princes unto Baruch, Go, hide thee, thou and Jeremiah; and let no man know where ye be.

It should seem that Baruch had been frequently reading out of the book to all companies that would give him the hearing, before the most solemn reading of it altogether, which is here spoken of; for the directions were given about it in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, whereas this was done in the fifth year, ver. 9. But some think that the writing of the book fair over took up so much time that it was another year ere it was perfected; and yet perhaps it might not be past a month or two; he might begin it in the latter end of the fourth year and finish it in the beginning of the fifth, for the ninth month refers to the computation of the year in general, not to the year of that reign. Now observe here,

First. The government appointed a public fast to be religiously observed, ver. 9, either upon the account of the distress they were brought into by the army of the Chaldeans, or of the want of rain, ch. xiv. 1; "They proclaimed a fast to the people." Whether the king and princes or the priests ordered this fast, is not certain, but it was plain God, by his providence, called them aloud to it. Note, Great shows of piety and devotion may be found even among those who, though they keep up these forms of godliness, are strangers this trial was made to show their steady adherence to their rules, and the reasons which they assigned for it, in order to shame the disobedience of the Jews."

xxxv. 8. However practicable their law not to drink wine may be in civilised lands, it would be difficult to carry out the system in respect of houses and the cultivation of the soil. They themselves, as is apparent from the eleventh verse, were quite willing in the hour of danger to betake themselves for refuge to Jerusalem itself.

xxxv. 11. The army of Syria is here named as distinct from that of the Chaldeans. The Greek version has Assyrians for Syrians. The Syriac has Edom, which is probably a mistake for Aram or Syria. The Hebrew text is quite correct, as is proved by a reference to 2 Kings xxiv. 2.

xxxv. 19. Some take this verse to mean that the Rechabites should continue in all time, and it is commonly believed that Dr. Wolff actually met with them on his travels. Benjamin of Tudela and enemies to the power of it. But what will such hypocritical services avail? Fasting without reforming and turning away from sin will never turn away the judgments of God, Jonah iii. 10. Notwithstanding this fast God proceeded in his controversy with this people.

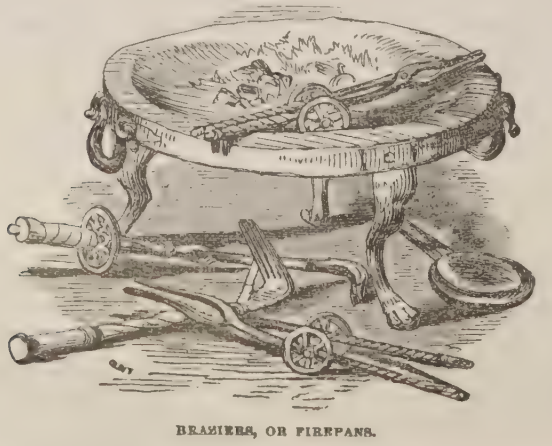
Secondly. Baruch repeated Jeremiah's sermons publicly in the house of the Lord on the fast-day. He stood in a chamber that belonged to Gemariah, and out of a window or balcony read to the people that were in the court, ver. 10. Note, When we are speaking to God we must be willing to hear from him, and therefore on days of fasting and prayer it is requisite that the word be read and preached; "Hearken unto me, that God may hearken unto you," Jud. ix 7. For our help in suing out mercy and grace it is proper we should be told of sin and duty.

Thirdly. An account was brought of this to the princes that attended the court, and were now together in the secretary's office, here called the scribe's chamber, ver. 12. It should seem, though the princes had called the people to meet in the house of God to fast, and pray, and hear the word, they did not think fit to attend there themselves, which was a sign that it was not from a principle of true devotion, but merely for fashion sake, that they proclaimed this fast. We are willing to hope that it was not with an ill design to bring Jeremiah into trouble for his preaching, but with a good design, to bring the princes into trouble for their sins, that Michaiah informed the princes of what Baruch had read; for his father Gemariah so far countenanced Baruch as to lend him his chamber to read out of. Michaiah finds the princes sitting in the scribe's chamber, and tells them they had better have been where he had been, hearing a good sermon in the temple, which he gives them the heads of. Note, When we have heard some good word that has affected and edified us we should be ready to communicate it to others that did not hear it, for their edification; "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks."

Fourthly. Baruch is sent for, and is ordered to sit down among them, and read it all over again to them, ver. 14, 15, which he readily did, not complaining that he was weary with his public work, and therefore desiring to be excused, nor upbraiding the princes with their being absent from the temple, where they might have heard it when he read it there. Note, God's ministers must become all things to all men, if by any means they may gain some; must comply with them in circumstances that they may secure the substance. St. Paul preached privately to them of reputation, Gal. ii. 2.

Fifthly. The princes were for the present much affected with the word that was read to them, ver. 16. Observe, They heard all the words, they did not interrupt him, but very patiently attended to the reading of the whole book, for otherwise how could they make a competent judgment of it? And when they had heard all they were afraid, were all afraid, one as well as another; like Felix, who trembled at Paul's reasonings. The reproofs were just and the threatenings terrible, and the predictions now in a fair way to be fulfilled, so that, laying all together, they were in a great consternation. We are not told what impressions this reading of the roll made upon the people, ver. 12, but the princes were put into a fright by it, and (as some read it) looked one upon another, not knowing what to say. They were all convinced it was worthy to be regarded, but none of them had courage to second it, only they agreed to tell the king of all these words, and if he think fit to give credit to them they will; otherwise not, no, though it were to prevent the ruin of the nation. And yet at the same time they knew the king's mind so far that they advised Baruch and Jeremiah to hide themselves, ver. 19, and to shift as they could for their own safety, expecting no other but that the king, instead of being convinced, would be exasperated. Note, It is common for sinners under convictions to endeavour to shake them off, by shifting off the prosecution of them to other persons, as these princes here, or to another more convenient season, as Felix.



Sixthly. They asked Baruch a trifling question, "How he wrote all these words?" ver. 17, as if they suspected there was something extraordinary in it; but Baruch gives them a plain answer, that there was nothing but what was common in the manner of the writing; Jeremiah dictated, and he wrote, ver. 18. But thus it is common for those who would avoid the convictions of the word of God to start needless questions about the way and manner of the inspiration of it.

20 And they went in to the king into the court, but they laid up the roll in the chamber of Elishama the scribe, and told all the words in the ears of the king. 21 So the king sent Jehudi to fetch the roll: and he took it out of Elishama the scribe's chamber. And Jehudi read it in the ears of the king, and in the ears of all the princes which stood beside the king. 22 Now the king sat in the winterhouse in the ninth month: and there was a fire on the hearth burning before him. 23 And it came to pass, that when Jehudi had read three or four leaves, he cut it with the penknife, and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed in the fire that was on the hearth. 24 Yet they were not afraid, nor rent their garments, neither the king, nor any of his servants that heard all these words. 25 Nevertheless Elnathan and Delaiah and Gemariah had made intercession to the king that he would not burn the roll: but he would not hear them. 26 But the king commanded Jerahmeel the son of Hammelech, and Seraiah the son of Azriel, and Shelemiah the son of Abdeel, to take Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet: but the LORD hid them. 27 Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah, after that the king had burned the roll, and the words which Baruch wrote at the mouth of Jeremiah, saying, 28 Take thee again another roll, and write in it all the former words that were in the first roll, which Jehoiakim the king of Judah hath burned. 29 And thou shalt say to Jehoiakim king of Judah, Thus saith the LORD; Thou hast burned this roll, saying, Why hast thou written therein, saying, The king of Babylon shall certainly come and destroy this land, and shall cause to cease from thence man and beast? 30 Therefore thus saith the LORD of Jehoiakim king of Judah;

He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David:
And his dead body shall be cast out
In the day to the heat,
And in the night to the frost.

31 And I will punish him and his seed and his servants
For their iniquity;
And I will bring upon them,
And upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and upon the men of Judah,
All the evil that I have pronounced against them;
But they hearkened not.

32 Then took Jeremiah another roll, and gave it to Baruch the scribe, the son of Neriah; who wrote therein from the mouth of Jeremiah all the words of the book which Jehoiakim king of Judah had burned in the fire: and there were added besides unto them many like words.

BRAZIERS, OR FIREPANS.

We have traced the roll to the people and to the princes, and here we are to follow it to the king; and we find,

First. That upon notice given him concerning it, he sent for it, and ordered it to be read to him, ver. 20, 21. He did not desire that Baruch would come and read it himself, who could read it more intelligently, and with more authority and affection than any one else; nor did he order one of his princes to do it, though it had been no disparagement to the greatest of them, much less would he vouchsafe to read it himself; but Jehudi, one of his pages now in waiting, that was sent to fetch it, is bidden to read it, who perhaps scarce knew how to make sense of it. But those who thus despise the word of God will soon make it appear, as this king here did, that they hate it too, and have not only low, but ill thoughts of it.

Secondly. That he had not patience to hear it read through, as the princes had; but when he had heard three or four leaves read, in a rage cut it with his penknife, and threw it piece by piece into the fire, that he might be sure to see it all consumed, ver. 22, 23. This was a piece of as daring impiety as a man could lightly be guilty of, and a most impudent affront to the God of heaven, whose message this was. 1. Thus he shewed his impatience of reproof; being resolved to persist in sin, he would by no means bear to be told of his faults. 2. Thus he shewed his indignation at Baruch and Jeremiah; he would have cut them in pieces and burnt them, if he had had them in his reach when he was in this passion. 3. Thus he expressed an obstinate resolution never to comply with the designs and intentions of the warnings given him; he will do what he will, whatsoever God, by his prophets, saith to the contrary. 4. Thus he foolishly hoped to defeat the threatenings denounced against him; as if God knew not how to execute the sentence when the roll was gone in which it mentions them in the twelfth century, and a modern author says there are 60,000 of them near Mecca. Signor Pierotti says he found a tribe near the Dead Sea bearing the name and keeping up the traditions of the Rechabites.

xxxvi. 1. The occurrences of this chapter belong to the same period as those of chapter xxxv., and therefore this chapter also should come before chapter xxvii.

xxxvi. 4, 5. Baruch really appears here for the first time, seeing that the mention of him in chap. xxxii. belongs to a later date. It is noticeable that on both these occasions Jeremiah is deprived of his liberty. Here it is uncertain whether his confinement was self-imposed, from motives of prudence; the statement in verse 26 favours that idea, and in connection with verse 19 almost establishes it.

xxxvi. 6–8. There is a difference of opinion as to whether the document was read only once or twice. On the whole we are in favour of the twofold reading, once in the fourth year and once in was written. 5. Thus he thought he had effectually provided that the things contained in the roll should spread no farther, which was the care of the chief priests concerning the Gospel, Acts iv. 17. They had told him how this roll had been read to the people and to the princes. But, saith he, I will take care it shall never be read more. See what an enmity against God there is in the carnal mind, and wonder at the patience of God, that he bears with such indignities done to him.

Thirdly. That neither the king himself nor any of his princes were at all affected with the word; "They were not afraid," ver. 24; no, not those princes that trembled at the word when they heard it the first time, ver. 16. So soon, so easily, do good impressions wear off. They shewed some concern till they saw how light the king made of it, and then they shook off all that concern. They rent not their garments, as Josiah did, this Jehoiakim's own father did, when he had the book of the law read to him, though it was not so particular as the contents of this roll were, nor so immediately adapted to the present posture of affairs.

Fourthly. That there were three of the princes who had so much sense and grace left as to interpose for the preventing of the burning of the roll, but in vain, ver. 25. If they had from the first shewed themselves, as they ought to have done, affected with the word, perhaps they might have brought the king to a better mind, and have persuaded him to hear it patiently; but many times they that will not do the good they should put it out of their own power to do the good they would.

Fifthly. That Jehoiakim, when he had thus in effect burned God's warrant, by which he was arrested, as it were, in a way of revenge, now he thought he had got the better, signed a warrant for the apprehending of Jeremiah and Baruch, God's ministers; ver. 26, "But the Lord hid them." The princes bade them abscond, ver. 19. But it was neither the princes' care for them, nor theirs for themselves, that secured them, it was under the Divine protection that they were safe. Note, God will find out a shelter for his people, though their persecutors be never so industrious to get them into their power, till their hour is come; nay, and then he will himself be their hiding place.

Sixthly. That Jeremiah had orders and instructions to write the same words in another roll that were written in the roll which Jehoiakim had burned, ver. 27, 28. Note, Though the attempts of hell against the word of God are very daring, yet not one iota or tittle of it shall fall to the ground, nor shall the unbelief of man make the word of God of none effect. Enemies may prevail to burn many a Bible, but they cannot abolish the word of God, can neither extirpate it nor defeat the accomplishment of it. Though the tables of the law were broken, they were renewed again; and so out of the ashes of the roll that was burned arose another phœnix. "The word of the Lord endures for ever."

Seventhly. That the king of Judah, though he be a king, shall be severely reckoned with by the King of kings for this indignity done to the written word. God took notice what it was in the roll that Jehoiakim took so much offence at. He was angry because "it was written therein, saying, Surely the king of Babylon shall come and destroy this land," ver. 29. And did not the king of Babylon come two years before this, and go far towards the destroying of this land? He did so, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 6, 7; in his third year, Dan. i. 1. So that God and his prophets were therefore become his enemies, because they told him the truth, told him of the desolation that was coming, but at the same time putting him into a fair way to prevent it. But if this be the thing he takes so heinously, let him know, 1. That the wrath of God shall come upon him and his family, in the first place by the hand of Nebuchadnezzar. He shall be cut off, and in a few weeks his son shall be dethroned, and exchange his royal robes for prison garments, so that he shall have none to sit upon the throne of David; the glory of that illustrious house shall be eclipsed, and die in him. His dead body shall lie unburied, or, which comes all to one, he shall be buried with the burial of an ass, that is, thrown into the next ditch; it shall lie exposed to all weathers, heat and frost, which will occasion its putrefying and becoming loathsome the sooner. 'Not that his body,' saith Mr. Gataker, 'could be sensible of such usage, or himself, being deceased, of aught that could befall his body; but that the sight of a king's body in such a condition should be a hideous spectacle, and a horrid monument of God's heavy wrath and indignation against him, unto all that should behold it.' Even his seed and his servants shall fare the worse for their relation to him, ver. 31; for they shall be punished not for his iniquity, but so much the sooner for their own. 2. That all the evil pronounced against Judah and Jerusalem in that roll shall be brought upon them. Though the copy be burned, the original remains in the Divine counsel, which shall again be copied out after another manner, in bloody characters. Note, There is no escaping God's judgments by struggling with them; who ever hardened his heart against God and prospered?

Lastly. That when the roll was written anew, "there were added" to the former "many like words," ver. 32, many more threatenings of wrath and vengeance; for, since they will yet walk contrary to God, he will heat the furnace seven times hotter. Note, As God is in one mind, and none can turn him, so he hath still more arrows in his quiver; and those who contend with God's woes do but prepare for themselves heavier of the same kind.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

This chapter brings us very near the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans; for the story of it lies in the latter end of Zedekiah's reign. We have in it, I. A general idea of the ill character of this reign, ver. 1, 2. II. The message which Zedekiah notwithstanding sent to Jeremiah, to desire his prayers, ver. 3. III. The flattering hopes which the people had conceived, that the Chaldeans would quit the siege of Jerusalem, ver. 4. IV. The assurance God gave them by Jeremiah, (who was now at liberty, ver. 4,) that the Chaldean army should renew the siege, and take the city, ver. 6—10. V. The imprisonment of Jeremiah, under pretence that he was a deserter, ver. 11—17. VI. The kindness which Zedekiah shewed him when he was a prisoner, ver. 16—21.

AND king Zedekiah the son of Josiah reigned instead of Coniah the son of Jehoiakim, whom Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon made king in the land of Judah. 2 But neither he, nor his servants, nor the people of the land, did hearken unto the words of the LORD, which he spake by the prophet Jeremiah. 3 And Zedekiah the king sent Jehucal the son of Shelemiah and Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah the priest to the prophet Jeremiah, saying, Pray now unto the LORD our God for us. 4 Now Jeremiah came in and went out among the people: for they had not put him into prison. 5 Then Pharaoh's army was come forth out of Egypt: and when the Chaldeans that besieged Jerusalem heard tidings of them, they departed from Jerusalem. 6 Then came the word of the LORD unto the prophet Jeremiah, saying, 7 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; Thus shall ye say to the king of Judah, that sent you unto me to enquire of me; Behold, Pharaoh's army, which is come forth to help you, shall return to Egypt into their own land. 8 And the Chaldeans shall come again, and fight against this city, and take it, and burn it with fire. 9 Thus saith the LORD; Deceive not yourselves, saying, The Chaldeans shall surely depart from us: for they shall not depart. 10 For though ye had smitten the whole army of the Chaldeans that fight against you, and there remained but wounded men among them, yet should they rise up every man in his tent, and burn this city with fire.

Here is, First. Jeremiah's preaching slighted, ver. 1, 2. Zedekiah succeeded Coniah, or Jeconiah; and, though he saw in his predecessor the fatal consequences of contemning the word of God, yet he did not take warning, nor give any more regard to it than others had done before him. "Neither he, nor his courtiers, nor the people of the land, hearkened unto the words of the Lord," though they already began to be fulfilled. Note, Those have hearts wretchedly hard indeed, that see God's judgments on others, and feel them on themselves, and yet will not be humbled and brought to heed what he saith. These here had proof sufficient that it was the Lord that spake by Jeremiah the prophet, and yet they would not hearken to him.

Secondly. Jeremiah's prayers desired. Zedekiah sent messengers to him, saying, "Pray now unto the Lord our God for us." So he did, ch. xxi. 1, 2; and one of the messengers, Zephaniah, is the same there and here. Zedekiah is to be commended for this, and it shews he had some good in him, some sense of his need of God's favour, and of his own unworthiness to ask it for himself, and some value for good people and good ministers, that had an interest in heaven. Note, When we are in distress we ought to desire the prayers of our ministers and Christian friends; for thereby we put an honour upon prayer, and an esteem upon our brethren. Kings themselves should look upon their praying people as the strength of the nation, Zec. xii. 5, 10. And yet this doth but help to condemn Zedekiah out of his own mouth. If indeed he looked upon Jeremiah as a prophet, whose prayers might avail much both for him and his people, why did he not then believe him, and hearken to the words of the Lord, which he spake by him? He desired his good prayers, but would not take his good counsel, nor be ruled by him, though he spake in God's name, and it appears by this he knew he did. Note, It is common for those to desire to be prayed for that yet will not be advised. But herein they put a cheat upon themselves; for how can we expect that God should hear others speaking to him for us, if we will not hear them speaking to us from him, and for him. Many that despise prayer when they are in prosperity will be glad of it when they are in adversity; Now give us of your oil. When Zedekiah sent to the prophet to pray for him, he had better have sent for the prophet to pray with him; but he thought that below him; and how can they expect the comforts of religion that will not stoop to the services of it?

Thirdly. Jerusalem flattered by the retreat of the Chaldean army from it. Jeremiah was now at liberty; ver. 4, he went in and out among the people, might freely speak to them, and be spoken to by them. Jerusalem also for the present was at liberty, ver. 5. Zedekiah, though a tributary to the king of Babylon, had entered into a private league with Pharaoh, king of Egypt, Eze. xvii. 15; pursuant to which, when the king of Babylon came to chastise him for his treachery, the king of Egypt, though he came no more in person after that great defeat which Nebuchadnezzar gave him in the reign of Jehoiakim, 2 Kin. xxiv. 7, yet sent some forces to relieve Jerusalem when it was besieged; upon notice of the approach of which the Chaldeans raised the siege, probably not for fear of them, but in policy, to fight them at a distance, before any of the Jewish forces could join them. From this they encouraged themselves to hope that Jerusalem was delivered, for good and all, out of the hands of its enemies, and that the storm was quite blown over. Note, Sinners are commonly hardened in their security by the intermissions of judgments, and the slow proceedings of them; and those who will not be awakened by the word of God may justly be lulled asleep by the providence of God.

Fourthly. Jerusalem threatened with the return of the Chaldean army, and with ruin by it. Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah to desire him to pray for them, that the Chaldean army might not return; but Jeremiah sends them word back that the decree was gone forth, and it was but a folly for them to expect peace; for God had begun a controversy with them, which he would make an end of. "Thus saith the Lord, Deceive not yourselves," ver. 9. Note, Satan himself, though he is the great deceiver, could not deceive us, if we did not deceive ourselves; and thus sinners are their own destroyers by being their own deceivers: which this is an aggravation of, that they are so frequently warned of it, and cautioned not to deceive themselves, and they have the word of God, the great design of which is to undeceive them. Jeremiah used no dark metaphors; but tells them plainly,

1. That the Egyptians shall retreat, and either give back or be forced back into their own land, (Eze. xvii. 17,) which was said of old, (Isa. xxx. 7,) and is here said again, ver. 7; that "the Egyptians shall help in vain;" they shall not dare to face the Chaldean army, but shall retire with precipitation. Note, If God the fifth year of Jehoiakim. This is the more simple and natural explanation.

xxxvi. 9. This fast was probably a special one, by public appointment, and not annual. The occasion of it would be the approaching tide of Babylonian conquest. Nebuchadnezzar filled the nations with fear, and conscious weakness drove them to seek the favour of the Most High.

xxxvi. 10. The Temple itself was attended by priests and Levites, who had chambers or apartments within the precincts, and separated from the sacred structure by the courts. What is here called the higher or upper court seems to have been adjacent to a new entrance to the Temple proper. It is worthy of notice that at the door of this new gate the princes of Judah sat when Jeremiah was accused of a capital offence (chap. xxvi. 10). The Chaldee speaks of this as the east gate in both places where it is mentioned. Vatablus and some others say it was called new because rebuilt.

help us not no creature can. As no power can prevail against God, so none can avail without God, nor countervail his departures from us.

2. That the Chaldeans shall return, and shall renew the siege, and prosecute it with more vigour than ever. "They shall not depart" for good and all, ver. 9; "they shall come again," ver. 8; they shall "fight against the city." Note, God has the sovereign command of all the hosts of men, even of those that know him not, that own him not, and they are all made to serve his purposes. He directs their marches, their counter-marches, their retreats, their returns, as pleaseth him; and furious armies, like stormy winds, are fulfilling his word.

3. That Jerusalem shall certainly be delivered into the hand of the Chaldeans; they shall take it and burn it with fire, ver. 8. The sentence passed upon it shall be executed, and they shall be the executioners. O but, (they say,) the Chaldeans are withdrawn, they have quitted the enterprise as impracticable; and though they have, (saith the prophet,) nay, though you had smitten their army, so that many were slain, and all the rest wounded, yet those wounded men should rise up and burn this city, ver. 10. This is designed to speak the doom passed upon Jerusalem irrevocable, and its destruction inevitable; it must be laid in ruins, and these Chaldeans are the men that must do it, and it is now in vain to think of evading the stroke, or contending with it. Note, Whatever instruments God has determined to make use of in any service for him, whether of mercy or judgment, they shall accomplish that for which they are designed, whatever incapacity or disability they may lie under to be reduced to. Those by whom God has resolved to save or to destroy, saviours they shall be, and destroyers they shall be, yea, though they were all wounded. For, as when God has work to do he will not want instruments to do it with, though they may seem far to seek, so, when he has chosen his instruments, they shall do the work, though they may seem very unlikely to accomplish it.

11 And it came to pass, that when the army of the Chaldeans was broken up from Jerusalem for fear of Pharaoh's army, 12 Then Jeremiah went forth out of Jerusalem to go into the land of Benjamin, to separate himself thence in the midst of the people. 13 And when he was in the gate of Benjamin, a captain of the ward was there, whose name was Irijah, the son of Shelemiah, the son of Hananiah; and he took Jeremiah the prophet, saying, Thou fallest away to the Chaldeans. 14 Then said Jeremiah, It is false; I fall not away to the Chaldeans. But he hearkened not to him: so Irijah took Jeremiah, and brought him to the princes. 15 Wherefore the princes were wroth with Jeremiah, and smote him, and put him in prison in the house of Jonathan the scribe: for they had made that the prison. 16 When Jeremiah was entered into the dungeon, and into the cabins, and Jeremiah had remained there many days; 17 Then Zedekiah the king sent, and took him out: and the king asked him secretly in his house, and said, Is there any word from the LORD? And Jeremiah said, There is: for, said he, thou shalt be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon. 18 Moreover Jeremiah said unto king Zedekiah, What have I offended against thee, or against thy servants, or against this people, that ye have put me in prison? 19 Where are now your prophets which prophesied unto you, saying, The king of Babylon shall not come against you, nor against this land? 20 Therefore hear now, I pray thee, O my lord the king: let my supplication, I pray thee, be accepted before thee; that thou cause me not to return to the house of Jonathan the scribe, lest I die there. 21 Then Zedekiah the king commanded that they should commit Jeremiah into the court of the prison, and that they should give him daily a piece of bread out of the bakers' street, until all the bread in the city were spent. Thus Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison.

EASTERN BAKER.—ver. 21.

We have here a farther account concerning Jeremiah, who relates more passages concerning himself than any other of the prophets; for the histories of the lives and sufferings of God's ministers have been very serviceable to the church, as well as their preaching and writing.

First. We are told that Jeremiah, when he had an opportunity for it, attempted to retire out of Jerusalem into the country, ver. 11, 12. When the Chaldeans had broken up from Jerusalem, because of Pharaoh's army, upon the notice of their advancing towards them, Jeremiah determined to go into the country, and, as the margin reads it, to 'slip away from Jerusalem in the midst of the people,' who in that interval of the siege went out into the country to look after their affairs there. He endeavoured to steal away in the crowd; for, though he was a man of great eminency, he could well reconcile himself to obscurity; though he was one of a thousand he was content to be lost in the multitude, and buried alive in a corner, in a cottage. Whether he designed for Anathoth or no doth not appear; his concerns might call him thither, but his neighbours there were such as, unless they were well mended since, ch. xi. 21, might discourage him from coming among them. Or, whether he did not intend to hide himself somewhere where he was not known, and fulfil his own wish, ch. ix. 2, "O that I had in the wilderness a lodging place!" Jeremiah found he could do no good in Jerusalem, he laboured in vain among them, and therefore determined to leave them. Note, There are times when it is the wisdom of good men to retire into privacy, to "enter into the chamber, and shut the door about them," Isa. xxvi. 20.

Secondly. That in this attempt he was seized as a deserter and committed to prison, ver. 13—15. He was in the gate of Benjamin, so far had he gained his point, when a captain of the ward, who probably had the charge of that gate, discovered him, and took him into custody. He was the grandson of Hananiah, who, the Jews say, was Hananiah the false prophet, that contested with Jeremiah, ch. xxviii. 16; and that this young captain had a spite to Jeremiah upon that account. He could not arrest him without some pretence; and that which he chargeth upon him is, "Thou fallest away to the Chaldeans;" an unlikely story, for the Chaldeans were now gone off. Jeremiah could not reach them; or, if he could, who would go over to a baffled army? Jeremiah therefore, with good reason, and with both the confidence and mildness of an innocent man, denies the charge, "It is false, I fall not away to the Chaldeans," I am going upon my own lawful occasions. Note, It is no new thing for the church's best friends to be represented as in the interest of her worst enemies; thus have the blackest characters been put upon the fairest, purest minds; and in such a malicious world as this is, innocency, nay excellency itself, is no fence against the basest calumny. When at any time we are thus falsly accused we may do as Jeremiah did, boldly deny the charge, and then commit our cause to him that judgeth righteously. Jeremiah's protestation of his integrity, though he be a prophet, a man of God, a man of honour and sincerity, though he be a priest, and is ready to say it in verbo sacerdotis,—'on the word of a priest,'—yet he is not regarded; but he is brought before the privy council, who, without examining him, and the proofs against him, but upon the base, malicious insinuation of the captain, fell into a passion with him. They were wroth; and what justice could be expected from men who, being in anger, would hear no reason? They beat him, without any regard had to his coat and character, and then put him in prison, in the worst prison they had, that in the house of Jonathan the scribe. Either it had been his house, and he had quitted it for the inconveniences of it, but it was thought good enough for a prison, or it was now his house, and perhaps he was a rigid severe man, that made it a house of cruel bondage to his prisoners. Into this prison Jeremiah was thrust, into the dungeon, which was dark and cold, damp and dirty, the most uncomfortable, unhealthful place in it. In the cells or cabins there he must lodge; among which there are no choice, for they are all alike miserable lodging places; there Jeremiah remained many days, and, for aught appears, nobody came near him or inquired after him. See what a world this is; the wicked princes that are in rebellion against God lie at ease, lie in state in their palaces, while godly Jeremiah, that is in the service of God, lies in pain in a loathsome dungeon. It is well there is a world to come.

Thirdly. That Zedekiah at length sent for him, and shewed him some favour; but probably not till the Chaldean army was returned, and had laid fresh siege to the city. When their vain hopes with which they fed themselves, and in confidence of which they had re-enslaved their servants, ch. xxxiv. 11, were all vanished, then they were in a greater confusion and consternation than ever. O then, saith Zedekiah, send in all haste for the prophet; let me have some talk with him. When the Chaldeans were withdrawn, he only sent to the prophet to pray for him; but now they had again invested the city, he sent for him to consult him. Thus gracious will men be when pangs come upon them.

1. The king sent for him to give him private audience as an ambassador from God. He asked him secretly in his house, being ashamed to be seen in his company, "Is there any word from the Lord?" ver. 17; any word of comfort? Canst thou give us any hopes that the Chaldeans shall again retire? Note, Those that will not hearken to God's admonitions when they are in prosperity would be glad of his consolations when they are in adversity, and expect that his ministers should then speak words of peace to them; but how can they expect it? what have they to do with peace? Jeremiah's life and comfort is in Zedekiah's hand, and he has now a petition to present to him for his favour; and yet, having this opportunity, he tells him plainly that there is a word from the Lord, but no word of comfort for him or his people; "Thou shalt be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon." If Jeremiah had consulted with flesh and blood he would have given him a plausible answer; and, though he would not tell him a lie, yet he might have chosen whether he would tell him the worst at this time; what needed it, when he had so often told it him before? But Jeremiah was one that had obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, and would not, to obtain mercy of man, be unfaithful either to God xxxvi. 18. Baruch's words have a very modern sound, and yet there is no room to doubt that very long before his time men wrote with ink in books, whether of papyrus (paper) or of skins. The ink of the Orientals has been for ages made of lamp-black or charcoal, mixed with gum and water, the water being added as required. The writing, which is often very fine and beautiful, is produced by a reed pen.

xxxvi. 22. The winter-house would not be a separate palace, but those apartments in the palace which were specially constructed for occupation during winter. The ninth month corresponded with parts of November and December. The king had a fire burning before him, but certainly not on a hearth at the base of an ordinary chimney. From what is still seen in the East, it is most probable that the so-called "hearth" was a sort of brazier or chafing-dish, supplied with charcoal or other fuel yielding but little smoke. Dr. Henderson calls it a stove.

er to his prince; he therefore tells him the truth, the whole truth. And since there was no remedy it would be a kindness to the king to know his doom, that being no surprise to him it might be the less a terror, and he might provide to make the best of bad. Jeremiah takes this occasion to upbraid him and his people with the credit they gave to the false prophets, that told them the king of Babylon should not come at all, or when he was withdrawn should not come again against them; ver. 19, Where are now your prophets that told you you should have peace? Note, Those that deceive themselves with groundless hopes of mercy will justly be twitted with it when the event hath undeceived them.

2. He improved this opportunity for the presenting of a private petition as a poor prisoner, ver. 18, 20. It was not in Jeremiah's power to reverse this sentence God had passed upon Zedekiah; but it was in Zedekiah's power to reverse the sentence which the princes had given against him; and therefore, since he thought him fit to be used as a prophet, he would not think him fit to be abused as the worst of malefactors. He humbly expostulates with the king, "What have I offended against thee, or thy servants, or this people?" what law have I broke, what injury have I done to the common welfare, "that ye have put me in prison?" And many a one that has been very hardly dealt with has been able to make the same appeal, and to make it good. He likewise earnestly begs, and very pathetically, ver. 20, "Cause me not to return to" yonder noisome gaol, to "the house of Jonathan the scribe, lest I die there." This was the language of innocent nature, sensible of its own grievances, and solicitous of its own preservation. Though he was not at all unwilling to die God's martyr, yet having so fair an opportunity to get relief he would not let it slip, lest he should die his own murderer. When Jeremiah delivered God's message he spake as one having authority, with the greatest boldness; but when he presented his own request he spake as one under authority, with the greatest submissiveness; "Hear me, I pray thee, O my Lord the king; let my supplication, I pray thee, be accepted before thee." Here is not a word of complaint of the princes that unjustly committed him, no offering to bring an action of false imprisonment against them, but all in a way of modest supplication to the king; to teach us that, even when we act with the courage that becomes the faithful servants of God, yet we must carry ourselves with the humility and modesty that becomes dutiful subjects to the government God hath set over us. A lion in God's cause must be a lamb in his own. And we find that God gave Jeremiah favour in the eyes of the king. 1st. He gave him his request; took care that he should not die in the dungeon, but ordered he should have the liberty of the court of the prison, where he might have a pleasant walk, and breathe a free air. 2nd. He gave him more than his request; took care he should not die for want, as many did that had their heels at liberty, by reason of the straitness of the siege; he ordered him his daily bread out of the public stock, for the prison was within the verge of the court, till all the bread was spent. Zedekiah ought to have released him, nay, to have preferred him, to have made him a privy counsellor, as Joseph was taken from prison to be the second man in the kingdom; but he had not courage to do that. It was well he did as he did; and it is an instance of the care God takes of his suffering servants that are faithful to him. He can make even their confinement turn to their advantage, and the court of their prison to become as green pastures to them; and raise up such friends to provide for them as that in the days of famine they shall be satisfied; "At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh."

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

In this chapter, just as the former, we have Jeremiah greatly debased under the frowns of the princes, and yet greatly honoured by the favour of the king; they used him as a criminal, he used him as a privy counsellor. Here, I. Jeremiah for his faithfulness is put into the dungeon by the princes, ver. 1—6. II. At the intercession of Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, by special order from the king, he is taken up out of the dungeon, and confined only to the court of the prison, ver. 7—12. III. He has a private conference with the king upon the present conjuncture of affairs, ver. 14—23. IV. Care is taken to keep that conference private, ver. 24—28.

THEN Shephatiah the son of Mattan, and Gedaliah the son of Pashur, and Jucal the son of Shelemiah, and Pashur the son of Malchiah, heard the words that Jeremiah had spoken unto all the people, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD, He that remaineth in this city shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: but he that goeth forth to the Chaldeans shall live; for he shall have his life for a prey, and shall live. 3 Thus saith the LORD, This city shall surely be given into the hand of the king of Babylon's army, which shall take it. 4 Therefore the princes said unto the king, We beseech thee, let this man be put to death: for thus he weakeneth the hands of the men of war that remain in this city, and the hands of all the people, in speaking such words unto them: for this man seeketh not the welfare of this people, but the hurt. 5 Then Zedekiah the king said, Behold, he is in your hand: for the king is not he that can do any thing against you. 6 Then took they Jeremiah, and cast him into the dungeon of Malchiah the son of Hammelech, that was in the court of the prison: and they let down Jeremiah with cords. And in the dungeon there was no water, but mire: so Jeremiah sunk in the mire. 7 Now when Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, one of the eunuchs which was in the king's house, heard that they had put Jeremiah in the dungeon; the king then sitting in the gate of Benjamin; 8 Ebed-melech went forth out of the king's house, and spake to the king, saying, 9 My lord the king, these men have done evil in all that they have done to Jeremiah the prophet, whom they have cast into the dungeon; and he is like to die for hunger in the place where he is: for there is no more bread in the city. 10 Then the king commanded Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, saying, Take from hence thirty men with thee, and take up Jeremiah the prophet out of the dungeon, before he die. 11 So Ebed-melech took the men with him, and went into the house of the king under the treasury, and took thence old cast clouts and old rotten rags, and let them down by cords into the dungeon to Jeremiah. 12 And Ebed-melech the Ethiopian said unto Jeremiah, Put now these old cast clouts and rotten rags under thine armholes under the cords. And Jeremiah did so. 13 So they drew up Jeremiah with cords, and took him up out of the dungeon: and Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison.

AN EASTERN PRISON.

Here, First. Jeremiah persists in his plain preaching. What he had many a time said he still saith, ver. 3, "This city shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon," though it hold out long it will be taken at last; nor would he have so often repeated this unwelcome message, but that he could put them in a certain way, though not to save the city, yet to save themselves; so that every man might have his own life given him for a prey, if he would be advised, ver. 2. Let him not stay in the city in hopes to defend that, for it will be to no purpose; but let him go forth to the Chaldeans, and throw himself upon their mercy, before things come to extremity, and then he shall live; they will not put him to the sword, but give him quarter, (satis est prostrasse leoni,—'it suffices the lion to lay his antagonist prostrate,') and he shall escape the famine and pestilence, which will be the death of multitudes within the city. Note, Those do better for themselves who patiently submit to the rebukes of providence than those who contend with them; and if we cannot have our liberty we must reckon it a mercy to have our lives, and not foolishly throw them away upon a point of honour; they may be reserved for better times.

Secondly. The princes persist in their malice against Jeremiah. He was faithful to his country and to his trust as a prophet; though he had suffered many a time for his faithfulness, and though at this time he ate the king's bread, yet that did not stop his mouth. But his persecutors were still bitter against him; and complained that he abused the liberty he had of walking in the court of the prison; for, though he could not go to the temple to preach, yet he vented the same things in private conversation to those that came to visit him; and therefore, ver. 4, they represent him to the king as a dangerous man, disaffected to his country, and to the government he lived under; "He seeks not the welfare of this people, but the hurt." An unjust insinuation; for no man had laid out himself more for the good of Jerusalem than he had done. They represent his preaching as having an ill tendency. The design of it was plainly to bring men to repent, and turn to God, which would have been as much as anything a strengthening to the hands both of the soldiery and of the burghers; and yet they represent it as weakening their hands, and discouraging them, which if it did it was their own fault. Note, It is common for wicked people to look upon God's faithful ministers as their enemies, only xxxvi. 23. The "leaves" mentioned were most likely columns. The "penknife" is in the Hebrew "a writer's knife," though of course used for making and mending pens.

xxxvi. 26. The words of Jeremiah in verse 5 of this chapter, "I am shut up; I cannot go into the house of the Lord," are usually understood of confinement or custody of some sort. The language here, however, suggests that the prophet simply means, "I am precluded from going into the house of the Lord." He may have been still at liberty in the ordinary sense, but prevented from going by circumstances which are not stated. Here Baruch and Jeremiah evade the officers who are sent to arrest them, but do not find them, because Providence interposes in their favour. Their place of concealment is not stated.

xxxvi. 30. The expression, "He shall have none to sit," &c signifies that no one of his, or none of his posterity, should occupy his throne.

because they shew them what enemies they are to themselves while they continue impenitent.

Thirdly. Jeremiah hereupon, by the king's permission, is put into a dungeon, with design he shall perish there. Zedekiah, though he was under conviction that Jeremiah was a prophet sent of God, yet he had not courage to own his convictions, but yielded to the violence of his persecutors; ver. 5, "He is in your hand," and a worse sentence he could not have passed upon him. We found in Jehoiakim's reign that the princes were better affected to the prophet than the king was, ch. xxxvi. 25, but now they were more violent against him, a sign they were ripening apace for ruin. Had it been in a cause that concerned his own honour or profit he would have let them know that the king is he who can do what he pleaseth, whether they will or no; but in the cause of God and his prophet, which he was very cool in, he basely sneaks and truckles to them: "The king is not he that can do any thing against you." Note, Those will have a great deal to answer for who, though they have a secret kindness for good people, dare not own it in a time of need, nor will do what they might do to prevent mischief designed them. The princes having this general warrant from the king presently put poor Jeremiah "into the dungeon of Malchiah, that was in the court of the prison," ver. 6; a deep dungeon, for they let him down into it with cords; and a dirty one, for there was no water in it but mire, stinking mire; and he "sunk in the mire," up to the neck, saith Josephus. They that put him here doubtless designed he should die here, die for hunger, die for cold, and so die miserably, die obscurely, fearing if they should put him to death openly the people might be affected with what he would say, and be incensed against them. Many of God's faithful witnesses have thus been privately made away, and starved to death in prisons, whose blood will be brought to account in the day of discovery. We are not here told what Jeremiah did in this distress; but he tells us himself, Lam. iii. 55, "I called upon thy name, O Lord, out of the low dungeon;" and ver. 57, "Thou drewest near, saying, Fear not."

Fourthly. Application is made to the king by an honest courtier, Ebed-melech, one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber, in behalf of the poor sufferer. Though the princes carried on the matter as privately as they could, yet it came to the ear of this good man, who probably sought opportunities to do good. It may be he came to the knowledge of it by hearing Jeremiah's moans out of the dungeon, for it was in the king's house, ver. 7. Ebed-melech was an Ethiopian, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, and yet had in him more humanity, and more divinity too, than native Israelites had. Christ found more faith among Gentiles than among Jews. Ebed-melech lived in a wicked court, and in a very corrupt degenerate age, and yet had a great sense both of equity and piety. God has his remnant in all places, among all sorts. There were saints even in Cæsar's household. The king was now sitting in the gate of Benjamin to try causes, and receive appeals and petitions, or perhaps holding a council of war there. Thither Ebed-melech went immediately to him, for the case would not admit delay; the prophet might have perished if he had trifled or put it off till he had an opportunity of speaking to the king in private. No time must be lost when life is in danger, especially so valuable a life. He boldly asserts that Jeremiah had a great deal of wrong done him, and is not afraid to tell the king so, though they were princes that did it, though they were now present in court, and though they had the king's warrant for what they did. Whither should oppressed innocency flee for protection but to the throne, especially when great men are its oppressors? Ebed-melech appears truly brave in this matter. He doth not mince the matter; though he had a place at court which he would be in danger of losing for his plain dealing, yet he tells the king faithfully, let him take it as he will, "These men have done ill in all that they have done to Jeremiah;" they deal unjustly with him, for he had not deserved any punishment at all; and they have dealt barbarously with him, so as they used not to deal with the vilest malefactors. And they needed not to have put him to this miserable death; for if they had let him alone where he was, "he was likely to die for hunger in the place where he was," in the court of the prison to which he was confined, "for there was no more bread in the city." The stores, out of which he was to have his allowance, ch. xxxvii. 21, were in a manner spent. See how God can raise up friends for his people in distress where they little thought of them; and spirit men for his service, even beyond expectation.

Fifthly. Orders are immediately given for his release, and Ebed-melech takes care to see them executed. The king, who but now durst do nothing against the princes, has his heart wonderfully changed on a sudden, and will now have Jeremiah released in defiance of the princes; for therefore he orders no less than thirty men, and those of the lifeguards, to be employed in fetching him out of the dungeon, lest the princes should raise a party to oppose it, ver. 10. Let this encourage us to appear boldly for God; we may succeed better than we could have thought, for "the hearts of kings are in the hand of God." Ebed-melech gained his point, and soon brought Jeremiah the good news. And it is observable how particularly the manner of his drawing him out of the dungeon is related; for "God is not unrighteous to forget any work or labour of love" which is shewed to his people or ministers; no, nor any circumstance of it, Heb. vi. 10. Special notice is taken of his great tenderness in providing old soft rags for Jeremiah to put under his arm-holes, to keep the cords from hurting him, wherewith he was to be drawn up; his arm-holes being probably galled by the cords wherewith he was let down. Nor did he throw the rags down to him lest they should be lost in the mire, but carefully let them down, ver. 11, 12. Note, Those that are in distress should be not only relieved, but relieved with compassion and marks of respect; all which shall be placed to account, and abound to a good account in the day of recompence. See what a good use even old rotten rags may be put to, which therefore should not be made waste of, no more than broken meat. Even in the king's house, and under the treasury too, these were carefully preserved for the use of the poor or sick. Jeremiah is brought up out of the dungeon, and is now where he was, "in the court of the prison," ver. 13. Perhaps Ebed-melech could have made interest with the king to have got him his discharge from thence also, now he had the king's ear; but he thought him safer and better provided for there than he would be anywhere else. God can, when he pleaseth, make a prison to become a refuge and hiding-place to his people in distress and danger.

14 Then Zedekiah the king sent, and took Jeremiah the prophet unto him into the third entry that is in the house of the LORD: and the king said unto Jeremiah, I will ask thee a thing; hide nothing from me. 15 Then Jeremiah said unto Zedekiah, If I declare it unto thee, wilt thou not surely put me to death? and if I give thee counsel, wilt thou not hearken unto me? 16 So Zedekiah the king sware secretly unto Jeremiah, saying, As the LORD liveth, that made us this soul, I will not put thee to death, neither will I give thee into the hand of these men that seek thy life. 17 Then said Jeremiah unto Zedekiah, Thus saith the LORD, the God of hosts, the God of Israel; If thou wilt assuredly go forth unto the king of Babylon's princes, then thy soul shall live, and this city shall not be burned with fire; and thou shalt live, and thine house: 18 But if thou wilt not go forth to the king of Babylon's princes, then shall this city be given into the hand of the Chaldeans, and they shall burn it with fire, and thou shalt not escape out of their hand. 19 And Zedekiah the king said unto Jeremiah, I am afraid of the Jews that are fallen to the Chaldeans, lest they deliver me into their hand, and they mock me. 20 But Jeremiah said, They shall not deliver thee. Obey, I beseech thee, the voice of the LORD, which I speak unto thee: so it shall be well unto thee, and thy soul shall live. 21 But if thou refuse to go forth, this is the word that the LORD hath shewed me: 22 And, behold, all the women that are left in the king of Judah's house shall be brought forth to the king of Babylon's princes, and those women shall say, Thy friends have set thee on, and have prevailed against thee: thy feet are sunk in the mire, and they are turned away back. 23 So they shall bring out all thy wives and thy children to the Chaldeans: and thou shalt not escape out of their hand, but shalt be taken by the hand of the king of Babylon: and thou shalt cause this city to be burned with fire. 24 Then said Zedekiah unto Jeremiah, Let no man know of these words, and thou shalt not die. 25 But if the princes hear that I have talked with thee, and they come unto thee, and say unto thee, Declare unto us now what thou hast said unto the king, hide it not from us, and we will not put thee to death; also what the king said unto thee: 26 Then thou shalt say unto them, I presented my supplication before the king, that he would not cause me to return to Jonathan's house, to die there. 27 Then came all the princes unto Jeremiah, and asked him: and he told them according to all these words that the king had commanded. So they left off speaking with him; for the matter was not perceived. 28 So Jeremiah abode in the court of the prison until the day that Jerusalem was taken: and he was there when Jerusalem was taken.

In the foregoing chapter we had the king in close conference with Jeremiah, and here again, though, ver. 5, he had given him up into the hands of his enemies: such a struggle there was in the breast of this unhappy prince, between his convictions and corruptions. Observe,

First. The honour that Zedekiah did to the prophet. When he was newly fetched out of the dungeon he sent for him to advise with him privately. He met him in the third entry, or, as the margin reads it, the principal entry that is in, or leads towards, or adjoins to, the house of the Lord, ver. 14. In appointing this place of interview with the prophet, perhaps he intended to shew a respect and reverence for the house of God, which was proper enough now he was desiring to hear the word of God. Zedekiah would ask Jeremiah a thing, (it should rather be rendered a word,) 'I am here, asking thee for a word of prediction, of counsel, of comfort; a word from the Lord,' ch. xxxvii. 17. 'Whatever word thou hast for me, hide it not from me; let me know the worst. He xxxvii. 1—5. To understand all this, it must be observed that after plundering Jerusalem Nebuchadnezzar made Zedekiah king of Judah. Zedekiah rebelled, however, and formed an alliance with Egypt. At the time to which these verses refer the Chaldeans had withdrawn from Jerusalem, in order to meet the advancing armies from Egypt. Zedekiah was fearful as to the result, and reasonably expected that if the Chaldeans conquered they would return to Jerusalem and complete its ruin; as, indeed, actually happened. According to Josephus, the Egyptian Pharaoh Apries was totally defeated, leaving Nebuchadnezzar's hands quite free.

xxxvii. 11. Our translation here produces a wrong impression, the real sense being, "And it came to pass, on the going up of the army of the Chaldeans from Jerusalem, because of the army of Pharaoh." The Chaldeans did not break up their army, and were in no fear of the Egyptians.

xxxvii. 16. The occurrence of a dungeon in the house of a public had been told plainly what things would come to in the foregoing chapter, but, like Balaam, asks again, in hopes to get a more pleasing answer, as if God, who is in one mind, were altogether such a one as himself, who was in many minds.

Secondly. The bargain that Jeremiah made with him before he would give him his advice, ver. 15. He would indent, 1. For his own safety. Zedekiah would have him deal faithfully with him; and if I do, (saith Jeremiah,) "wilt thou not put me to death?" I am afraid thou wilt, (so some take it;) what else can I expect when thou art led blindfold by the princes? Or, wilt thou promise that thou wilt not? Not that Jeremiah was backward to seal the doctrine he preached with his blood when he was called to it; but in doing our duty we ought to use all lawful means for our own preservation; even the apostles of Christ did so. 2. He would indent for the success of his advice, being no less concerned for Zedekiah's welfare than for his own. He is willing to give him wholesome advice, and doth not upbraid him with his unkindness in suffering him to be put into the dungeon; nor bid him go and consult with his princes, whose judgment he had such a value for. Ministers must with meekness instruct even those that oppose themselves, and render good for evil. He is desirous he should hear counsel, and receive instruction. "Wilt thou not hearken to me?" Surely thou wilt. I am in hopes to find thee pliable at last; and now in this thy day willing to "know the things that belong to thy peace." Note, Then, and then only, there is hope of sinners when they are willing to hearken to good counsel. Some read it as spoken despairingly: 'If I give thee counsel, thou wilt not hearken unto me;' I have reason to fear thou wilt not, and then I had as good keep my counsel to myself. Note, Ministers have little heart to speak to those that have long and often turned a deaf ear to them. Now as to this latter concern of Jeremiah's, Zedekiah makes him no answer, will not promise to hearken to his advice. Though he desires to know what is the mind of God, yet he will reserve himself a liberty when he doth know it, to do as he thinks fit; as if it were the prerogative of a prince not to have his ruin prevented by good counsel. But as to the prophet's safety, he promiseth him, upon the word of a king, and confirms his promise with an oath, that, whatever he should say to him, no advantage should be taken against him for it; "I will neither put thee to death," nor deliver thee into the hands of those that will, ver. 16. This he thought was a mighty favour; and yet Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar, when Daniel read their doom, not only protected him, but preferred and rewarded him, Dan. ii. 48; v. 29. Zedekiah's oath on this occasion is solemn and very observable; "As the Lord liveth, who made us this soul," who gave me my life, and thee thine; therefore I dare not take away thy life unjustly, knowing that then I should forfeit my own to him that is the Lord of life. Note, God is the father of spirits; souls are his workmanship, and they are more fearfully and wonderfully made than bodies are. The soul both of the greatest prince and of the poorest prisoner is of God's making; he fashioneth their hearts alike easily. In all our appeals to God, and in all our dealings both with ourselves and others, we ought to consider this, that the living God made us these souls.

Thirdly. The good advice that Jeremiah gave him, with good reasons why he should take it, not from any prudence or politics of his own, but in the name of the Lord, the God of hosts, and God of Israel; not as a statesman, but as a prophet. He adviseth him by all means to surrender himself and his city "to the king of Babylon's princes;" Go forth to them, and make the best terms thou canst with them, ver. 17. This was the same advice he had given to the people, ver. 2, and before, ch. xxi. 9, to submit to Divine judgments, and not think of contending with them. Note, In dealing with God, that which is good counsel to the meanest is so to the greatest; for there is no respect of persons with him. To persuade him to take this counsel, he sets before him good and evil, life and death. 1. If he will tamely yield, he shall save his children from the sword, and Jerusalem from the flames. The white flag is yet hung out. If he will but acknowledge God's justice, he shall experience his mercy; "The city shall not be burnt, and thou shalt live, and thy house." But, 2. If he will obstinately stand it out, it will be the ruin both of his house and Jerusalem, ver. 18. For when God judgeth, he will overcome. This is the case of sinners with God; let them humbly submit to his grace and government, and they shall live; let them "take hold on his strength, that they may make peace, and they shall make peace;" but if they harden their hearts against his proposals, it will certainly be to their destruction. They must either bend or break.

Fourthly. The objection which Zedekiah made against the prophet's advice, ver. 19. Jeremiah spoke to him by prophecy, in the name of God; and therefore, if he had had a due regard to the Divine authority, wisdom, and goodness, as soon as he understood what the mind of God was, he should immediately have acquiesced in it, and resolved to observe it without disputing. But, as if it had been the dictate only of Jeremiah's prudence, he advanceth against it some prudential considerations of his own. But human wisdom is folly when it contradicts the Divine counsels. All he suggests is, "I am afraid," not of the Chaldeans,—their princes are men of honour,—but "of the Jews," that are already gone over to the Chaldeans; when they see me follow them, who had so much opposed their going, they will laugh at me, and say, "Art thou also become weak as water?" Isa. xiv. 10. Now, 1. It was not at all likely that he should be thus exposed and ridiculed, that the Chaldeans should so far gratify the Jews, or trample upon him, as to deliver him into their hands; nor that the Jews, who were themselves captives, should be in such a gay humour as to make a jest of the misery of their prince. Note, We often frighten ourselves from our duty by foolish, causeless, groundless fears, that are merely the creatures of our own fancy and imagination. 2. If he should be taunted a little by the Jews, could he not despise it and make light of it? What harm would it do him? Note, Those have very weak and fretful spirits indeed that cannot be laughed at, for that which is both their duty and their interest. 3 Though it had been really the greatest personal mischief that he could have imagined it to be, yet he ought to have ventured it in obedience to God, and for the preservation of his family and city. He thought it would be looked upon as a piece of cowardice to surrender; whereas it would be really an instance of true courage cheerfully to bear a lesser evil, the mocking of the Jews, for the avoiding of a greater, the ruin of his family and kingdom.

Fifthly. The pressing importunity with which Jeremiah followed the advice he had given the king. He assures him that, if he would comply with the will of God herein, the thing he feared should not come upon him; ver. 29, "They shall not deliver thee up," but treat thee as becomes thy character. He begs of him, after all the foolish games he had played, to manage wisely the last stake, and now at length do well for himself. "Obey, I beseech thee, the voice of the Lord," because it is his voice, "so it shall be well unto thee." But he tells him what would be the consequence if he would not obey: 1. He himself would fall into the hands of the Chaldeans, as implacable enemies, whom he might now make his friends by throwing himself into their hands. If he must fall, he should contrive how to fall easily. "Thou shalt not escape," as thou hopest to do, ver. 23. 2. He would himself be chargeable with the destruction of Jerusalem, which he pretended a concern for the preservation of; "Thou shalt cause this city to be burnt with fire;" for by a little submission and self-denial thou mightest have prevented it. Thus subjects often suffer for the pride and wilfulness of their rulers, who should be their protectors, but prove their destroyers. 3. Whereas he causelessly feared an unjust reproach for surrendering, he should certainly fall under a just reproach for standing it out, and that from women too, ver. 22. The court ladies that were left when Jehoiakim and Jeconiah were carried away, will now at length fall into the hands of the enemy, and they shall say, 'The men of thy peace,' whom thou didst consult with, and confide in, and who promised thee peace if thou wouldst be ruled by them, they have set thee on, have encouraged thee to be bold and brave, and hold out to the last extremity, and see what comes of it? They, by prevailing upon thee, have prevailed against thee, and thou findest those thy real enemies that would be thought thine only friends. Now "thy feet are sunk in the mire," thou art embarrassed, and hast no way to help thyself; thy feet cannot get forward, but are turned away back. Thus will Zedekiah be bantered by the women, when all his wives and children shall be made a prey to the conquerors, ver. 23. Note, That what we seek to avoid by sin will be justly brought upon us by the righteousness of God. And those that decline the way of duty, for fear of reproach, will certainly meet with much greater reproach in the way of disobedience. "The fear of the wicked it shall come upon him," Pr. x. 24.

Sixthly. The care which Zedekiah took to keep this conference private; ver. 24, "Let no man know of these words." He doth not at all incline to take God's counsel, nor so much as promise to consider of it; for so obstinate has he been to the calls of God, and so wilful in the ways of sin, that, though he has good counsel given him, he seems to be given up to walk in his own counsels. He hath nothing to object against Jeremiah's advice, and yet he will not follow it. Many hear God's words, but will not do them.

1. Jeremiah is charged to let no man know of what had passed between the king and him. Zedekiah is concerned to keep it private, not so much for Jeremiah's safety, (for he knew the princes could do him no hurt without his permission,) but for his own reputation. Note, Many have really a better affection to good men and good things than they are willing to own. God's prophets are manifest in their consciences, 2 Cor. v. 11, but they care not for manifesting that to the world; they would rather do them a kindness than have it known that they do. Such, it is to be feared, "love the praise of man more than the praise of God."

2. He is instructed what to say to the princes if they should examine him about it. He must tell them that he was petitioning the king not to remand him to "the house of Jonathan the scribe," ver. 25, 26; and he did tell them so, ver. 27; and, no doubt, it was true. He would not let slip so fair an opportunity of engaging the king's favour; so that this was no lie or equivocation, but a part of the truth, which it was lawful for him to put them off with when he was under no obligation at all to tell them the whole truth. Note, Though we must be so harmless as doves as never to tell a lie, yet we must be so wise as serpents as not needlessly to expose ourselves to danger by telling all we know.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

As the prophet Isaiah, after he had largely foretold the deliverance of Jerusalem out of the hands of the king of Assyria, gave a particular narrative of the story, that it might appear how exactly the event answered the prediction, so the prophet Jeremiah, after he had largely foretold the delivering of Jerusalem into the hands of the king of Babylon, gives a particular account of that sad event, for the same reason. That melancholy story we have in this chapter, which serves to disprove the false flattering prophets, and to confirm the word of God's messengers. We are here told, I. That Jerusalem, after eighteen months' siege, was taken by the Chaldean army, ver. 1—3. II. That king Zedekiah, attempting to make his escape, was seized, and made a miserable captive to the king of Babylon, ver. 4—7. III. That Jerusalem was burnt to the ground, and the people carried captive, except the poor, ver. 8—10. IV. That the Chaldeans were very kind to Jeremiah, and took particular care of him, ver. 11—14. V. That Ebed-melech too, for his kindness, had a protection from God himself in this day of desolation, ver. 15—18.

IN the ninth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the tenth month, came Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon and all his army against Jerusalem, and they besieged it. 2 And in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, in the fourth month, the ninth day of the month, the city was broken up. 3 And all the princes of the king of Babylon came in, and sat in the middle gate, even Nergal-sharezer, Samgar-nebo, Sarsechim, Rab-saris, Nergal-sharezer, Rab-mag, with all the residue of the princes of the king of Babylon. 4 And it came to pass, that when Zedekiah the king of Judah saw them, and all the men of war, then they fled, and went forth out of the city by night, by the way of the king's garden, by the gate betwixt the two walls: and he went out the way of the plain. 5 But the Chaldeans' army pursued after them, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho: and when they had taken him, they brought him up to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon to Riblah in the land of Hamath, where he gave judgment upon him. 6 Then the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah in Riblah before his eyes: also the king of Babylon slew all the nobles of Judah. 7 Moreover he put out Zedekiah's eyes and bound him with chains, to carry him to officer need excite no surprise, as it is not an uncommon thing in the East even at the present day. Jeremiah's prison was a pit or cellar with recesses or cells, called "cabins" in the authorised version.

xxxvii. 21. The "court of the prison" to which Jeremiah was removed is properly the "court of the guard," and was connected with the palace (Neh. iii. 25). It was probably occupied by soldiers on duty at the palace. The "bakers' street" was so called because chiefly frequented by bakers. Dr. Kitto says it is customary in the East even now for persons of the same trade to carry on their business in the same street. Nor is this unknown among ourselves.

xxxviii. 6. The word Hammelech literally means "the king," and we see no reason why it should be otherwise translated: "Malchiah, the son of the king." The dungeon was a pit or tank without water, but containing a deposit of mud. It was no ordinary prison.

xxxviii. 7. Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, or Cushite as the Hebrew calls him, was no doubt a slave, and very likely employed in taking Babylon. 8 And the Chaldeans burned the king's house, and the houses of the people, with fire, and brake down the walls of Jerusalem. 9 Then Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carried away captive into Babylon the remnant of the people that remained in the city, and those that fell away, that fell to him, with the rest of the people that remained. 10 But Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard left of the poor of the people, which had nothing, in the land of Judah, and gave them vineyards and fields at the same time.

We are told in the close of the foregoing chapter, that Jeremiah abode patiently "in the court of the prison till the day that Jerusalem was taken." He gave the princes no farther disturbance by his prophesying, nor they him by their persecutions; for he had no more to say than what he had said, and the siege being carried on briskly God found them other work to do. And see here what it came to.

First. The city is at length taken by storm, for how could it hold out when God himself fought against it? Nebuchadnezzar's army sat down before it in the ninth year of Zedekiah, in the tenth month, ver. 1, in the depth of winter. Nebuchadnezzar himself soon after retired to take his pleasure, and left his generals to carry on the siege; they intermitted it a while, but soon renewed it with redoubled force and vigour. At length, in the eleventh year, in the fourth month, about midsummer, they entered the city, the soldiers being so weakened with famine, and all their provisions being now spent, that they were not able to make any resistance, ver. 2. Jerusalem was so strong a place, that nobody would have believed the enemy could ever have entered its gates, Lam. iv. 12. But sin had provoked God to withdraw his protection, and then, like Samson when his hair is cut, it is weak as other cities.

Secondly. The princes of the king of Babylon take possession of the middle gate, ver. 3. Some think it was the same with that which is called the second gate, Zep. i. 10, which is supposed to be in the middle wall that divided between one part of the city and the other. Here they cautiously made a halt, and durst not go forward into so large a city, among men that perhaps would sell their lives as dear as they could, till they had given directions for the searching of all places, that they might not be surprised by any ambush. They sat in the middle gate, from thence to take a view of the city, and give orders. The princes are here named; rough and uncouth names they are, to intimate what a sad change sin had made. There where Eliakim and Hilkiah, who bare the name of the God of Israel, used to sit, now sit Nergal-sharezer and Samgar-nebo, &c., who bear the names of the heathen gods. Rab-saris and Rab-mag are supposed to be, not the names of distinct persons, but the titles of those whose names go before; Sarsechim was Rab-saris, that is, captain of the guard; and Nergal-sharezer, to distinguish him from the other of the same name that is put first, is called Rab-mag, camp-master, either muster-master or quarter-master. These and other the great generals sat in the gate. And now was fulfilled what Jeremiah prophesied long since, ch. i. 15, that the families of the kingdoms of the north should set every one his throne at the entering of the gates of Jerusalem. Justly do the princes of the heathen set up themselves there where the gods of the heathen had been so often set up.

Thirdly. Zedekiah having, in disguise perhaps, seen the princes of the king of Babylon take possession of one of the gates of the city, thought it high time to shift for his own safety; and, loaded with guilt and fear, he went out of the city, under no other protection but that of the night, ver. 4, which soon failed him, for he was discovered, pursued, overtaken. Though he made the best of his way, he could make nothing of it, could not get forward, but in the plains of Jericho fell into the hands of the pursuers, ver. 5; thence he was brought prisoner to Riblah, where the king of Babylon passed sentence upon him as a rebel, not sentence of death, but, one may almost say, a worse thing. For, 1. He slew his sons before his eyes, and they must all be little, some of them infants, for Zedekiah himself was now but thirty-two years of age. The deaths of these sweet babes must needs be so many deaths to himself, especially when he considered that his own obstinacy was the cause of it; for he was particularly told of this thing, ch. xxxviii. 23, "They shall bring forth thy wives and children to the Chaldeans." 2. He slew all the nobles of Judah, ver. 6; probably not those princes of Jerusalem who had advised him to this desperate course, (it would be a satisfaction to him to see them cut off,) but the great men of the country who were innocent of the matter. 3. He ordered Zedekiah to have his eyes put out, ver. 7; so condemning him to darkness for life who had shut his eyes against the clear light of God's word, and was of those princes who will not understand, but walk in darkness, Ps. viii. 5. 4. He bound him with two 'brazen chains or fetters,' so the margin reads it, to carry him to Babylon, there to spend the rest of his days in misery. All this sad story we had before, 2 Kin. xxv. 4, &c.

Fourthly. Some time after, the city was burnt, temple, and palace, and all, and the wall of it broken down, ver. 8. O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, this comes of killing the prophets, and stoning them that were sent to thee! O Zedekiah, Zedekiah, this thou mightest have prevented, if thou wouldest but have taken God's counsel, and yielded in time!

Fifthly. The people that were left were all carried captives to Babylon, ver. 9. Now they must bid a final farewell to the land of their nativity, that pleasant land, and to all their possessions and enjoyments in it; must be driven some hundreds of miles like beasts before their conquerors, that were now their cruel masters; must lie at their mercy in a strange land, and be servants to them who would be sure to rule them with rigour. The word tyrant is originally a Chaldee word, and is often used for lords by the Chaldee paraphrast, as if the Chaldeans, when they were lords, tyrannized more than any other. We have reason to think the poor Jews had reason to say so. Some few were left behind, but they were the poor of the people, that had nothing to lose, and therefore never made any resistance. And they not only had their liberty, and were left to tarry at home, but "the captain of the guard gave them vineyards and fields at the same time," such as they never were masters of before, ver. 10. Observe here, 1. The wonderful changes of providence. Some are abased, others advanced, 1 Sam. ii. 5; "the hungry filled with good things, and the rich sent empty away." The ruin of some proves the rise of others. Let us therefore rejoice as though we rejoiced not in our abundance, and weep as though we wept not in our distresses. 2. The just retributions of providence. The rich had been proud oppressors and now they are justly punished for their injustice; the poor had been patient sufferers, and now they are graciously rewarded for their patience, and amends made them for all their losses; for "verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth," even in this world, much more in the other.

11 Now Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon gave charge concerning Jeremiah to Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard, saying, 12 Take him, and look well to him, and do him no harm; but do unto him even as he shall say unto thee. 13 So Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard sent, and Nebushasban, Rab-saris, and Nergal-sharezer, Rab-mag, and all the king of Babylon's princes; 14 Even they sent, and took Jeremiah out of the court of the prison, and committed him unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, that he should carry him home: so he dwelt among the people. 15 Now the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah, while he was shut up in the court of the prison, saying, 16 Go and speak to Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, saying,

Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Behold, I will bring my words upon this city
For evil, and not for good;
And they shall be accomplished in that day before thee.
17 But I will deliver thee in that day, saith the LORD:
And thou shalt not be given into the hand
Of the men of whom thou art afraid.
18 For I will surely deliver thee,
And thou shalt not fall by the sword,
But thy life shall be for a prey unto thee:
Because thou hast put thy trust in me, saith the LORD.

Here we must sing of mercy, as in the former part of the chapter we sung of judgment, and must sing unto God of both. We may observe here,

First. A gracious providence concerning Jeremiah. When Jerusalem was laid in ruins, and all men's hearts failed them for fear, then might he lift up his head with comfort, knowing that his redemption drew nigh; as Christ's followers, when the second destruction of Jerusalem was hastening on, Lu. xxi. 28. Nebuchadnezzar had given particular orders that care should be taken of him, and he should be in all respects well used, ver. 11, 12. Nebuzar-adan, and the rest of the king of Babylon's princes observed these orders, discharged him out of prison, and did every thing to make him easy. Now we may look upon this,

1. As a very generous act in Nebuchadnezzar, who, though he was a haughty potentate, yet took cognizance of this poor prophet. Doubtless he had received information concerning him from the deserters, that he had foretold the king of Babylon's successes against Judah and other countries, that he had pressed his prince and people to submit to him, and that he had suffered very hard things for so doing; and in consideration of all this (though perhaps he might have heard also that he had foretold the destruction of Babylon at length) he gave him these extraordinary marks of his favour. Note, It is the character of a great soul to take notice of the services and sufferings of the meanest. It was honourably done of the king to give this charge, even before the city was taken, and of the captains to observe it, even in the heat of action, and it is recorded for imitation.

2. As a reproach to Zedekiah and the princes of Israel; they put him into prison, and the king of Babylon and his princes took him out. God's people and ministers have often found fairer and kinder usage among strangers and infidels, than among those that call themselves of the holy city. St. Paul found more favour and justice with king Agrippa than with Ananias the high priest.

3. As the performance of God's promise to Jeremiah, in recompence for his services; ch. xv. 11, "I will cause the enemy to treat thee well in the day of evil." Jeremiah had been faithful to his trust as a prophet, and now God approves himself faithful to him, and the promise he had made him. Now he is comforted according to the time wherein he had been afflicted, and sees thousands fall on each hand, and himself safe. The false prophets fell by those judgments which they said should never come, ch. xiv. 15; which made their misery the more terrible to them. The true prophet escaped those judgments which he said would come, and that made his escape the more comfortable to him. The same that were the instruments of punishing the persecutors were the instruments of relieving the persecuted; and Jeremiah thought never the worse of his deliverance for its coming by the hand of the king of Babylon, but saw the more of the hand of God in it. A fuller account of this matter we shall meet with in the next chapter.

Secondly. A gracious message to Ebed-melech, to assure him of a recompence for his kindness to Jeremiah. This message was sent him by Jeremiah himself, who, when he returned him thanks for his kindness to him, thus turned him over to God to be his paymaster. He relieved a prophet in the name of a prophet, and thus he had a prophet's reward. This message was delivered to him immediately after he had done that kindness to Jeremiah; but it is mentioned here after the taking of the city, to shew that, as God was kind to Jeremiah at that time, so he was to Ebed-melech for his sake, and it was a token of special favour to both; and they ought so to account it, that they were not involved in any of the common calamities. Jeremiah is bid to tell him, 1. That God would certainly bring upon Jerusalem the ruin that had been long and often threatened; and for his farther satisfaction in having been kind to Jerecare of the women's apartments, as eunuchs still are in Oriental countries, where also they are commonly Ethiopians or blacks.

xxxviii. 9. The failure of the bread shows that the siege had now continued for some time, and that the famine Jeremiah predicted had begun.

xxxviii. 11. For "old cast clouts and old rotten rags" we may translate, with Henderson, "old torn clothes, and old worn-out garments."

xxxviii. 14. It is not easy to decide what that was which is here called "the third entry" or entrance; but we do not think the phrase can be rendered "the principal entry," as some have thought. Probably there were various entrances or lobbies attached to the Temple, one of which, here called the third, was chosen by the king, because of its privacy, for his interview with Jeremiah.

xxxviii. 15. The last clause, here rendered as a question, should rather be an affirmation: "thou wilt not hearken unto me."

miah, he should see him abundantly proved a true prophet, ver. 16. 2. That God took notice of the fear he had of the judgments coming. Though he was bravely bold in the service of God, yet he was afraid of the rod of God. The enemies were men of whom he was afraid. Note, God knows how to adapt and accommodate his comforts to the fears and griefs of his people, for he knows their souls in adversity. 3. That he shall be delivered from having a share in the common calamity; "I will deliver thee, I will surely deliver thee." He had been instrumental to deliver God's prophet out of the dungeon, and now God promised to deliver him, for he will be behindhand with none for any service they do, directly or indirectly, for his name. Thou hast saved Jeremiah's life, that was precious to thee, and therefore thy life shall be given thee for a prey. 4. The reason given for this distinguishing favour God had in store for him is, "Because thou hast put thy trust in me, saith the Lord." God, in recompensing men's services, has an eye to the principle they go upon in those services, and rewards according to those principles. And there is no principle of obedience that will be more acceptable to God, nor have a greater influence upon us, than a believing confidence in God. Ebed-melech trusted in God, that he would own him and stand by him, and then he was not afraid of the face of man. And those who trust God as this good man did in the way of duty will find that their hope shall not make them ashamed in times of the greatest danger.

CHAPTER XL.

We have attended Jerusalem's funeral pile, and have taken our leave of the captives that were carried to Babylon, not expecting to hear any more of them in this book, (perhaps we may in Ezekiel,) and must in this and the following chapters observe the story of the few Jews that were left to remain in the land, after their brethren were carried away; and it is a very melancholy story. For, though at first there were some hopeful prospects of their well-doing, they soon appeared as obstinate in sin as ever, unhumbled, unreformed, till all the rest of the judgments threatened in Deu. xxviii. being brought upon them, that which in the last verse of that dreadful chapter completes the threatenings was accomplished, "The Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again." In this chapter we have, I. A more particular account of Jeremiah's discharge, and his settlement with Gedaliah, ver. 1—6. II. The great resort of the Jews that remained scattered in the neighbouring countries to Gedaliah, who was made their governor, under the king of Babylon; and the good posture they were in for a while under him, ver. 7—12. III. A treacherous design formed against Gedaliah by Ishmael, which we shall find executed in the next chapter, ver. 13—16.

THE word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD, after that Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had let him go from Ramah, when he had taken him being bound in chains among all that were carried away captive of Jerusalem and Judah, which were carried away captive unto Babylon. 2 And the captain of the guard took Jeremiah, and said unto him, The LORD thy God hath pronounced this evil upon this place. 3 Now the LORD hath brought it, and done according as he hath said: because ye have sinned against the LORD, and have not obeyed his voice, therefore this thing is come upon you. 4 And now, behold, I loose thee this day from the chains which were upon thine hand. If it seem good unto thee to come with me into Babylon, come; and I will look well unto thee: but if it seem ill unto thee to come with me into Babylon, forbear: behold, all the land is before thee; whither it seemeth good and convenient for thee to go, thither go. 5 Now while he was not yet gone back, he said, Go back also to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, whom the king of Babylon hath made governor over the cities of Judah, and dwell with him among the people: or go wheresoever it seemeth convenient unto thee to go. So the captain of the guard gave him victuals and a reward, and let him go. 6 Then went Jeremiah unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to Mizpah; and dwelt with him among the people that were left in the land.

The title of this part of the book, which begins the chapter, seems misapplied, "The word which came to Jeremiah;" for here is nothing of prophecy in this chapter, but it is to be referred to ch. xlii. 7, where we have a message that God sent by Jeremiah to the captains and the people that remained, and the story betwixt, and that is only to introduce that prophecy and shew the occasion of it, that it may be the better understood; and Jeremiah, being himself concerned in the story, was the better able to give an account of it. In these verses we have Jeremiah's adhering, by the advice of Nebuzar-adan, to Gedaliah. It should seem that Jeremiah was very honourably fetched out of the court of the prison by the king of Babylon's princes, ch. xxxix. 15; but afterwards, being found among the people in the city, when orders were given to the inferior officers to bind all they found that were of any fashion, in order to their being carried captives to Babylon, he through ignorance and mistake was bound among the rest and hurried away. Poor man! he seems to have been born to hardship and abuse, a man of sorrows indeed. But when the captives were brought manacled to Ramah, not far off, where a counsel of war or court-martial was held, for giving orders concerning them, Jeremiah was soon distinguished from the rest, and by special order of the court was discharged.

First. The captain of the guard solemnly owns him to be a true prophet; ver. 2, 3, "The Lord thy God," whose messenger thou hast been, and in whose name thou hast spoken, "has" by thee "pronounced this evil upon this place;" they had fair warning given them of it, but they would not take the warning, and now "the Lord hath brought it," and as by thy mouth he said it so by my hand "he hath done what he said." He seems thus to justify what he had done, and to glory in it that he had been God's instrument to fulfil that which Jeremiah had been his messenger to foretell; and upon that account it was indeed the most glorious action he had ever done. He tells all the people that were now in chains before him, it was "because ye have sinned against the Lord that this thing is come upon you" The princes of Israel would never be brought to acknowledge this, though it was as evident as if it had been written with a sunbeam. But this heathen prince plainly sees it, that a people that had been so favoured as they had been by the Divine goodness would never have been abandoned thus had they not been very provoking. The people of Israel had been often told this from the pulpit by their prophets, and they would not regard it; now they are told it from the bench by their conqueror, whom they dare not contradict, and who will make them regard it. Note, Sooner or later men shall be made sensible that their sin is the cause of all their miseries.

Secondly. He gives him free leave to dispose of himself as he thought fit. He "loosed him from his chains," a second time, ver. 4, invited him to come along with him to Babylon, not as a captive, but as a friend, as a companion, and "I will set my eye upon thee,' (so the word is,) not only "I will look well to thee," but I will shew thee respect, will countenance thee, and will see that thou be safe and well provided for. But if he were not disposed to go to Babylon he might dwell where he pleased in his own country, for it was all now at the dispose of the conquerors; he may go to Anathoth if he please, and enjoy the field he had purchased there. A great change with this good man! He that but lately was tossed from one prison to another may now walk at liberty from one possession to another.

Thirdly. He adviseth him to go to Gedaliah, and settle with him. This Gedaliah was made governor of the land under the king of Babylon, an honest Jew, who, it is probable, betimes went over with his friends to the Chaldeans, and approved himself so well that he had this great trust put into his hands, ver. 5, while Jeremiah was not yet gone back, but stood considering what he should do. Nebuzar-adan, perceiving him neither inclined to go to Babylon nor determined whither to go, turned the scale for him, and bade him by all means go to Gedaliah. Sudden thoughts sometimes prove wise ones; but when he gave this counsel he did not design to oblige him by it, nor will he take it ill if he do not follow it, "Go wheresoever it seemeth convenient unto thee." It is friendly in such cases to give advice, but unfriendly to prescribe, and to be angry if our advice be not taken. Let Jeremiah steer what course he pleaseth, Nebuzar-adan will agree to it, and believe he doth for the best. Nor doth he only give him his liberty, and an approbation of the measures he shall take, but provides for his support, "he gave him victuals, and a present," either in clothes or money, and so let him go. See how considerate the captain of the guard was in his kindness to Jeremiah; he set him at liberty, but it was in a country that was laid waste, and in which, as the posture of it now was, he might have perished, though it was his own country, if he had not thus kindly furnished him with necessaries. Jeremiah not only accepted his kindness, but took his advice, and went to Gedaliah, to Mizpah, and dwelt with him, ver. 6. Whether we may herein commend his prudence I know not, the event doth not commend it, for it did not prove at all to his comfort. However, we may commend his pious affection to the land of Israel, that unless he were forced out of it as Ezekiel, and Daniel, and other good men were, he would not forsake it, but chose rather to dwell with the poor in the holy land than with princes in an unholy one.

7 Now when all the captains of the forces which were in the fields, even they and their men, heard that the king of Babylon had made Gedaliah the son of Ahikam governor in the land, and had committed unto him men, and women, and children, and of the poor of the land, of them that were not carried away captive to Babylon; 8 Then they came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, even Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and Johanan and Jonathan the sons of Kareah, and Seraiah the son of Tanhumeth, and the sons of Ephai the Netophathite, and Jezaniah the son of a Maachathite, they and their men. 9 And Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan sware unto them and to their men, saying, Fear not to serve the Chaldeans: dwell in the land, and serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you. 10 As for me, behold, I will dwell at Mizpah, to serve the Chaldeans, which will come unto us: but ye, gather ye wine, and summer fruits, and oil, and put them in your vessels, and dwell in your cities that ye have taken. 11 Likewise when all the Jews that were in Moab, and among the Ammonites, and xxxviii. 16. The words "that made us this soul" signify "that made this soul which is in us," or which we possess. (See in Isa. lvii. 16.)

xxxviii. 17. "If thou wilt assuredly" probably means "if thou wilt indeed;" though some take it to denote "voluntarily," i.e., of thine own accord. The suggestion that Zedekiah should surrender to the "princes" was because Nebuchadnezzar himself was absent at Riblah.

xxxviii. 22. The very women who would fall into the hands of the Chaldeans would use the language of insulting mockery over the fallen monarch to whose household they had belonged. He had listened to evil counsel, and come to trouble, and his advisers had abandoned him.

xxxviii. 28. The closing words, "and he was there when Jerusalem was taken," are omitted by the Greek and Syriac versions and some Hebrew MSS.

in Edom, and that were in all the countries, heard that the king of Babylon had left a remnant of Judah, and that he had set over them Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan; 12 Even all the Jews returned out of all places whither they were driven, and came to the land of Judah, to Gedaliah, unto Mizpah, and gathered wine and summer fruits very much. 13 Moreover Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were in the fields, came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, 14 And said unto him, Dost thou certainly know that Baalis the king of the Ammonites hath sent Ishmael the son of Nethaniah to slay thee? But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam believed them not. 15 Then Johanan the son of Kareah spake to Gedaliah in Mizpah secretly, saying, Let me go, I pray thee, and I will slay Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and no man shall know it: wherefore should he slay thee, that all the Jews which are gathered unto thee should be scattered, and the remnant in Judah perish? 16 But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam said unto Johanan the son of Kareah, Thou shalt not do this thing: for thou speakest falsely of Ishmael.

We have in these verses,

First. A bright sky opening upon the remnant of the Jews that were left in their own land, and a comfortable prospect given them of some peace and quietness after the many years of trouble and terror with which they had been afflicted. Jeremiah indeed had never, in his prophecies, spoken of any such good days reserved for the Jews immediately after the captivity. But Providence seemed to raise and encourage such an expectation, and it would be to that miserable people as life from the dead. Observe the particulars:

1. Gedaliah, one of themselves, is made governor in the land by the king of Babylon, ver. 7. To shew that he designed to make and keep them easy, he did not give this commission to one of the princes of Babylon, but to one of their brethren, who they might be sure would seek their peace. He was the son of Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, one of the princes. We read of his father, ch. xxvi. 24, that he took Jeremiah's part against the people. He seems to be a man of great wisdom and a mild temper, and under whose government the few that were left might be very happy. The king of Babylon had a good opinion of him, and reposed a confidence in him, for to him he committed all that were left behind.

2. There is a great resort to him from all parts, and all those that were now the Jews of the dispersion came and put themselves under his government and protection. 1st. The great men that had escaped the Chaldeans by force came and quietly submitted to Gedaliah, for their own safety and common preservation. Divers are here named, ver. 8; they came with their men, their servants, their soldiers, and so strengthened one another; and the king of Babylon had such a good opinion of Gedaliah, his delegate, that he was not at all jealous of the increase of their numbers, but rather pleased with it. 2nd. The poor men that had escaped by flight into the neighbouring countries of Moab, Ammon, and Edom, were induced, by the love they bare to their own land, to return to it again, as soon as they heard that Gedaliah was in authority there, ver. 11, 12. Canaan itself would be an unsafe, unpleasant country, if there was no government or governors there, and those that loved it dearly would not come back to it till they had heard there was. It would be a great reviving to them that were dispersed, to come together again; that were dispersed into foreign countries, to come together in their own country; that were under strange kings, to be under a governor of their own nation. See here, in wrath God remembered mercy, and admitted some of them upon a farther trial of their obedience.

3. The model of this new government is drawn up and settled by an original contract, which Gedaliah confirmed with an oath, a solemn oath; ver. 9, "He sware to them and to their men;" it is probable according to the warrant and instructions he had received from the king of Babylon, who empowered him to give them these assurances. 1st. They must own the property of their lands to be in the Chaldeans. Come, saith Gedaliah, "Fear not to serve the Chaldeans:" fear not the sin of it. Though the Divine law had forbidden them to make leagues with the heathen, yet the Divine sentence had obliged them to yield to the king of Babylon. Fear not the reproach of it and the disparagement it will be to your nation; it is what God has brought you to, has bound you to, and it is no disgrace to any to comply with him. Fear not the consequences of it, as if it would certainly make you and yours miserable; no, you will find the king of Babylon not so hard a landlord as you apprehend him to be. If you will but live peaceably, peaceably you shall live; disturb not the government, and it will not disturb you; "Serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you." If they should make any difficulty of doing personal homage, or should be apprehensive of danger when the Chaldeans should come among them, Gedaliah, probably by instruction from the king of Babylon, undertakes upon all occasions to act for them, and make their applications acceptable to the king; ver. 10, "As for me, behold I will dwell at Mizpah to serve the Chaldeans," to do homage to them in the name of the whole body, if there be occasion; to receive orders, and to pay them their tribute when they come to us. All that passed between them and the Chaldeans shall pass through his hand; and if the Chaldeans put such a confidence in him, surely his own countrymen may venture to do it. Gedaliah is willing thus to give them the assurance of an oath that he will do his part in protecting them; but being apt to err, as many men are, on the charitable side, he did not require an oath from them that they would be faithful to him, else the following mischief might have been prevented. However, protection draws allegiance, though it be not sworn; and by joining in with Gedaliah they did in effect consent to the terms of government, that they should serve the king of Babylon. But, 2nd. Though they own the property of their lands to be in the Chaldeans, yet upon that condition they shall have the free enjoyment of them, and all the profits of them; ver. 10, "Gather ye wine and summer fruits," and take them for your own use, "put them into your vessels," to be laid up for winter store, as those do that live in a land of peace, and hope to eat the labour of your hand; nay, the labour of other people's hands, for you reap what they sowed; nay, perhaps they were the spontaneous products of that fertile soil, for which none had laboured. And accordingly we find, ver. 12, that they gathered wine and summer fruits very much, such as were at present upon the ground, for their corn harvest was over some time before Jerusalem was taken. While Gedaliah was in care for the public safety, he left them to enjoy the advantages of the public plenty, and, for aught appears, demanded no tribute from them, for he sought not his own profit, but the profit of many.

Secondly. Here is a dark cloud gathering over this infant state, and threatening a dreadful storm. How soon is this hopeful prospect blasted! For when God begins in judgment he will make an end. It is here intimated to us,

1. That Baalis, the king of the Ammonites, had a particular spite at Gedaliah, and was contriving to take him off, either out of malice to the nation of the Jews, whose welfare he hated the thought of, or a personal pique against Gedaliah, ver. 14. Some make Baalis to signify the queen mother of the king of the Ammonites, or queen dowager, as if she were the first mover of this bloody and treacherous design. One would have thought this little remnant might have been safe when the great king of Babylon protected it, and yet it is ruined by the artifices of this petty prince or princess. Happy they that have the King of kings on their side, who can take the wise in their own craftiness; for the greatest earthly king cannot, with all his power, secure us against fraud and treachery.

2. That he employed Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, as the instrument of his malice, instigated him to murder Gedaliah, and, that he might have a fair opportunity to do it, directed him to go and enrol himself among his subjects and promise him fealty. Nothing could be more barbarous than the design itself, nor more base than the method of compassing it. How wretchedly is the human nature corrupted and degenerated, even in those that pretend to the best blood, when it is capable of admitting the thought of such abominable wickedness! Ishmael was of the seed-royal, and would therefore be easily tempted to envy and hate one that set up for a governor in Judah that was not, as he was, of David's line, though he were never so much of David's spirit.

3. That Johanan, a brisk and active man, having got scent of this plot, informed Gedaliah of it, yet taking it for granted he could not but know of it before, the proofs of the matter being so very plain: "Dost thou certainly know?" that is, sure thou dost, ver. 14. He gave him private intelligence of it, ver. 15, hoping he would then take the more notice of it. He proffered his service to prevent it by taking off Ishmael, whose very name was ominous to all the seed of Isaac; "I will slay him. Wherefore should he slay thee?" Herein he shewed more courage and zeal than sense of justice, for if it be lawful to kill for prevention who then can be safe, since malice always suspects the worst?

4. That Gedaliah, being a man of sincerity himself, would by no means give credit to the information given him of Ishmael's treachery; he said, "Thou speakest falsely of Ishmael." Herein he discovered more good humour than discretion, more of the innocency of the dove than the wisdom of the serpent. Princes become uneasy to themselves and all about them when they are jealous. Queen Elizabeth said she would believe no more evil by her people than a mother would believe by her own children; yet many have been ruined by being over confident of the fidelity of those about them.

CHAPTER XLI.

It is a very tragical story that is related in this chapter, and shews that evil pursues sinners. The black cloud that was gathering in the foregoing chapter here bursts in a dreadful storm. Those few Jews that escaped the captivity were proud to think that they were still in their own land, when their brethren were gone they knew not whither; were fond of the wine and summer fruits they had gathered, and were very secure under Gedaliah's protectorship, when on a sudden even these remains prove ruins too. I. Gedaliah is barbarously slain by Ishmael, ver. 1, 2. II. All the Jews that were with him were slain likewise, ver. 3, and a pit filled with their dead bodies, ver. 9. III. Some devout men, to the number of fourscore, that were going towards Jerusalem, were drawn in by Ishmael, and murdered likewise, ver. 4—7; only ten of them escaped, ver. 8. IV. Those that escaped the sword were taken prisoners by Ishmael, and carried off towards the country of the Ammonites, ver. 10. V. By the conduct and courage of Johanan, though the death of the slain is not revenged, yet the prisoners are recovered, and he now becomes their commander-in-chief, ver. 11—16. VI. His project is to carry them into the land of Egypt, ver. 17, 18; which we shall hear more of in the next chapter.

NOW it came to pass in the seventh month, that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah the son of Elishama, of the seed royal, and the princes of the king, even ten men with him, came unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to Mizpah; and there they did eat bread together in Mizpah. 2 Then arose Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and the ten men that were with him, and smote Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan with the sword, and slew him, whom the king of Babylon had made governor over the land. 3 Ishmael also slew all the Jews that were with him, even with Gedaliah, at Mizpah, and the Chaldeans that were found there, and the men of war. 4 And it came to pass the second day after he had slain Gedaliah, and no man knew it,

xxxix. 3. Jerusalem was two cities in one, divided by a wall which ran between them. The "middle gate" would be in this dividing wall. Among the Assyrian names here we find Rab-saris and Rab-mag, but they are now usually explained as titles of Sarsechim and the second Nergal-sharezer: "Sarsechim, chief of the eunuchs; Nergal-sharezer, chief of the magi." All these names belong to the language of the Assyrians, and two of them include the names of Nergal and Nebo, popular idols of that people.

xxxix. 4. When the Chaldeans had made a breach, and rushed through it into the city, Zedekiah and his chief men endeavoured to escape by slipping out of the city in the night, from the south-east side, and tried to reach Jericho and the Jordan by skirting the Mount of Olives. A road still runs in the same direction.

5 That there came certain from Shechem, from Shiloh, and from Samaria, even fourscore men, having their beards shaven, and their clothes rent, and having cut themselves, with offerings and incense in their hand, to bring them to the house of the LORD. 6 And Ishmael the son of Nethaniah went forth from Mizpah to meet them, weeping all along as he went: and it came to pass, as he met them, he said unto them, Come to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam. 7 And it was so, when they came into the midst of the city, that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah slew them, and cast them into the midst of the pit, he, and the men that were with him. 8 But ten men were found among them that said unto Ishmael, Slay us not: for we have treasures in the field, of wheat, and of barley, and of oil, and of honey. So he forbare, and slew them not among their brethren. 9 Now the pit wherein Ishmael had cast all the dead bodies of the men, whom he had slain because of Gedaliah, was it which Asa the king had made for fear of Baasha king of Israel: and Ishmael the son of Nethaniah filled it with them that were slain. 10 Then Ishmael carried away captive all the residue of the people that were in Mizpah, even the king's daughters, and all the people that remained in Mizpah, whom Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had committed to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam: and Ishmael the son of Nethaniah carried them away captive, and departed to go over to the Ammonites.

It is hard to say which is more astonishing, God's permitting, or men's perpetrating, such villanies as here we find committed. Such base, barbarous, bloody work is here done by men who by their birth should have been men of honour, by their religion just men; and this done upon those of their own nature, their own nation, their own religion, and now their brethren in affliction, when they were all brought under the power of the victorious Chaldeans, and smarting under the judgments of God, upon no provocation, nor with any prospect of advantage; all done, not only in cold blood, but with art and management. We have scarce such an instance of perfidious cruelty in all the Scripture; so that, with John, when he saw the woman drunk with the blood of the saints, we may well wonder with great admiration. But God permitted it for the completing of the ruin of an unhumbled people, and the filling up of the measure of their judgments who had filled up the measures of their iniquities. Let it possess us with an indignation at the wickedness of men, and an awe of God's righteousness.

First. Ishmael and his party treacherously killed Gedaliah himself in the first place. Though the king of Babylon had made him a great man, had given him a commission to be governor of the land which he had conquered, though God had made him a good man, and a great blessing to his country, and his agency for its welfare was as life from the dead, yet neither could secure him. Ishmael was of the seed-royal, ver. 1, and therefore jealous of Gedaliah's growing greatness, and enraged that he should merit and accept a commission under the king of Babylon. He had ten men with him, that were princes of the king too, guided by the same peevish resentments that he was. These had been with Gedaliah before, to put themselves under his protection, ch. xl. 8, and now again to make him a visit; and "they did eat bread together in Mizpah." He entertained them generously, and entertained no jealousy of them notwithstanding the information given him by Johanan. They pretended friendship to him, and gave him no warning to stand on his guard; he was in sincerity friendly to them, and did all he could to oblige them; but they that did eat bread with him lift up the heel against him. They did not pick a quarrel with him, but watched an opportunity, when they had him alone, and assassinated him, ver. 2.

Secondly. They likewise put all to the sword that they found in arms there, both Jews and Chaldeans, all that were employed under Gedaliah, or were in any capacity to revenge his death, ver. 3. As if enough of the blood of Israelites had not been shed by the Chaldeans, their own princes here mingle it with the blood of the Chaldeans. The vinedressers and the husbandmen were busy in the fields and knew nothing of this bloody massacre, so artfully was it carried on and concealed.

Thirdly. Some good, honest men, that were going all in tears to lament the desolations of Jerusalem, were drawn in by Ishmael, and murdered with the rest. Observe, 1. From whence they came, ver. 5. From Shechem, Samaria, and Shiloh, places that had been famous, but were now reduced; they belonged to the ten tribes, but there were some in those countries that retained an affection for the worship of the God of Israel. 2. Whither they were going. To the house of the Lord, the temple at Jerusalem, which no doubt they had heard of the destruction of, and were going to pay their repects to its ashes, to see its ruins, that their eye might affect their heart with sorrow for them. They favour the dust thereof, Ps. cii. 14. They took offerings and incense in their hand, that if they should find any altar there, though it were but an altar of earth, and any priest ready to officiate, they might not be without something to offer; if not, yet they shewed their good-will, as Abraham when he came to the place of the altar, though the altar was gone. The people of God used to go rejoicing to the house of the Lord; but these went in the habit of mourners, with "their beards shaven, and their clothes rent;" for the providence of God loudly "called to weeping and mourning," because it was not with the faithful worshippers of God as in months past. 2. How they were decoyed into a fatal snare by Ishmael's malice. Hearing of their approach, he resolved to be the death of them too. So bloodthirsty was he, he seemed as if he hated every one that had the name of an Israelite, or the face of an honest man; these pilgrims towards Jerusalem he had a spite to, for the sake of their errand. Ishmael went out to meet them with crocodile's tears, pretending to bewail the desolations of Jerusalem as much as they; and, to try how they stood affected to Gedaliah and his government, he courted them into the town, and found them to have a respect for him, which confirmed him in his resolution to murder them. "He said, Come to Gedaliah," pretending he would have them come and live with him, when really he intended they should come and die with him, ver. 6. They had heard such a character of Gedaliah, that they were willing enough to be acquainted with him; but Ishmael, when he had them in the midst of the town, fell upon them and slew them, ver. 7, and no doubt took the offerings they had, and converted them to his own use; for he that would not stick at such a murder would not stick at sacrilege. Notice is taken of his disposing of the dead bodies of these and the rest that he had slain; he tumbled them all into a great pit, ver. 7, the same pit that Asa king of Judah had digged long before, either in the city or adjoining to it, when he built or fortified Mizpah, 1 Kin. xi. 22, to be a frontier garrison against Baasha king of Israel, and for fear of him, ver. 9. Note, Those that dig pits with a good intention, yet know not what ill use they may be put to one time or other. He slew so many, that he could not afford them each a grave, or would not do them so much honour, but threw them all promiscuously into one pit.

Among these last that were doomed to the slaughter there were ten that obtained a pardon by working, not on the compassion, but the covetousness of those that had them at their mercy, ver. 8. They said to Ishmael, when he was about to suck their blood like an insatiable horse-leech, after that of their companions, "Slay us not, for we have treasures in the field;" that is, country treasures, large stocks upon the ground, abundance of such commodities as the country affords, "wheat and barley, and oil and honey;" intimating that they would discover it to him, and put him in possession of it all, if he would spare them. "Skin for skin, and all that a man has will he give for his life." This bait prevailed; Ishmael saved them, not for the love of mercy, but the love of money. Here were riches kept for the owners thereof, not to their hurt, Eccl. v. 13, and to cause them to lose their lives, Job xxxi. 39, but to their good, and the preserving of their lives. Solomon observes, that sometimes "the ransom of a man's life is his riches." But those who think thus to bribe death when it comes with commission, and plead with it, saying, "Slay us not, for we have treasures in the field," will find death inexorable, and themselves wretchedly deceived.

Fourthly. He carried off the people prisoners. "The king's daughters," whom the Chaldeans cared not for troubling themselves with when they had the king's sons, and the poor of the land, "the vinedressers and husbandmen," that were committed to Gedaliah's charge, were all led away prisoners, towards "the country of the Ammonites," ver. 10; Ishmael probably intending to make a present of them, as the trophies of his barbarous victory, to the king of that country, that set him on. This melancholy story is a warning to us never to be secure in this world. Worse may be yet to come then when we think the worst is over; and that end of one trouble, which we fancy to be the end of all trouble, may prove to be the beginning of another, of a greater. These here thought, "Surely the bitterness of death," and of captivity, "is past;" and yet some died by the sword, and others went into captivity. When we think ourselves safe, and begin to be easy, destruction may come that way that we little expected it. There is many a ship wrecked in the harbour. We can never be sure of peace on this side heaven.

11 But when Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, heard of all the evil that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had done, 12 Then they took all the men, and went to fight with Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and found him by the great waters that are in Gibeon. 13 Now it came to pass, that when all the people which were with Ishmael saw Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, then they were glad. 14 So all the people that Ishmael had carried away captive from Mizpah cast about and returned, and went unto Johanan the son of Kareah. 15 But Ishmael the son of Nethaniah escaped from Johanan with eight men, and went to the Ammonites. 16 Then took Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, all the remnant of the people whom he had recovered from Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, from Mizpah, after that he had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, even mighty men of war, and the women, and the children, and the eunuchs, whom he had brought again from Gibeon: 17 And they departed, and dwelt in the habitation of Chimham, xxxix. 5. Zedekiah was captured in the waste places between Jericho and the Jordan, and was at once carried northwards to Riblah, near Hamath, where Nebuchadnezzar had his head-quarters, and judged the captives brought before him. That Riblah was converted into a huge slaughter-house is evident from the record, and is in exact accordance with the monuments of their brutality which the Assyrians have left amid the ruins of their cities. The site of Riblah still bears its ancient name.

xxxix. 6, 7. The statements made here are illustrated by the Assyrian monuments. The blinding of distinguished prisoners was a custom, as also was the fastening of their feet together, and of their hands together, by means of metal fetters. Prisoners thus manacled were of course helpless. The Hebrew here has "two fetters," i.e., one for the hands and another for the feet.

xxxix. 8. The Chaldeans burned the city; and even this is shown by their sculptures to have been one of their inhuman practices.

which is by Beth-lehem, to go to enter into Egypt, 18 Because of the Chaldeans: for they were afraid of them, because Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, whom the king of Babylon made governor in the land.

It had been well if Johanan, when he gave information to Gedaliah of Ishmael's treasonable design, though he could not obtain leave to go kill Ishmael, and so prevent it that way, yet had stayed with Gedaliah; for he and his captains and their forces might have been a life-guard to Gedaliah, and a terror to Ishmael, and so have prevented the mischief without the effusion of blood. But it seems they were out upon some expedition, perhaps no good one, and so were out of the way when they should have been upon the best service. Those that affect to ramble are many times out of their place when they are most needed. However, at length they hear of "all the evil that Ishmael had done," ver. 11, and are resolved to try an after-game, which we have an account of in these verses.

First. We heartily wish Johanan could have taken revenge upon the murderers; but he prevailed only to rescue the captives. They that had shed so much blood, it was pity but their blood should have been shed, and it is strange that vengeance suffered them to live; yet it did. Johanan gathered what forces he could, and went to fight with Ishmael, ver. 12, upon the notice of the murders he had committed,—for though he concealed it for a time, (ver. 4,) yet murder will out,—and which way he was gone; he pursued him, and overtook him by the pool of Gibeon, which we read of, 2 Sam. ii. 13. And upon his appearing with such a force Ishmael's heart failed him, his guilty conscience flew in his face, and he durst not stand his ground against an enemy that was something like a match for him. The most cruel are often the most cowardly. The poor captives were glad when they saw Johanan, and the captains that were with him, looking upon them as their deliverers, ver. 13; and they presently found a way to wheel about, and come over to them, ver. 14, Ishmael not offering to detain them when he saw Johanan. Note, Those that would be helped must help themselves. These captives stayed not till their conquerors were beaten, but took the first opportunity to make their escape as soon as they saw their friends appear and their enemies thereby disheartened. Ishmael quitted his prey to save his life, and escaped with eight men, ver. 15. It seems two of his ten men, that were his banditti, or assassins, spoken of ver. 1, either overrun him or were killed in the engagement; but he made the best of his way to the Ammonites, as a perfect renegado, that had quite abandoned all relation to the commonwealth of Israel, though he was of the seed-royal, and we hear no more of him.

Secondly. We heartily wish that Johanan, when he had rescued the captives, would have sitten down quietly with them, and governed them peaceably as Gedaliah did; but, instead of that, he is for leading them such a trace into the land of Egypt as Ishmael would have led them into the land of the Ammonites; so that, though he got the command over them in a better way than Ishmael did, and honestly enough, yet he did not use it much better. Gedaliah, who was of a meek and quiet spirit, was a great blessing to them; but Johanan, who was of a fierce and restless spirit, was set over them for their hurt; and to complete their ruin, even after they were as they thought redeemed. Thus did God still walk contrary to them. 1. The resolution of Johanan and the captains was very rash; nothing would serve them but they would go to enter into Egypt, ver. 17, and in order to that they encamped for a time in the habitation of Chimham, by Bethlehem, David's city. Probably it was some land which David gave to Chimham, the son of Barzillai, which, though it returned to David's family at the year of jubilee, yet still bore the name of Chimham. Here Johanan made his head-quarters, steering his course towards Egypt; either from a personal affection to that country, or ancient national confidence in the Egyptians for help in distress. Some of the mighty men of war, it seems, had escaped; those he took with him, and the women and children, whom he had recovered from Ishmael, who were thus emptied from vessel to vessel, because they were yet unchanged. 2. The reason for this resolution was very frivolous. They pretended they were afraid of the Chaldeans, that they would come and do I know not what with them, because Ishmael had killed Gedaliah, ver. 18. I cannot think they really had any apprehensions of danger upon this account; for though it is true the Chaldeans had cause enough to resent the murder of their viceroy, yet they were not so unreasonable or unjust as to revenge it upon those who appeared so vigorously against the murderers. But they only make use of this as a sham to cover that corrupt inclination of their unbelieving ancestors, which was so strong in them to return into Egypt. Those will justly lose their comfort in real fears that excuse themselves in sin with pretended fears.

CHAPTER XLII.

Johanan and the captains, being strongly bent upon going into Egypt, either their affections or politics advising them to take that course, they had a great desire that God should direct them to do so too; like Balaam, who, when he was determined to go curse Israel, asked God leave. Here is, I. The fair bargain that was made between Jeremiah and them, about consulting God in this matter, ver. 1—6. II. The message at large which God sent them, in answer to their inquiry; in which, 1. They are commanded and encouraged to continue in the land of Judah, and assured that if they did so it should be well with them, ver. 7—12. 2. They are forbidden to go to Egypt, and are plainly told that if they did it would be their ruin, ver. 13—18. 3. They are charged with dissimulation, in their asking what God's will was in this matter, and disobedience when they were told what it was; and sentence is passed upon them for it, ver. 19—22.

THEN all the captains of the forces, and Johanan the son of Kareah, and Jezaniah the son of Hoshaiah, and all the people from the least even unto the greatest, came near, 2 And said unto Jeremiah the prophet, Let, we beseech thee, our supplication be accepted before thee, and pray for us unto the LORD thy God, even for all this remnant; (for we are left but a few of many, as thine eyes do behold us:) 3 That the LORD thy God may shew us the way wherein we walk, and the thing that we may do. 4 Then Jeremiah the prophet said unto them, I have heard you; behold, I will pray unto the LORD your God according to your words; and it shall come to pass, that whatsoever thing the LORD shall answer you, I will declare it unto you; I will keep nothing back from you. 5 Then they said to Jeremiah, The LORD be a true and faithful witness between us, if we do not even according to all things for the which the LORD thy God shall send thee to us. 6 Whether it be good, or whether it be evil, we will obey the voice of the LORD our God, to whom we send thee; that it may be well with us, when we obey the voice of the LORD our God.

We have reason to wonder how Jeremiah the prophet escaped the sword of Ishmael; it seems he did, and it was not the first time that the Lord hid him. It is strange also that in these violent turns he was not consulted before now, and his advice asked and taken. But it should seem as if they knew not that a prophet was among them; though this people were as brands plucked out of the fire, yet they have not returned to the Lord. This people has a revolting and a rebellious heart; and contempt of God and his providence, God and his prophets, is still the sin that most easily besets them. But now, at length, to serve a turn, Jeremiah is sought out, and all the captains, Johanan himself not excepted, with all the people, from the least to the greatest, make him a visit. They came near, ver. 1; which intimates that hitherto they had kept at a distance from the prophet, and had been shy of him. Now here,

First. They desire him, by prayer, to ask direction from God what they should do in the present critical juncture, ver. 2, 3. They express themselves wonderful well. 1. With great respect to the prophet. Though he was poor and low, and under their command, yet they apply themselves to him with humility and submissiveness, as petitioners for his assistance, which yet they intimate their own unworthiness of; "Let, we beseech thee, our supplication be accepted before thee." They compliment him thus, in hopes to persuade him to say as they would have him say. 2. With a great opinion of his interest in heaven. "Pray for us," who know not how to pray for ourselves. Pray to the Lord thy God, for we are unworthy to call him ours, nor have we reason to expect any favour from him. 3. With a great sense of their need of Divine direction. They speak of themselves as objects of compassion; We are but a remnant, but a few of many; how easily will such a remnant be swallowed up, and yet it is pity they should. Thine eyes see what distress we are in, what a plunge we are at; if thou canst do any thing, help us. 4. With desire of a Divine conduct. Let the Lord thy God take this ruin into his thoughts, and under his hand, and shew us the way wherein we may walk, and may expect to have his presence with us, and the thing that we may do, the course we may take for our own safety. Note, In every difficult, doubtful case, our eye must be up to God for direction. They then might expect to be directed by a spirit of prophecy, which is now ceased; but we may still in faith pray to be guided by a spirit of wisdom in our hearts, and the hints of providence.

Secondly. Jeremiah faithfully promiseth them to pray for direction for them, and whatever message God should send to them by him he would deliver it to them just as he received it, without adding, altering, or diminishing, ver. 4. Ministers may hence learn, 1. Conscientiously to pray for those who desire their prayers; "I will pray for you, according to your words." Though they had slighted him, yet, like Samuel when he was slighted, he will not sin against the Lord, in ceasing to pray for them, 1 Sam. xii. 23. 2. Conscientiously to advise those who desire their advice, as near as they can to the mind of God; not keeping back any thing that is profitable for them, whether it be pleasing or no, but to declare to them the whole counsel of God, that they may approve themselves true to their trust.

Thirdly. They fairly promise that they will be governed by the will of God, as soon as they know what it is, ver. 5, 6, and they had the impudence to appeal to God concerning their sincerity herein, though at the same time they dissembled. "The Lord be a true and faithful witness between us;" that is, Do thou in the fear of God tell us truly what his mind is, and then we will in the fear of God comply with it; and for this the Lord the Judge be judge between us. Note, Those that expect to have the benefit of good ministers' prayers must conscientiously hearken to their preaching, and be governed by it, as far as it agrees with the mind of God. Nothing could be better said than this here, "Whether it be good, or whether it be evil, we will obey the voice of the Lord our God, that it may be well with us." 1. They now call God their God, for Jeremiah had encouraged them to call him so, ver. 5, "I will pray to the Lord your God." He is ours, and therefore we will obey his voice. Our relation to God strongly obligeth us to obedience. 2. They promise to obey his voice, because they sent the prophet to him to consult him. Note, We do not truly desire to know the mind of God, if we do not fully resolve to comply with it when we do know it. 3. It is an implicit, universal obedience that they here promise. They will do what God appoints them to do, "whether it be good, or whether it be evil;" though it may seem evil to us, yet we will believe that if God commands it, it is certainly good, and we must not dispute it, but do it. Whatever God commands, whether it be easy or difficult, agreeable to our inclinations or contrary to them, whether it be cheap or costly, fashionable or unfashionable, whether we get or lose by it in our worldly interest, if it be our duty, we will do it. 4. It is upon a very good consideration that they promise this, a reasonable and powerful one, "that it may be well with us;" which intimates a conviction that they could not expect it should be well with them upon any other terms.

7 And it came to pass after ten days, that the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah. 8 Then called he Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces which were with him, and all xxxix. 9, 10. Careful attention should be paid to the minute specification of these two verses, because they show that after those that had perished and those who were taken into captivity, a remnant of Israel, and in particular the poor, remained behind. There is abundance of other evidence to the same effect, and yet it is continually overlooked by ordinary readers, who forget this remnant. Nebuzar-adan is here called "captain of the guard," as it would seem because he had charge of the prisoners of war, and superintended their execution, or exile, or other punishment. The margin expressively explains his title, "chief of the executioners or slaughtermen."

xxxix. 11—14. That Nebuchadnezzar should have heard of Jeremiah's fearless exhortations to surrender, and predictions of defeat, is not surprising, nor that the king should have a certain superstitious awe of him. He probably had never said of any other prisoner, "Do unto him even as he shall say unto thee." The name Nebushasban here is that of another Ra[illegible] or chief eunuch (see on verse 3), as the people from the least even to the greatest, 9 And said unto them, Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, unto whom ye sent me to present your supplication before him;

10 If ye will still abide in this land,
Then will I build you, and not pull you down,
And I will plant you, and not pluck you up:
For I repent me of the evil that I have done unto you.

11 Be not afraid of the king of Babylon,
Of whom ye are afraid;
Be not afraid of him, saith the LORD:
For I am with you to save you,
And to deliver you from his hand

12 And I will shew mercies unto you,
That he may have mercy upon you,
And cause you to return to your own land.

13 But if ye say,
We will not dwell in this land,
Neither obey the voice of the LORD your God,

14 Saying, No; but we will go into the land of Egypt,
Where we shall see no war,
Nor hear the sound of the trumpet,
Nor have hunger of bread;
And there will we dwell: [of Judah;

15 And now therefore hear the word of the LORD, ye remnant
Thus saith the LORD of hosts. the God of Israel;
If ye wholly set your faces to enter into Egypt,
And go to sojourn there;

16 Then it shall come to pass,
That the sword, which ye feared,
Shall overtake you there in the land of Egypt,
And the famine, whereof ye were afraid,
Shall follow close after you there in Egypt;
And there ye shall die.

17 So shall it be with all the men
That set their faces to go into Egypt to sojourn there;
They shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence:
And none of them shall remain or escape
From the evil that I will bring upon them.

18 For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
As mine anger and my fury hath been poured forth
Upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem;
So shall my fury be poured forth upon you,
When ye shall enter into Egypt:
And ye shall be an execration, and an astonishment,
And a curse, and a reproach:
And ye shall see this place no more.

19 The LORD hath said concerning you, O ye remnant of Judah; Go ye not into Egypt: know certainly that I have admonished you this day. 20 For ye dissembled in your hearts, when ye sent me unto the LORD your God, saying, Pray for us unto the LORD our God; and according unto all that the LORD our God shall say, so declare unto us, and we will do it. 21 And now I have this day declared it to you; but ye have not obeyed the voice of the LORD your God, nor any thing for the which he hath sent me unto you. 22 Now therefore know certainly that ye shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence, in the place whither ye desire to go and to sojourn.

We have here the answer which Jeremiah was sent to deliver to those who employed him to ask counsel of God.

First. It did not come presently, nor till ten days after, ver. 7. They were thus long held in suspense, perhaps to punish them for their hypocrisy, or to shew that Jeremiah did not speak of himself, not what he would, for he could not speak when he would, but must wait for instructions. However, it teacheth us to continue waiting upon God for direction in our way. "The vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak."

Secondly. When it did come he delivered it publicly, both to the captains and to all the people, from the meanest to those in the highest station. He delivered it fully and faithfully, as he received it, as he had promised that he would keep nothing back from them. If Jeremiah had been to direct them by his own prudence, perhaps he could not have told what to advise them to, the case was so difficult; but what he has to advise is, what "the Lord the God of Israel saith, to whom they had sent him," and therefore they were bound in honour and duty to observe it. And this he tells them,

1. That it is the will of God that they should stay where they were; and his promise, that if they do so it shall undoubtedly be well with them; he would have them still to abide in this land, ver. 10. Their brethren were forced out of it into captivity, and it was their affliction; let them therefore count it a mercy that they may stay in it, and a duty to stay in it. Let those whose lot is in Canaan never quit it while they can keep it. It had been enough to oblige them, if God had only said, I charge you upon your allegiance to abide still in this land; but he rather persuades them to it as a friend than commands it as a prince. 1st. He expresseth a very tender concern for them in their present calamitous condition; "It repenteth me of the evil that I have done unto you." Though they had shewn small sign of their repenting of their sins, yet God, as one grieved for the misery of Israel, Jud. x. 16, begins to repent of the judgments he had brought upon them for their sins. Not that he changed his mind, but he was very ready to change his way, and to return in mercy to them. God's time to repent himself concerning his servants is, when he sees that, as here, their strength is gone, and there is none shut up or left, Deu. xxxii. 36. 2nd. He answers the argument they had against abiding in this land. They feared the king of Babylon, ch. xli. 18, lest he should come and avenge the death of Gedaliah upon them, though they were no way accessary to it, nay, had witnessed against it. The surmise was foreign and unreasonable; but if there had been any ground for it enough is here said to remove it; ver. 11, "Be not afraid of the king of Babylon," though he is a man of great might and little mercy, and a very arbitrary prince, whose will is a law; and therefore you are afraid he will, upon this pretence, though without colour of reason, take advantage against you. "Be not afraid of him," for that fear will bring a snare; fear not him, "for I am with you;" and if God be for you to save you, who can be against you to hurt you? Thus has God provided to obviate and silence even the causeless fears of his people, which discourage them in the way of their duty; there is enough in the promises to do it. 3rd. He assures them that, if they will still abide in this land, they shall not only be safe from the king of Babylon, but be made happy by the King of kings. "I will build you and plant you;" you shall take root again, and be the new foundation of another state; a phœnix kingdom rising out of the ashes of the last. It is added, ver. 12, "I will shew mercies unto you." Note, In all our comforts we may read God's mercies. God will shew them mercy in this, that not only the king of Babylon shall not destroy them, but he shall have mercy upon them, and help to settle them. Note, Whatever kindness men do us, we must attribute it to God's kindness. He makes those whom he pities to be pitied, even by those that carried them captives, Ps. cvi. 46. The king of Babylon having now the disposal of the country, shall "cause you to return to your own land," that is, shall settle you again in your habitations, and put you in possession of the lands that formerly belonged to you. Note, God has made that our duty which is really our privilege, and our obedience will be its own recompence. "Abide in this land," and it shall be your own land again, and you shall continue in it. Do not outrun it, now you stand so fair for the enjoyment of it again. Be not so unwise as to forsake your own mercies for lying vanities.

2. That, as they tender the favour of God and their own happiness, they must by no means think of going into Egypt; not thither of any place; not to that land out of which God had delivered their fathers, and which he had so often warned them not to make alliance with, nor to put confidence in. Observe here,

1st. The sin they are supposed to be guilty of; and to him that knew their hearts it was more than a supposition. You begin to say, "We will not dwell in this land," ver. 13. We will never think that we can be safe in it, no, not though God himself undertake our protection; we will not continue in it, no, not in obedience to the voice of the Lord our God. He may say what he pleaseth, but we will do what we please; 'We will go into the land of Egypt, and there will we dwell, whether God give us leave and go along with us or no,' ver. 14. It is supposed that their hearts were upon it; "If ye wholly set your faces to enter into Egypt," are obstinately resolved that you will go and sojourn there, though God oppose you in it, both by his word and by his providence, then take what follows. Now the reason they go upon in this resolution is, that "in Egypt we shall see no war, nor have hunger of bread," as we have had for a long time in this land, ver. 14. Note, It is folly to quit our place, especially to quit the holy land, because we meet with trouble in it; but greater folly to think, by changing our place to outrun the judgments of God, and that evil which pursues sinners in every way of disobedience, and which there is no escaping but by returning to our allegiance.

2nd. The sentence passed upon them for this sin, if they will persist in it. It is pronounced in God's name; ver. 15, "Hear the word of the Lord, ye remnant of Judah," that think, because you are a remnant, you must be spared of course, ver. 2, and indulged in your own humour. First. Did the sword and famine frighten them? Those very judgments shall pursue them into Egypt, shall overtake them, and overcome them there, ver. 16, 17. Ye think, because war and famine have long been raging in this land, they are entailed upon it; whereas, if you trust in God, he can make even this land a land of peace to you. You think they are confined to it, and if you can get clear of this land you shall get out of the reach of them; but God will send them after you wherever you go. Note, The evils we think to escape by sin we certainly and inevitably run ourselves upon. The men that go to Egypt in contradiction to God's will, to escape the sword and famine, shall die in Egypt by sword and famine. We may apply it to the common calamities of human life. Those that are impatient of them, and think to avoid them by changing their place, will find they are deceived, and they do not at all mend themselves. The grievances common to men will meet them wherever they go. All our removes in this world are but from one wilderness to another; still we are where we were. Secondly. Did the desolations of Jerusalem frighten them? Were they willing to get as far as they could from them? They shall meet with the second part of them too in Egypt; ver. 18, "As mine anger and fury have been poured out here upon Jerusalem, so it shall be poured out upon you in Egypt." Note, Those that have by sin made God their enemy will find him a consuming fire wherever they go. And then "shall ye be an execration and an astonishment." The Hebrews were of old an abomination to the Egyptians, Gen. xliii. 32, and now Nergal-sharezer is the Rab-mag, or chief magician, already mentioned. Gedaliah, as seen in the next chapter, was put in charge of the country.

xl. 1. Although Jeremiah had been taken from his prison, and committed to the care of Gedaliah, in the confusion he was bound like other captives and taken to Ramah, where he was released. This Ramah was five miles north of Jerusalem, and its ruins still exist.

xl. 6. The Mizpah to which Jeremiah went was no doubt that in the tribe of Benjamin, four or five miles north-west of Jerusalem.

xl. 12. The fugitive Jews were able to gather of the produce of the land, because it was about the month of July, certainly not later than August.

xli. 3. In the first massacre effected by Ishmael and his accomplices, not only the Jews but the Chaldean "men of war" were included.

they shall be made more so than ever. When God's professing people mingle themselves with infidels, and make their court to them, they lose their dignity, and make themselves a reproach.

3rd. That God knew their hypocrisy in their inquiries of him, and that when they asked what he would have them do, they were resolved to take their own way; and therefore the sentence, which was before pronounced conditionally, is made absolute. Having set before them good and evil, the blessing and the curse, in the close he makes the application of what he said. And here, First. He solemnly protests that he had faithfully delivered his message, ver. 19. The conclusion of the whole matter is, "Go not down into Egypt;" you disobey the command of God if you do, and what I have said to you will be a witness against you. For know certainly that, whether you will hear or whether you will forbear, I have plainly admonished you, you cannot now plead ignorance of the mind of God. Secondly. He chargeth them with base dissimulation in the application they made to him for Divine direction; ver. 20, "Ye dissembled in your hearts," you pretended one thing and intended another, and promised what you never meant to perform. 'You have used deceit against your souls,' so the margin reads it; for those that think to put a cheat upon God will prove in the end to have put a damning cheat upon themselves. Thirdly. He is already aware that they are determined to go contrary to the command of God. Probably they discovered it in their countenance and secret mutterings already, before he had finished his discourse. However, he spake from him who knew their hearts; "Ye have not obeyed the voice of the Lord your God;" that is, ye have not a disposition to obey it. Thus Moses, in the close of his farewell sermon, had told them, Deu. xxxi. 2, "I know thy rebellion and thy stiff neck, and that ye will corrupt yourselves." Admire the patience of God, that he is pleased to speak to those whom he knows will not regard him, and deal with those whom he knows will deal treacherously, Isa. xlviii. 8. Fourthly. He therefore reads them their doom, ratifying what he had said before, "Know certainly that ye shall die by the sword," ver. 22. God's threatenings may be vilified, but cannot be nullified, by the unbelief of man. Famine and pestilence shall pursue these sinners; for there is no place privileged from Divine arrests, nor can any malefactors go out of God's jurisdiction; "Ye shall die in the place whither ye desire to go." Note, We know not what is good for ourselves; and that often proves afflictive, and sometimes fatal, which we are most fond of, and have our hearts most set upon.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Jeremiah had faithfully delivered his message from God in the foregoing chapter, and the case was made so very plain by it, that one would have thought there needed no more words about it; but we find it quite otherwise. Here is, I. The people's contempt of this message. They denied it to be the word of God, ver. 1—3, and then made no difficulty of going directly contrary to it; into Egypt they went, and took Jeremiah himself along with them, ver. 4—7. II. God's pursuit of them with another message, foretelling the king of Babylon's pursuit of them into Egypt, ver. 8—13.

AND it came to pass, that when Jeremiah had made an end of speaking unto all the people all the words of the LORD their God, for which the LORD their God had sent him to them, even all these words, 2 Then spake Azariah the son of Hoshaiah, and Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the proud men, saying unto Jeremiah, Thou speakest falsely: the LORD our God hath not sent thee to say, Go not into Egypt to sojourn there: 3 But Baruch the son of Neriah setteth thee on against us, for to deliver us into the hand of the Chaldeans, that they might put us to death, and carry us away captives into Babylon. 4 So Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces, and all the people, obeyed not the voice of the LORD, to dwell in the land of Judah. 5 But Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces, took all the remnant of Judah, that were returned from all nations, whither they had been driven, to dwell in the land of Judah; 6 Even men, and women, and children, and the king's daughters, and every person that Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard had left with Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, and Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch the son of Neriah. 7 So they came into the land of Egypt: for they obeyed not the voice of the LORD: thus came they even to Tahpanhes.

What God saith of the builders of Babel may truly be said of this people that Jeremiah is now dealing with, "Now nothing will be restrained from them which they have imagined to do," Gen. xi. 6. They have a fancy for Egypt, and to Egypt they will go, whatever God himself saith to the contrary. Jeremiah made them hear all he had to say, though he saw them uneasy at it. It was what the Lord their God had sent him to speak to them, and they shall have it all; and now let us see what they have to say to it.

First. They deny it to be a message from God. "Johanan, and all the proud men, said to Jeremiah, Thou speakest falsely," ver. 2. See here, 1. What was the cause of their disobedience. It was pride; only by that comes contention both with God and man. They were proud men that gave the lie to the prophet. They could not bear the contradiction of their sentiments, and the control of their designs; no, not by the Divine wisdom, by the Divine will itself. Pharaoh said, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey him?" Ex. v. 2. The proud unhumbled heart of man is one of the most daring enemies God has on this side hell. 2. What was the colour for their disobedience? They would not acknowledge it to be the word of God. "The Lord hath not sent thee" on this errand to us. Either they were not convinced that was said came from God, or (which I rather think) though they were convinced of it they would not own it. The light shone strong in their face, but either they shut their eyes against it or would not confess that they saw it. Note, The reason why men deny the Scriptures to be the word of God is, because they are resolved not to conform themselves to Scripture rules, and so an obstinate infidelity is made the sorry subterfuge of a wilful disobedience. If God had spoken to them by an angel, or as he did from mount Sinai, they would have said it was a delusion. Had they not consulted Jeremiah as a prophet? Had not he waited to receive instructions from God what to say to them? Had not what he said all the usual marks of prophecy upon it? Was not the prophet himself embarked in the same bottom with them? What interests could he have separate from theirs? Had he not always approved himself an Israelite indeed? and had not God proved him a prophet indeed? Had any of his words ever fallen to the ground? Why truly, they had some good thoughts of Jeremiah; but they suggest, ver. 3, "Baruch sets thee on against us." A likely thing, that Baruch should be in a plot "to deliver them into the hands of the Chaldeans," and what would he get by that? If Jeremiah and he had been so well affected to the Chaldeans as they would represent them, they would have gone away at first, with Nebuzar-adan, when he courted them, to Babylon, and not have staid to take their lot with this despised ungrateful remnant; but the best services are no fences against malice and slander. Or if Baruch had been so ill disposed, could they think Jeremiah would be so influenced by him as to make God's name and authority to patronize so villanous a purpose? Note, Those that are resolved to contradict the great ends of the ministry are industrious to put it into an ill name. When men will persist in sin, they represent those who would turn them from it as designing men for themselves; nay, as ill designing men against their neighbours. It is well for them that their witness is in heaven, and their record on high.

Secondly. They determine to go to Egypt however. They resolve not to "dwell in the land of Judah," as God had ordered them, ver. 4; but to go themselves, with one consent, and to take all that they had under their power along with them to Egypt. Those that came "from all the nations, whither they had been driven, to dwell in the land of Judah," out of a sincere affection to that land, they would not leave them to their liberty, but forced them to go with them into Egypt, ver. 5; "men, women, and children," ver. 6; a long journey into a strange country, an idolatrous country, a country that had never been kind or faithful to Israel; yet thither they would go, though they deserted their own land, and threw themselves out of God's protection. It is the folly of men that they know not when they are well, and often ruin themselves by endeavouring to mend themselves; and it is the pride of great men to force those they have under their power to follow them, though never so much against their duty and interest. These proud men compelled even Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch his scribe, to go along with them to Egypt. They carried them away as prisoners, partly to punish them, and a greater punishment they could not inflict upon them than to force them against their consciences. Theirs is the worst of tyranny who say to men's souls, even to good men's souls, "Bow down, that we may go over;" partly to put some reputation upon themselves and their own way. Though the prophets were under a force, they would make the world believe they were voluntary in going along with them; and who can blame them for acting contrary to the word of the Lord, when the prophets themselves did? They came to Tahpanhes a famous city of Egypt, so called from a queen of that name, 1 Kin. xi. 19; the same with Hanes, Isa. xxx. 4; it was now the metropolis, for Pharaoh's house was there, ver. 9. No place could serve these proud men to settle in but the royal city and near the court; so little mindful were they of Joseph's wisdom, who would have his brethren settle in Goshen. If they had had the spirit of Israelites, they would have chosen rather to dwell in the wilderness of Judah, than in the most pompous populous cities of Egypt.

8 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah in Tahpanhes, saying, 9 Take great stones in thine hand, and hide them in the clay in the brick-kiln, which is at the entry of Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes, in the sight of the men of Judah; 10 And say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will send and take Nebuchadrezzar the king of Babylon, my servant, and will set his throne upon these stones that I have hid; and he shall spread his royal pavilion over them. 11 And when he cometh, he shall smite the land of Egypt, and deliver such as are for death to death; and such as are for captivity to captivity; and such as are for the sword to the sword. 12 And I will kindle a fire in the houses of the gods of Egypt; and he shall burn them, and carry them away captives: and he shall array himself with the land of Egypt, as a shepherd putteth on his garment; and he shall go forth from thence in peace. 13 He shall break also the images of Beth-shemesh,

xli. 5. These men were Israelites in the habiliments of mourning, and although, like pagans, they had wounded themselves, they retained so much of veneration for the God of their fathers that they went on pilgrimage to worship where the Temple had stood.

xli. 12. The great waters at Gibeon are doubtless the "pool of Gibeon" in 2 Sam. ii. 13. There are still to be found there the remains of a large pool or tank, 120 feet long and 100 feet wide, and near it in a cave is an abundant spring of water.

xli. 17. Although the Jews had revenged the crime of Ishmael, they were afraid; and Johanan and his friends went to "the habitation of Chimham," near Bethlehem, in order to proceed thence to Egypt for greater safety. (For Chimham see 2 Sam. xix. 37—40.)

xlii. 10. The words "for I repent" have the same sense as in most other places where similar terms occur. They do not mean that God was sorry he had done to them as he had, but that he felt compassion for them in the sufferings he had himself inflicted.

that is in the land of Egypt; and the houses of the gods of the Egyptians shall he burn with fire.

EGYPTIAN GODS.

We have here Jeremiah prophesying in Egypt, and so we have in the next chapter. Jeremiah was now in Tahpanhes, for there his lords and masters were. He was there among idolatrous Egyptians and treacherous Israelites; but there, 1. He received the word of the Lord; it came to him. God can find his people with the visits of his grace wherever they are; and when his ministers are bound, yet "the word of the Lord is not bound." The spirit of prophecy was not confined to the land of Israel. When Jeremiah went into Egypt, not out of choice, but by constraint, God withdrew not his wonted favour from him. 2. What he received of the Lord he delivered to the people. Wherever we are, we must endeavour to do good, for that is our business in this world. Now we find two messages which Jeremiah was appointed and intrusted to deliver, when he was in Egypt. We may suppose he did what services he could to his countrymen in Egypt, at least as far as they would be acceptable, in performing the ordinary duties of a prophet, praying for them, and instructing and comforting them, but only two messages of his which he received immediately from God are recorded. One in this chapter relating to Egypt itself, and foretelling the destruction of that; the other in the next chapter, relating to the Jews in Egypt. God had told them before, that if they went into Egypt the sword they feared should follow them; here he tells them farther, that the sword of Nebuchadnezzar, which they were in a particular manner afraid of, should follow them.

First. This is foretold by a sign. Jeremiah must take great stones, such as are used for foundations, and lay them in the clay of the furnace or brick kiln, which is in the open way, or beside the way, that leads to Pharaoh's house, ver. 9; some remarkable place in view of the royal palace. Egypt was famous for brick kilns, witness the slavery of the Israelites there, whom they forced to make bricks, Ex. v. 7, which perhaps was now remembered against them. The foundation of Egypt's desolations was laid in those brick kilns in that clay. This he must do, not in the sight of the Egyptians, they knew not Jeremiah's character, but in the sight of the men of Judah to whom he was sent, that, since he could not prevent their going into Egypt, he might bring them to repent of their going.

Secondly. It is foretold in express words, as express as can be,

1. That the king, the present king of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar, the very same that had been employed in the destruction of Jerusalem, should come in person against the land of Egypt, should make himself master even of this royal city, by the same token that he should set his throne in that very place where these stones were laid, ver. 10. This minute circumstance is particularly foretold, that when it was accomplished they might be put in mind of the prophecy, and confirmed in their belief of the extent and certainty of the Divine prescience, to which the smallest and most contingent events are evident. God calls Nebuchadnezzar his servant, because herein he executed God's will, accomplished his purposes, and was instrumental to carry on his designs. Note, The world's princes are God's servants, and he makes what use he pleaseth of them, and even those that know him not, nor aim at his honour, yet are the tools which his providence makes use of.

2. That he shall destroy many of the Egyptians, and have them all at his mercy; ver. 11, "He shall smite the land of Egypt;" and though it has been always a warlike nation, yet none shall be able to make head against him, but whom he will he shall slay, and by what sort of death he will; whether pestilence, for that is here meant by death, as ch. xv. 2, by shutting them up in places infected, or by the sword of war or justice, in cold blood or hot; and whom he will he shall save alive, and carry into captivity. The Jews, by going into Egypt, brought the Chaldeans thither, and so made but ill payment to those that entertained them. They who promised to protect Israel from the king of Babylon exposed themselves to him.

3. That he shall destroy the idols of Egypt, both the temples and the images of their gods; ver. 12, "He shall burn the houses of the gods of Egypt;" but it shall be with a fire of God's kindling. The fire of God's wrath fastens upon them, and then he burns some of them, and carries others captives, Isa. xlvi. 1. Beth-shemesh, or, the house of the sun, was so called from a temple there built to the sun, where at certain times there was a general meeting of the worshippers of the sun. The statues, or standing images, there he shall break in pieces, ver. 13; and carry away the rich materials of them. It intimates that he shall lay all waste, when even the temple and the images shall not escape the fury of the victorious army. The king of Babylon was himself a great idolater, and a patron of idolatry; he had his temples and images in honour of the sun, as well as the Egyptians, and yet he is employed to destroy the idols of Egypt. Thus God sometimes makes one wicked man or wicked nation a scourge and plague to another.

4. That he shall make himself master of the land of Egypt, and none shall be able to plead its cause, or avenge its quarrel, ver. 13; "He shall array himself with the rich spoils of the land of Egypt," both beautify and fortify himself with them; shall array himself with them, as ornaments, and as armour; and this though it shall be a rich and heavy booty, yet, being expert in war, and expeditious, he will slip on with as much ease, and in as little time (in comparison) "as a shepherd slips on his garment," when he goes to turn out his sheep in a morning. And being loaded with the wealth of many nations, the fruits of his conquests, he shall make no more of the spoils of the land of Egypt than of a shepherd's coat; and when he has taken what he pleaseth, as Benhadad threatened to do, 1 Kin. xx. 6, he shall go forth in peace, without any molestation given him, or any precipitation for fear of it, so effectually reduced shall the land of Egypt be. This destruction of Egypt by the king of Babylon is foretold, Eze. xxix. 19; xxx. 10. Babylon lay at a great distance from Egypt, and yet from thence the destruction of Egypt comes; for God can make those judgments strike home which are far-fetched.

CHAPTER XLIV.

In this chapter we have, I. An awakening sermon, which Jeremiah preached to the Jews in Egypt, to reprove them for their idolatry, notwithstanding the warnings given them both by the word and rod of God, and to threaten the judgments of God against them for it, ver. 1—14. II. The impudent and impious contempt which the people put upon this admonition, and their declared resolution to persist in their idolatries notwithstanding, in despite of God and Jeremiah, ver. 15—19. III. The sentence passed upon them for their obstinacy, that they should all be cut off, and perish in Egypt, except a very small number, and as a sign or earnest of it the king of Egypt should shortly fall into the hands of the king of Babylon, and be unable any longer to protect them, ver. 20—30.

THE word that came to Jeremiah concerning all the Jews which dwell in the land of Egypt, which dwell at Migdol, and at Tahpanhes, and at Noph, and in the country of Pathros, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Ye have seen all the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem, and upon all the cities of Judah; and, behold, this day they are a desolation, and no man dwelleth therein, 3 Because of their wickedness which they have committed to provoke me to anger, in that they went to burn incense, and to serve other gods, whom they knew not, neither they, ye, nor your fathers. 4 Howbeit I sent unto you all my servants the prophets, rising early and sending them, saying, Oh, do not this abominable thing that I hate. 5 But they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear to turn from their wickedness, to burn no incense unto other gods. 6 Wherefore my fury and mine anger was poured forth, and was kindled in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem; and they are wasted and desolate, as at this day. 7 Therefore now thus saith the LORD, the God of hosts, the God of Israel; Wherefore commit ye this great evil against your souls, to cut off from you man and woman, child and suckling, out of Judah, to leave you none to remain; 8 In that ye provoke me unto wrath with the works of your hands, burning incense unto other gods in the land of Egypt, whither ye be gone to dwell, that ye might cut yourselves off, and that ye might be a curse and a reproach among all the nations of the earth? 9 Have ye forgotten the wickedness of your fathers, and the wickedness of xlii. 12. Nebuchadnezzar would not so much cause them to return as permit and authorise them to return to the lands they had left.

xliii. 5—7. Not even Nebuchadnezzar could leave behind forces sufficient to prevent any outbreak; and, indeed, he probably relied for the preservation of peace upon the terror his name inspired, and his ability to send an army if necessary. He seems to have made no provision to prevent a sudden migration by such a movement as that of Johanan, who was able to sweep into Egypt most of those who still remained in Judah. Tahpanhes seems to have been a city in the north-east of Egypt.

xliii. 8—10. Jeremiah was to take the stones and cover them with clay or mortar near the royal palace, and in a place which many take to be a brick-kiln. It is, however, most unlikely that a brick-kiln should have been at the palace gate; and, indeed, bricks were seldom burned at all in Egypt. Hence we favour the view of those who think the so-called brick-kiln was nothing of the kind, but an erec-

the kings of Judah, and the wickedness of their wives, and your own wickedness, and the wickedness of your wives, which they have committed in the land of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem? 10 They are not humbled even unto this day, neither have they feared, nor walked in my law, nor in my statutes, that I set before you and before your fathers. 11 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will set my face against you for evil, and to cut off all Judah. 12 And I will take the remnant of Judah, that have set their faces to go into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, and they shall all be consumed, and fall in the land of Egypt; they shall even be consumed by the sword and by the famine: they shall die, from the least even unto the greatest, by the sword and by the famine: and they shall be an execration, and an astonishment, and a curse, and a reproach. 13 For I will punish them that dwell in the land of Egypt, as I have punished Jerusalem, by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: 14 So that none of the remnant of Judah, which are gone into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, shall escape or remain, that they should return into the land of Judah, to the which they have a desire to return to dwell there: for none shall return but such as shall escape.

PATHROS—RUINS OF CHNUBIS, NUBIA.—ver. 1.

The Jews in Egypt were now dispersed into divers parts of the country, into Migdol and Noph, and other places, and Jeremiah is sent of an errand from God to them, which he delivered either when he had the most of them together in Pathros, ver. 15, or going about from place to place, preaching to this purpose. He delivered his message in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, and in it,

First. God puts them in mind of the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem, which, though the captives by the rivers of Babylon were daily mindful of, (Ps. cxxxiv. 1,) the fugitives in the cities of Egypt seem to have forgotten, and needed to be put in mind of, though they had not been so long out of sight as to become out of mind; ver. 2, Ye have seen what a deplorable condition Judah and Jerusalem are brought into. Now, will you consider whence those desolations came? From the wrath of God; it was his fury and his anger that kindled the fire which made Jerusalem and the cities of Judah waste and desolate, ver. 6; whoever were the instruments of the destruction, they were but instruments. It was a destruction from the Almighty.

Secondly. He puts them in mind of the sins that brought these desolations upon Judah and Jerusalem. It was for their wickedness, (that was it that provoked God to anger,) and especially their idolatry; their serving other gods, ver. 3; and giving that honour to counterfeit deities, the creatures of their own fancy, and the work of their own hands, which should have been given to the true God only. They forsook the God that was known among them, and his name great, for gods that they knew not, upstart deities, whose original was obscure, and not worth taking notice of. Neither they, nor you, nor your fathers, could give any rational account why the God of Israel was exchanged for such impostors; they knew not that they were gods, nay, they could not but know that they were no gods.

Thirdly. He puts them in mind of the frequent fair warnings he had given them by his word not to serve other gods, the contempt of which warnings was a great aggravation of their idolatry, ver. 4. The prophets were sent with a great deal of care to call to them, saying, "O do not this abominable thing that I hate." It becomes us to speak of sin with the utmost dread and detestation, as an abominable thing; it is certainly so, for it is that which God hates, and we are sure that his judgment is according to truth; call it odious, call it grievous, that we may by all means possible put ourselves and others out of love with it. It becomes us to give warning of the danger of sin, and the fatal consequences of it, with all seriousness and earnestness; O do not do it! If you love God do not, for it is provoking to him; if you love your own souls do not, for it is destructive to them. Let conscience do this for us in an hour of temptation, when we are ready to yield: O take heed, "do not this abominable thing which the Lord hates;" for if God hates it thou shouldest hate it. But did they regard what God said to them? No, they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear, ver. 5. They still persisted in their idolatries, and you see what came of it; therefore God's anger was poured out upon them, as at this day. Now this was intended for warning to you, who have not only heard the judgments of God's mouth, as they did, but have likewise seen the judgments of his hand, by which you should be startled and awakened, for they were inflicted in terrorem, that others might hear and fear, and do no more as they did, lest they fare as they did.

Fourthly. He reproves them for, and upbraids them with, their continued idolatries, now they were come into Egypt; ver. 8, "Ye burn incense to other gods in the land of Egypt," therefore God forbade them to go into Egypt, because he knew it would be a snare to them. Those whom God sent into the land of the Chaldeans, though that was an idolatrous country, were there by the power of God's grace weaned from idolatry, but those who went against God's mind into the land of the Egyptians were there by the power of their own corruptions more wedded than ever to their idolatries; for when we thrust ourselves without cause or call into places of temptation it is just with God to leave us to ourselves. In doing this, 1. They did a great deal of injury to themselves and their families. You commit this great evil against your souls, ver. 7; you wrong them, you deceive them with that which is false, you destroy them, for it will be fatal to them. Note, In sinning against God we sin against our own souls. It is the ready way to cut ourselves off from all comfort and hopes, ver. 8, to cut off your name and honour. So that you will, both by your sin and by your misery, become a curse and reproach among all nations; it will become a proverb, As wretched as a Jew. It is the ready way to cut off from you all your relations, all that you should have joy of, and have your families built up in, man and woman, child and suckling, so that Judah shall be a land lost for want of heirs. 2. They filled up the measure of the iniquity of their fathers; and, as if that had been too little for them, added to it; ver. 9, "Have ye forgotten the wickedness" of those that are gone before you, that you are not humbled for it, as you ought to be, and afraid of the consequences of it? 'Have you forgotten the punishments of your fathers?' so some read it; do you not know how dear their idolatry cost them, and yet dare you continue in that "vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers," though you received the curse with it? He minds them of the sins and punishments of the kings of Judah, who, as great as they were, escaped not the judgments of God for their idolatry; yea, and they should have taken warning by the wickedness of their wives, who had seduced them to idolatry. In the original it is, 'and of his wives,' which Dr. Lightfoot thinks doth tacitly reflect upon Solomon's wives, particularly his Egyptian wives, to whom the idolatry of the kings of Judah owed its original. Have you forgotten this, and what came of it, that you dare venture upon the same wicked courses? see Neh. xiii. 18, 26. Nay, to come to your own times, "Have you forgotten your own wickedness, and the wickedness of your wives," when you lived in prosperity in Jerusalem, and what ruin it brought upon you? But, alas, to what purpose do I speak to them, saith God to the prophet; ver. 10, "They are not humbled unto this day," by all the humbling providences that they have been under. "They have not feared, nor walked in my law." Note, Those that walk not in the law of God thereby shew that they are destitute of the fear of God.

Fifthly. He threatens their utter ruin for their persisting in their idolatry, now they were in Egypt. Judgment is given against them, as before ch. xlii. 22, that they shall perish in Egypt. The decree is gone forth, and shall not be called back. They "set their faces to go into the land of Egypt," ver. 12, were resolute in their purpose against God, and now God is resolute in his purpose against them; "I will set my face to cut off all Judah," ver. 11. They that think not only to affront but to confront God Almighty will find themselves outfaced; for "the face of the Lord is against them that do evil," Ps. xxxiv. 16. It is here threatened concerning these idolatrous Jews in Egypt, 1. That they shall all be consumed, without exception; no degree or order among them shall escape. they shall fall, from the least to the greatest, ver. 12, high and low, rich and poor. 2. That they shall be consumed by the very same judgments which God made use of for the punishment of Jerusalem, the sword, famine, and pestilence, ver. 12, 13. They shall not be wasted by natural deaths, as Israel in the wilderness, but by these sore judgments which by flying into Egypt they thought to get out of the reach of. 3. That none, except a very few that shall narrowly escape, shall ever return to the land of Judah again, ver. 14. They thought, being nearer, they stood fairer for a return to their own land than those that were carried to Babylon, yet those shall return, and these shall not; for the much surer way to any comfort is that in which God has promised it to us than that in which we have projected it for ourselves. Observe, how those that are fretful and discontented will be uneasy and fond of change wherever they are; this people, when they were in the land of Judah, desired to go into Egypt, ch. xlii. 22, but when they were in Egypt they "desired to return to the land of Judah again;" they 'lift up their soul' to it, so it is in the margin, which notes an earnest desire. But, because they would not dwell there when God commanded it, they shall not dwell there when they desire it. If we walk contrary to God he will walk contrary to us. How can those expect to be well that would not know when they were well, though God himself told them?

15 Then all the men which knew that their wives had burned incense unto other gods, and all the women that stood by, a great multitude, even all the people that dwelt in the land of Egypt, in Pathros, answered Jeremiah, saying, 16 As for the word that thou hast spoken unto us in the name of the LORD, we will not hearken unto thee. 17 But

xliii. 12, 13. "The houses of the gods," or temples of Egypt, were most numerous. Beth-shemesh was Heliopolis, or the City of the Sun, called On by the Egyptians, very famous for the temple and worship of the sun there. An obelisk is almost all that now remains of it.

xliv. 1. Of the three cities here named, Tahpanhes has been noticed in chap. xliii. (in verses 5—7); Migdol would probably be further south, but still on the east of Lower Egypt, and was perhaps the place mentioned in Exod. xiv. 2; Noph was yet farther south, and was in fact the city called Memphis by the Greeks. The country of Pathros was an Egyptian district, but its position is disputed, and not known. That it is connected with the name Pathrusim (Gen. x. 14) is admitted, but Bochart only guesses when he says it was the Thebaid in Upper Egypt.

NUBIAN ISIS.

we will certainly do whatsoever thing goeth forth out of our own mouth, to burn incense unto the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her, as we have done, we, and our fathers, our kings, and our princes, in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem: for then had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and saw no evil. 18 But since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her, we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword and by the famine. 19 And when we burned incense to the queen of heaven, and poured out drink offerings unto her, did we make her cakes to worship her, and pour out drink offerings unto her, without our men?

We have here the people's obstinate refusal to submit to the power of the word of God in the mouth of Jeremiah. We have scarce such an instance of downright daring contradiction to God himself as this here, or such an avowed rebellion of the carnal mind. Observe,

First. The persons that did thus set God and his judgments at defiance. It was not some one that was thus obstinate, but the generality of the Jews; and they were such as knew either themselves or their wives to be guilty of the idolatry Jeremiah had reproved, ver. 15; where we find, 1. That the women had been more guilty of idolatry and superstition than the men; not because the men stuck closer to the true God and the true religion than the women, but I fear because they were generally atheists, and were for no God, and no religion at all, and therefore could easily allow their wives to be of a false religion, and to worship false gods. 2. That it was consciousness of guilt that made them impatient of reproof. "They knew that their wives had burnt incense to other gods," and that they had countenanced them in it, and "the women that stood by" knew that they had joined with them in their idolatrous usages, so that what Jeremiah said touched them in a sore place, which made them kick against the pricks, as children of Belial, that will not bear the yoke.

Secondly. The reply which these persons made to Jeremiah, and in him to God himself; and it is in effect the same with theirs who had the impudence to say to the Almighty, "Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways."

1. They declare their resolution not to do as God commanded them, but what they themselves had a mind to do, that is, they would go on to worship the moon, here called the queen of heaven; yet some understand it of the sun, which was much worshipped in Egypt, ch. xliii. 13, and had been so at Jerusalem, 2 Kin. xxxiii. 11, and they say that, the Hebrew word for the sun being feminine, it may not unfitly be called the queen of heaven. And others understand it of all the host of heaven, or the frame of heaven, the whole machine, ch. vii. 18. These daring sinners do not now go about to make excuses for their refusal to obey, nor suggest that Jeremiah spoke from himself and not from God, as before, ch. xliii. 2. But they own he spake to them in the name of the Lord, and yet tell him flat and plain, in so many words, "We will not hearken unto thee," we will do that which is forbidden, and run the venture of that which is threatened. Note, Those that live in disobedience to God commonly grow worse and worse, and the heart is more and more hardened by the deceitfulness of sin. Here is the genuine language of the rebellious heart: "We will certainly do whatsoever thing goes forth out of our own mouth," let God and his prophets say what they please to the contrary. What they said many think, that yet have not arrived to such a degree of impudence as to speak it out. It is that which the young man would be at in the days of his youth; he would walk in the way of his heart, and the sight of his eyes, and would have and do every thing he has a mind to, Eccl. xi. 9.

2. They give some sort of reasons for their resolutions. For the most absurd and unreasonably wicked men will have something to say for themselves, till the day comes when every mouth shall be stopped.

1st. They plead many of those things which the advocates for Rome make the marks of a true church, and not only justify but magnify themselves with; and these here have as much right to them as they have. First. They plead antiquity: We are resolved to burn incense to the queen of heaven, for our fathers did so; it is a practice that pleads prescription, and why should we pretend to be wiser than our fathers? Secondly. They plead authority. They that had power practised it themselves, and prescribed it to others; our kings and our princes did it, whom God set over us, and who were of the seed of David. Thirdly. They plead unity. It was not here and there one that did it, but we,—we all with one consent, we that are a great multitude, ver. 15, we did it. Fourthly. They plead universality. It was not done here and there, but in the cities of Judah. Fifthly. They plead visibility. It was done not in a corner, in dark and shady groves only, but in the streets, openly and publicly. Sixthly. They plead that it was the practice of the mother church, the holy see; it was not now learned first in Egypt, but it had been done in Jerusalem. Seventhly. They plead prosperity; Then had we plenty of bread, and of all good things; we were well, and saw no evil. All the rest I fear were too true in fact, (God's witnesses against their idolatry were few and hid; Elijah thought he was left alone,) and this last might perhaps be true as to some particular persons; but as to their nation, they were still under rebukes for their rebellions, and there was no peace to them that went out or came in, 2 Chr. xv. 5. But supposing all to be true, yet this doth not at all excuse them from idolatry; it is the law of God that we must be ruled and judged by, not the practice of men.

2nd. They suggest, that the judgments they had of late been under were brought upon them for leaving off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, ver. 18. So perversely did they misconstrue providence, though God by his prophets had so often explained it to them, and the thing itself spoke the direct contrary. Since we forsook our idolatries "we have wanted all things, and have been consumed by the sword;" the true reason of which was because they still retained their idols in their hearts, and an affection to their old sins. But they would have it thought it was because they had forsaken the acts of sin. Thus the afflictions which should have been for their welfare, to part between them and their sins, being misinterpreted, did but confirm them in their sins. Thus in the first ages of Christianity, when God chastised the nations by any public calamities for opposing the Christians and persecuting them, they put a contrary sense upon the calamities, as if they were sent to punish them for conniving at the Christians, and tolerating them, and cried, Christianos ad leones.—'Throw the Christians to the lions.' Yet if it had been true as they said here, that since they returned to the service of the true God, the God of Israel, they had been in want and trouble, was that a reason why they should revolt from him again? That was as much as to say, they served not him, but their own bellies. Those that know God, and put their trust in him will serve him, though he starve them, though he slay them, though they never see a good day with him in this world, being well assured that they shall not lose by him in the end.

3rd. They plead that, though the women were most forward and active in their idolatries, yet they did it with the consent and approbation of their husbands. The women were busy to make cakes for meat offerings to the queen of heaven, and to prepare and pour out the drink offerings, ver. 19. We found before it was their work, ch. vii. 18; but, did we do it without our husbands, privately and unknown to them, so as to give them occasion to be jealous of us? No, the fathers kindled the fire, while the women kneaded the dough. The men that were our heads, whom we were bound to learn of, and to be obedient to, taught us to do it by their example. Note, It is sad when those that are in the nearest relation to each other, that should quicken each other to that which is good, and so help one another to heaven, harden each other in sin, and so ripen one another for hell. Some understand this as spoken by the husbands, ver. 15, who plead they did not do it without their men, that is, without their elders and rulers, their great men, and men in authority; but, because the making of the cakes and the pouring out of the drink offerings is expressly spoken of as the women's work, ch. vii. 18, it seems rather to be understood as their plea. But it was a frivolous plea; what would it avail them to be able to say that it was according to their husband's mind, when they knew it was contrary to their God's mind?

20 Then Jeremiah said unto all the people, to the men, and to the women, and to all the people which had given him that answer, saying, 21 The incense that ye burned in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem, ye, and your fathers, your kings, and your princes, and the people of the land, did not the LORD remember them, and came it not into his mind? 22 So that the LORD could no longer bear, because of the evil of your doings, and because of the abominations which ye have committed; therefore is your land a desolation, and an astonishment, and a curse, without an inhabitant, as at this day. 23 Because ye have burned incense, and because ye have sinned against the LORD, and have not obeyed the voice of the LORD, nor walked in his law, nor in his statutes, nor in his testimonies; therefore this evil is happened unto you, as at this day. 24 Moreover Jeremiah said unto all the people, and to all the women, Hear the word of the LORD, all Judah that are in the land of Egypt: 25 Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel, saying; Ye and your wives have both spoken with your mouths, and fulfilled with your hand, saying, We will surely perform our vows that we have vowed, to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her: ye will surely accomplish your vows, and surely perform your vows. 26 Therefore hear ye the word of the LORD, all Judah that dwell in the land of Egypt; Behold, I have sworn by my great name, saith the LORD, that my name shall no more be named in the mouth of any man of Judah in all the land of Egypt, saying, the xliv. 14. A fault in the version makes this verse read strangely. After saying that none shall escape to return, we are told they shall return who escape. The sense is that generally they would not return, and that the exceptions would be in the case of fugitives, as is more clearly stated in verse 28. They would not receive permission to return, and hence the term "all" in the 12th verse.

xliv. 15—18. The idolatry alluded to in verses 8, 9 is here explained, and it appears that the women had been the most conspicuous in the transgression. For "queen of heaven" our translators suggest "frame of heaven" in the margin, but without cause. The "queen of heaven" was worshipped under many names by many ancient nations. The moon or one of the planets was usually personified by this title. As the moon she was represented by Diana, and as a planet she was Venus. In Egypt some say she was called Neith, but she is best known to Bible readers as Ashtoreth. For "queen" some copies have another reading, which our translators may have

LORD God liveth. 27 Behold, I will watch over them for evil, and not for good: and all the men of Judah that are in the land of Egypt shall be consumed by the sword and by the famine, until there be an end of them. 28 Yet a small number that escape the sword shall return out of the land of Egypt into the land of Judah, and all the remnant of Judah, that are gone into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, shall know whose words shall stand, mine, or their's. 29 And this shall be a sign unto you, saith the LORD, that I will punish you in this place, that ye may know that my words shall surely stand against you for evil: 30 Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will give Pharaoh-hophra king of Egypt into the hand of his enemies, and into the hand of them that seek his life; as I gave Zedekiah king of Judah into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, his enemy, and that sought his life.

Daring sinners may speak many a bold word, and many a big word, but, after all, God will have the last word; for he will be justified when he speaks, and all flesh, even the proudest, shall be silent before him. Prophets may be run down, but God cannot; nay, here the prophet would not.

First. Jeremiah hath something to say to them from himself, which he could say without a spirit of prophecy, and that was to rectify their mistake, (a wilful mistake it was,) concerning the calamities they had been under, and the true intent and meaning of them. They said, these miseries came upon them, because they had now left off burning incense to the queen of heaven; No, saith he, it was because you had formerly done it, not because you had now left it off. When they gave him that answer, he presently replied upon them, ver. 20, that the incense which they and their fathers had burnt to other gods did indeed go unpunished a great while, for God was long-suffering towards them; and during the day of his patience it was perhaps, as they said, well with them, and they saw no evil. But at length they grew so provoking, that "the Lord could no longer bear," ver. 22, but began a controversy with them, whereupon some of them did a little reform; their sins left them, for so it might be said, rather than that they left their sins. But their old guilt being still upon the score, and their corrupt inclinations still the same, God remembered against them the idolatries of their fathers, their kings and their princes, in the streets of Jerusalem, which they, instead of being ashamed of, gloried in, as a justification of them in their idolatries; they all came into his mind, ver. 21, all the abominations which they had committed, ver. 22, and all their disobedience to the voice of the Lord, ver. 23. All was brought to account; and therefore, to punish them for these, is their land a desolation and a curse, as at this day, ver. 22; therefore, not for their late reformation, but for their old transgressions, is all this evil happened to them, as at this day, ver. 23. Note, The right understanding of the cause of our troubles, one would think, should go far towards the cure of our sins. Whatever evil comes upon us, it is because we have sinned against the Lord, and should therefore stand in awe, and not sin.

Secondly. Jeremiah hath something to say to them, to the women particularly, from the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; they have given their answer, now let them hear God's reply, ver. 24. Judah, that dwells in the land of Egypt, hath God speaking to them even there, that is their privilege. Let them observe what he saith, that is their duty, ver. 26. Now God in his reply tells them plainly,

1. That, since they were fully determined to persist in their idolatry, God was fully determined to proceed in his controversy with them; if they would go on to provoke him he would go on to punish them, and see which would get the better at last. God repeats what they had said; ver. 25, You and your wives are agreed in this obstinacy, "you have spoken with your mouths, and fulfilled with your hands;" you have said it, and you stand to it; have said it, and go on to do accordingly: "We will surely perform our vows that we have vowed, to burn incense to the queen of heaven;" as if, though it were a sin, yet their having vowed to do it were sufficient to justify them in the doing of it; whereas no man can by his vow make that lawful to himself, much less duty, which God has already made sin. Well, saith God, you will accomplish, you will perform your wicked vows; now hear what is my vow, what I have sworn, by my great name; and if the Lord hath sworn he will not repent. Since they have sworn and will not repent, with the froward he will shew himself froward, Ps. xviii. 26. He hath sworn, 1st. That what little remains of religion there were among them should be lost, ver. 26. Though they joined with the Egyptians in their idolatries, yet they continued upon many occasions to make mention of the name of Jehovah, particularly in their solemn oaths; they said, Jehovah liveth, he is the living God, so they owned him to be, though they worshipped dead idols. They swear, "The Lord liveth," ch. v. 2, but I fear they retained this form of swearing more in honour of their nation than of their God; but God saith, his name shall no more be thus named by any man of Judah, in all the land of Egypt; that is, there shall be no Jews remaining to use this dialect of their country; or, if there be, they shall have forgotten it, and shall learn to swear as the Egyptians do, by the life of Pharaoh, not of Jehovah. Note, Those are very miserable whom God hath so far left to themselves as that they have quite forgot their religion and lost all the remains of their good education. Or, this may intimate that God would take it as an affront to him, and would resent it accordingly, if they did make mention of his name, and profess any relation to him. 2nd. He hath sworn that what little remnant of his people there was there should all be consumed, ver. 27. I will watch over them for evil, no opportunity shall be let slip to bring some judgment upon them, until there be an end of them, and they be quite rooted out. Note, To those whom God finds impenitent sinners he will be found an implacable judge. And when it comes to this they shall know, ver. 29, "Whose word shall stand, mine or theirs." They said they should recover themselves when they returned to worship the queen of heaven; God saith they should ruin themselves, and now the event will shew which was in the right. The contest between God and sinners is, whose word shall stand, whose will shall be done, who shall get the better. Sinners say they shall have peace, though they go on. God saith they shall have no peace; but when God judgeth he will overcome. God's word shall stand, and not the sinners'.

2. He tells them that a very few of them should escape the sword, and in process of time return into the land of Judah a small number, ver. 28. Next none, in comparison with the great numbers that should return out of the land of the Chaldeans. This seems designed to upbraid those who boasted of their numbers that concurred in sin; there were none to speak of that did not join in idolatry. Well, saith God, and there shall be as few that shall escape the sword and famine.

3. He gives them a sign that all these threatenings shall be accomplished in their season; that they shall be consumed here in Egypt, and shall quite perish. Pharaoh Hophra, the present king of Egypt, shall be delivered into the hand of his enemies that seek his life; of his own rebellious subjects, so some, under Amasis, who usurped his throne; of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, so others, who invaded his kingdom. The former is related by Herodotus, the latter by Josephus. It is likely this Pharaoh had tempted the Jews to idolatry by promises of his favour; however, they depended upon him for his protection; and it would be more than a presage of their ruin, it would be a step towards it, if he were gone. They expected more from him than from Zedekiah king of Judah, he was a more potent and politic prince; but, saith God, I will give him into the hand of his enemies, as I gave Zedekiah. Note, Those creature comforts and confidences that we promise ourselves most from may fail us as soon as those that we promise ourselves least from, for they are all what God makes them, not what we fancy them.

The sacred history records not the accomplishment of this prophecy; but its silence is sufficient. We hear no more of these Jews in Egypt, and therefore conclude them, according to this prediction, lost there; for no word of God shall fall to the ground.

CHAPTER XLV.

The prophecy we have in this chapter concerns Baruch only, yet is intended for the support and encouragement of all the Lord's people that serve him faithfully, and keep close to him in difficult trying times. It is laid here after the story of the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the Jews, but was delivered long before, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, as was the prophecy in the next chapter, and probably those that follow. We here find, I. How Baruch was frightened when he was brought into trouble for writing and reading Jeremiah's roll, ver. 1—3. II. How his fears were checked with a reproof for his great expectations, and silenced with a promise of special preservation, ver. 4, 5. Though Baruch was only Jeremiah's scribe, yet this notice is taken of his frights, and this provision made for his comfort; for God despiseth not any of his servants, but graciously concerns himself for the meanest and weakest, for Baruch the scribe as well as for Jeremiah the prophet.

THE word that Jeremiah the prophet spake unto Baruch the son of Neriah, when he had written these words in a book at the mouth of Jeremiah, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, saying, 2 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, unto thee, O Baruch;

3 Thou didst say, Woe is me now!
For the LORD hath added grief to my sorrow;
I fainted in my sighing,
And I find no rest

4 Thus shalt thou say unto him, The LORD saith thus;
Behold, that which I have built will I break down,
And that which I have planted I will pluck up,
Even this whole land.

5 And seekest thou great things for thyself?
Seek them not: [LORD:
For, behold, I will bring evil upon all flesh, saith the
But thy life will I give unto thee for a prey
In all places whither thou goest

How Baruch was employed in writing Jeremiah's prophecies, and reading them, we had an account, ch. xxxvi., and how he was threatened for it by the king, warrants being out for him, and he forced to abscond, and how narrowly he escaped under a Divine protection, to which story this chapter should have been subjoined; but that, it having reference to a private person, it is here thrown into the latter end of the book, as St. Paul's epistle to Philemon is put after his other epistles. Observe,

First. The consternation that poor Baruch was in when he was sought for by the king's messengers, and obliged to hide his head, and the notice which God took of it. He cried out, "Woe is me now," ver. 3. He was a young man, setting out in the world, he was well affected to the things of God, and was willing to serve God and his prophet; but when it came to suffering he was desirous to be excused. Being an ingenious man and a scholar, he stood fair for preferment; and now to be driven into a corner, and in danger of a prison, or worse, was a great baulk to him. When he read the roll publicly, he hoped to gain reputation by it, that it would have made him to be taken notice of and employed; but when he found that instead of that it exposed him to contempt, and brought him into disgrace, he cried out, I am undone, I shall fall into the pursuivant's hands, and be imprisoned and put to death, or banished; "The Lord has added grief to my sorrow;" that is, has loaded me with one trouble after another. After the grief of writing and reading the prophecies of my country's ruin, I have the sorrow of being treated as a criminal for so doing; and though another might make nothing of this, yet for my part I cannot bear it, it is a burthen too heavy for me. "I fainted in my sighing," or, I am faint with my sighing, it just kills me, and "I find no rest," no satisfaction in my own mind; I cannot compose myself as I should and would to bear it, nor have I any prospect of relief or comfort. Baruch was a good man; but we must say, this was his infirmity. Note, 1. Young beginners in religion, like fresh-water soldiers, are apt to be discouraged with the little difficulties which they commonly meet with at first in the service of God. They do but run with the had in view when they suggested "frame," but which some explain of the starry host, and others of service or worship. The ordinary reading and translation must be preferred, as it is evident from the context that a personal female deity is intended. (Compare chap. vii. 18.)

xliv. 19. For "men" here read "husbands," the sense being that the women had the consent and participation of their husbands in their idolatrous practices.

xliv. 30. Here the reigning monarch is called Pharaoh-Hophra and not Pharaoh only, as in chap. xxxvii. 5. The Greeks call him Apries. This Pharaoh was "dethroned by a usurper named Amasis, and after enduring many indignities, was strangled in prison" (W. C. Taylor). The writer just quoted may well observe that the prophecy of this verse was remarkably fulfilled. Between Pharaoh-Hophra's dethronement and death, Nebuchadnezzar is said to have invaded Egypt, and made terms with Amasis only after great defootmen, and it weareth them; they faint upon the very dawning of the day of adversity, and it is an evidence that their strength is small, Pr. xxiv. 10; that their faith is weak, and they are yet but babes that cry for every hurt, and every fright. 2. Some of the best and dearest of God's saints and servants, when they have seen storms rising, have been in frights, and apt to make the worst of things, and to disquiet themselves with melancholy apprehensions more than there is cause for. 3. God takes notice of the frets and discontents of his people, and is displeased with them. Baruch should have rejoiced that he was counted worthy to suffer in such a good cause, and with such good company; but instead of that he vexeth at it, and blames his lot; nay, and reflects upon his God, as if he had dealt hardly with him. What he said was spoken in a heat and passion, but God was offended at it; as Moses himself did, and paid dear for it too, when, his spirit being provoked, he spake unadvisedly with his lips. Thou didst say so and so, and it was not well said. God keeps account what we say, even when we speak in haste.

Secondly. The reproof that God gave him for talking at this rate. Jeremiah was troubled to see him in such a toss, and knew not well what to say to him; he was loath to chide him, and yet thought he deserved it; was willing to comfort him, and yet knew not which way to go about it; but God tells him what he shall say unto him, ver. 3. Jeremiah could not be certain what was at the bottom of the complaints and fears, but God sees it. They came from his corruptions; and therefore the hurt might not be healed slightly. He searcheth the wound, and shews him that he had raised his expectations too high in this world, and had promised himself too much from it, and that made this distress and trouble he was in so very grievous to him, and so hard to be borne. Note, The frowns of the world would not disquiet us as they do if we did not foolishly flatter ourselves with the hopes of its smiles, and court and covet them too much. It is our over-fondness for the good things of this present time that makes us impatient under its evil things. Now God shews him that it was his fault and folly, at this time of day especially, either to desire or to look for an abundance of the wealth and honour of this world; for, 1. The ship was sinking; ruin was coming upon the Jewish nation, an utter and universal ruin. That which I have built to be a house for myself I am breaking down, and that which I have planted to be a vineyard for myself! am plucking up, even this whole land, the Jewish church and state, and dost thou now seek great things for thyself? Dost thou expect to be rich and honourable, and to make a figure now? No, 2. It is absurd for thee to be now painting thine own cabin. Canst thou expect to be high when all are brought low? to be full, when all about thee are empty? To seek ourselves more than the public welfare, especially to seek great things to ourselves, when the public is in danger, is very unbecoming Israelites. We may apply it to this world, and our state in it; God in his providence is breaking down and pulling up; everything is uncertain and perishing; we cannot expect any continuing city here. What folly is it then to seek great things for ourselves here, where every thing is little, and nothing certain!

Thirdly. The encouragement that God gave him to hope that, though he should not be great, yet he should be safe; "I will bring evil upon all flesh," all nations of men, all orders and degrees of men; "but thy life will I give to thee for a prey," (thy soul, so the word is,) in all places whither thou goest. Thou must expect to be hurried from place to place, and wherever thou goest to be in danger; but thou shalt escape, though often very narrowly; shalt have thy life, but it shall be as a prey which is got with much difficulty and danger; thou shalt be saved as by fire. Note, The preservation and continuance of life is a very great mercy, and we are bound to account it so, as it is the prolonging of our opportunity to glorify God in this world, and to get ready for a better; and at some times especially, when the arrows of death fly thick about us, it is a signal favour, and what we ought to be very thankful for, and while we have it must not complain though we be disappointed of the great things we expected. Is not the life more than meat?

CHAPTER XLVI.

How judgment began at the house of God we have found in the foregoing prophecy and history, but now we shall find that it did not end there. In this and the following chapters we have predictions of the desolations of the neighbour nations, and those brought upon them too mostly by the king of Babylon, till at length Babylon itself comes to be reckoned with. The prophecy against Egypt is here put first, and takes up this whole chapter, in which we have, I. A prophecy of the defeat of Pharaoh-necho's army by the Chaldean forces at Carchemish, which was accomplished presently in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, ver. 1—12. II. A prophecy of the descent which Nebuchadnezzar should make upon the land of Egypt, and his success in it, which was accomplished some years after the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 13—26. III. A word of comfort to the Israel of God in the midst of these calamities, ver. 27, 28.

THE word of the LORD which came to Jeremiah the prophet against the Gentiles; 2 Against Egypt, against the army of Pharaoh-necho king of Egypt, which was by the river Euphrates in Carchemish, which Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon smote in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah.

3 Order ye the buckler and shield,
And draw near to battle.
4 Harness the horses; and get up, ye horsemen,
And stand forth with your helmets;
Furbish the spears, and put on the brigandines.
5 Wherefore have I seen them dismayed and turned away back?
And their mighty ones are beaten down,
And are fled apace, and look not back:
For fear was round about, saith the LORD
6 Let not the swift flee away,
Nor the mighty man escape;
They shall stumble, and fall
Toward the north by the river Euphrates.
7 Who is this that cometh up as a flood,
Whose waters are moved as the rivers?
8 Egypt riseth up like a flood,
And his waters are moved like the rivers;
And he saith, I will go up, and will cover the earth;
I will destroy the city and the inhabitants thereof
9 Come up, ye horses;
And rage, ye chariots;
And let the mighty men come forth;
The Ethiopians and the Libyans, that handle the shield;
And the Lydians, that handle and bend the bow
10 For this is the day of the Lord GOD of hosts,
A day of vengeance, that he may avenge him of his adversaries:
And the sword shall devour,
And it shall be satiate and made drunk with their blood:
For the Lord GOD of hosts hath a sacrifice
In the north country by the river Euphrates.
11 Go up into Gilead, and take balm,
O virgin, the daughter of Egypt:
In vain shalt thou use many medicines,
For thou shalt not be cured.
12 The nations have heard of thy shame,
And thy cry hath filled the land:
For the mighty man hath stumbled against the mighty
And they are fallen both together.

The first verse is the title of that part of this book which relates to the neighbour nations, and follows here. It is the word of the Lord which came to Jeremiah against the Gentiles; for God is king and judge of nations, knows them, and will call them to an account that know him not, nor take any notice of him. Both Isaiah and Ezekiel prophesied against these nations, that Jeremiah here has a several saying to, and with reference to the same events. In the Old Testament we have the word of the Lord against the Gentiles. In the New Testament we have the word of the Lord for the Gentiles; that they who are far off are made nigh.

He begins with Egypt, because they were of old Israel's oppressors, and of late their deceivers, when they put confidence in them. In these verses he foretells the overthrow of the army of Pharaoh-necho by Nebuchadnezzar, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, which was so complete a victory to the king of Babylon that thereby he recovered from the river of Egypt to the river Euphrates all that pertained to the king of Egypt, and so weakened him that he "came not again any more out of his land," as we find, 2 Kin. xxiv. 7; and so made him pay dear for his expedition against the king of Assyria four years before, in which he slew Josiah, 2 Kin. xxiii. 29. This is the event that is here foretold in lofty expressions of triumph over Egypt, thus foiled; which Jeremiah would speak of with a particular pleasure, because the death of Josiah which he had lamented was now avenged on Pharaoh-necho. Now here,

First. The Egyptians are upbraided with the mighty preparations they made for this expedition, in which the prophet calls to them to do their utmost, for so they would. Come then, order the buckler, let the weapons of war be got ready, ver. 3. Egypt was famous for horses, let them be harnessed, and the cavalry well mounted; "Get up, ye horsemen, and stand forth," &c., ver. 4. See what preparations the children of men make with abundance of care and trouble, and at a vast expense, to kill one another, as if they did not die fast enough of themselves. He compares their marching out upon this expedition to the rising of their river Nile, ver. 7, 8. Egypt now riseth up like a flood, scorning to keep within its own banks, and threatening to overflow all the neighbouring lands. It is a very formidable army that the Egyptians bring into the field upon this occasion; the prophet summons them, ver. 9, "Come up, ye horses; rage, ye chariots." He challengeth them to bring all their confederate troops together, the Ethiopians, that descended from the same stock with the Egyptians, Gen. x. 6, and were their neighbours and allies; the Lybians and Lydians both seated in Africa, to the west of Egypt, and from them the Egyptians fetched their auxiliary forces. Let them strengthen themselves with all the art and interest they have, yet it shall be all in vain, they shall be shamefully defeated notwithstanding; for God will fight against them, and against him there is no wisdom, nor counsel, Pr. xxi. 30, 31. It concerns them that go forth to war, not only to order the buckler and harness the horses, but to repent of their sins, and pray to God for his presence with them, and that they may have it to keep themselves from every wicked thing.

Secondly. They are upbraided with the great expectations they had from this expedition, which were quite contrary to what God intended in bringing them together. They knew their own thoughts, and God knew them, and sate in heaven and laughed at them, but they knew not the thoughts of the Lord, for he gathers them as sheaves into the floor, Mic. iv. 11, 12. Egypt saith, ver. 8, "I will go up, I will cover the earth," and none shall hinder me, "I will destroy the city," whatever city it is that stands in my way; like Pharaoh of old, I will pursue, I will overtake. Egypt saith they shall have a day of it, but God saith it shall be his day; "This is the day of the Lord of hosts," ver. 10, the day in which he will be exalted in the overthrow of the Egyptians. They meant one thing, but God meant another; they designed it for the advancement of their dignity and the enlargement of their dominion; but God designed it for a great abasement and weakening of their kingdom. It is a day of vengeance for Josiah's death; it is a day of sacrifice to Divine justice, to which multitudes of the sinners of Egypt shall fall as victims. Note, When men think to magnify themselves by pushing on unrighteous enterprises, let them expect that God will glorify himself by blasting them and cutting them off.

Thirdly. They are upbraided with their cowardice and inglorious flight when they come to an engagement, ver. 5, 6. Wherefore have I seen them, notwithstanding these mighty and vast preparations, and all these expressions of bravery and resolution, when the Chaldean army faceth them, dismayed, turned back quite disheartened, and no spirit left in them. 1. They make a struction of life and much plunder. Of this event there are few existing records, and they are not so clear as could be desired.

xlv. 1. This chapter has got out of its historical place, which is after chap. xxxvi., of which it is to be regarded as a continuation. There is no doubt whatever about the time to which the chapter belongs, because both it and chap. xxxvi. are ascribed to the fourth year of Jehoiakim.

xlvi. 1, 2. These verses contain a general heading or introduction to chaps. xlvi.—li., and a particular title to the prophecies of this chapter. It is said that Necho sent out a fleet which sailed round the whole of Africa, setting out from the Red Sea, and returning by the Mediterranean. He defeated Josiah in the battle of Megiddo, and afterwards overcame the Babylonians and took Carchemish. Four years later the Babylonians under Nebuchadnezzar defeated him at Carchemish, and drove the Egyptian forces back into Egypt with the loss of their newly won dominions (2 Kings xxiv.

shameful retreat. Even their mighty ones, that one would think should have stood their ground, flee a flight, flee by consent, make the best of their way, flee in confusion and with the utmost precipitation; they have neither time nor heart to look back, but fear is round about them, for they apprehend it so. And yet, 2. They cannot make their escape. They have the shame of flying, and yet not the satisfaction of saving themselves by flight; they might as well have stood their ground and died upon the spot, for even the swift shall not flee away. The lightness of their heels shall fail them when it comes to the trial, as well as the stoutness of their hearts; the mighty shall not escape, nay, they are beaten down and broken to pieces. They shall stumble in their flight, and fall towards the north, towards their enemies' country; for such confusion were they in when they took to their feet, that instead of making homewards, as men usually do in that case, they made forwards. Note, The race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong. Valiant men are not always victorious.

Fourthly. They are upbraided with their utter inability ever to recover this blow, which should be fatal to their nation, ver. 11, 12. The damsel, the daughter of Egypt, that lived in great pomp and state, is sorely wounded by this defeat. Let her now seek for balm in Gilead, and physicians there; let her use all the medicines her wise men can prescribe for the healing of this hurt and the repairing of the loss sustained by this defeat, but all in vain, no cure shall be to them; they shall never be able to bring such a powerful army as this into the field again. The nations that rang of thy glory and strength have now heard of thy shame, how shamefully thou wast routed, and how thou art weakened by it; it needs not be spread by the triumphs of the conquerors, the shrieks and outcries of the conquered will proclaim it; thy cry filled the country about. For when they fled several ways, one mighty man stumbled upon another and dashed against another, such confusion were they in, so that both together became a prey to the pursuers, an easy prey. A thousand such dreadful accidents there should be, which should fill the country with the cry of them that were overcome. Let not the mighty man, therefore, glory in his might, for the time may come when it will stand him in no stead.

13 The word that the LORD spake to Jeremiah the prophet, how Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon should come and smite the land of Egypt.

14 Declare ye in Egypt, and publish in Migdol,
And publish in Noph and in Tahpanhes:
Say ye, Stand fast, and prepare thee;
For the sword shall devour round about thee

They stood not, because the LORD did drive them

And they said, Arise, and let us go again to our own
And to the land of our nativity
From the oppressing sword.

He hath passed the time appointed

Whose name is the LORD of hosts,
Surely as Tabor is among the mountains,
And as Carmel by the sea, so shall he come 19 O thou daughter dwelling in Egypt,
Furnish thyself to go into captivity:
For Noph shall be waste
And desolate without an inhabitant

And are fled away together: they did not stand,
Because the day of their calamity was come upon them,
And the time of their visitation.

For they shall march with an army,
And come against her with axes,
As hewers of wood.

Though it cannot be searched;
Because they are more than the grasshoppers,
And are innumerable.

Behold, I will punish the multitude of No,
And Pharaoh, and Egypt,
With their gods, and their kings;
Even Pharaoh, and all them that trust in him:

And at ease, and none shall make him afraid.

Saith the LORD: for I am with thee;
For I will make a full end of all the nations
Whither I have driven thee:
But I will not make a full end of thee,
But correct thee in measure;
Yet will I not leave thee wholly unpunished.

NO—THEBES.—ver. 25.

In these verses we have.

First. Confusion and terror spoken to Egypt. The accomplishment of the prediction in the former part of the chapter disabled the Egyptians to make any attempts upon other nations; for what could they do when their army was routed? But still they remained strong at home, and none of their neighbours durst make any attempts upon them. Though the kings of Egypt came no more out of their land, 2 Kin. xxiv. 7, yet they kept safe and easy in their land; and what would they desire more than peaceably to enjoy their own? which, one would think, all men should be content to do, and not covet to invade their neighbours. But the measure of Egypt's iniquity is full, and now they shall not long enjoy their own; they that encroached on others shall now be themselves encroached on. The scope of the prophecy here is to shew how the king of Babylon should shortly come, and smite the land of Egypt, and bring the war into their own bosoms, which they had formerly carried into his borders, ver. 13. This was fulfilled by the same hand with the former, even Nebuchadnezzar's, but many years after, twenty at least, and probably the prediction of it was long after the former prediction, and perhaps much about the same time with that other prediction of the same event which we had ch. xliii. 10.

1. Here is the alarm of war sounded in Egypt, to their great amazement, ver. 14. Notice given to the country that the enemy is approaching, the sword is devouring round about in the neighbouring countries, and therefore it is time for the Egyptians to put themselves in a posture of defence, to prepare for war, that they may give the enemy a warm reception. This must be proclaimed in all parts of Egypt, particularly in Migdol, Noph, and Tahpanhes, because in these places especially the Jewish refugees, or fugitives rather, had planted themselves in contempt of God's command, ch. xliv. 1, and let them hear what a sorry shelter Egypt is like to be to them.

2. The retreat of the forces of other nations, which the Egyptians had in their pay, hereupon, is here foretold. Some considerable number of those troops, it is probable, were posted upon the frontiers, to guard them, where they were beaten off by the invaders and put to flight. Then were the "valiant men swept away," ver. 15, as with a sweeping rain; it is the word that is used, Pr. xxviii. 3. They can none of them stand their ground, because the Lord driveth them from their respective posts; he drives them by his terrors, he drives them by enabling the Chaldeans to drive them. It is not possible those should fix whom the wrath of God chaseth. He it was, ver. 16, that "made xlvi. 3, 4. This is an ironical summons to the Egyptians to prepare for battle. The buckler was a small shield. Horses were much used in Egyptian warfare. The soldiers wore helmets, and brigandines or coats of mail, and their lances were carefully furbished, or polished.

7). Carchemish was not Circesium, but higher up the Euphrates, near Hierapolis or Mabug.

xlvi. 6. For "toward the north" we should rather translate "in the north," which was the direction of Carchemish from Palestine.

xlvi. 15. For "thy valiant men," some copies and versions have "thy valiant one," or rather "mighty one." The Septuagint translators took this as a reference to Apis, the bull, which the Egyptians adored, and some critics have adopted their idea.

xlvi. 18. By Tabor and Carmel some understand Pharaoh, but it seems better to apply the figures to Nebuchadnezzar.

xlvi. 19. Fragmentary as the history of the invasion is, it is quite certain that Noph, or Memphis, which was then a city of great many to fall." Yea, when their day is come to fall, the enemy needs not throw them down, they shall fall one upon another, every man shall be a stumbling-block to his fellow, to his follower; nay, if God pleaseth they shall be made to fall one upon another, every man's sword shall be against his fellow. Her hired men, the troops Egypt has in her service, are indeed in the midst of her like fatted bullocks, lusty men, able-bodied, and great spirited, that were likely for action, and to have made their part good against the enemy, but they are turned back. Their hearts failed them, and instead of fighting they are fled away together; how could they withstand their fate when the day of their calamity was come, the day in which God will visit them in wrath? Some think they are compared to fatted bullocks for their luxury; they had wantoned in pleasures, so that they were very unfit for hardships, and therefore turned back, and could not stand. In this consternation, 1st. They all made homewards, towards their own country, ver. 16. They said, "Arise, and let us go again to our own people," where we may be safe from the oppressing sword of the Chaldeans, that bears down all before it. In times of exigence little confidence is to be put in mercenary troops, that fight purely for pay, and have no interest in them whom they fight for. 2nd. They exclaimed mightily against Pharaoh, to whose cowardice or ill conduct it is probable their defeat was owing. When he posted them there upon the borders of his country it is likely he told them he would, within such a time, come himself, with a gallant army of his own subjects, to support them; but he failed them, and when the enemy advanced they found they had none to back them, so that they were perfectly abandoned to the fury of the invaders. No marvel, then, that they quitted their post and deserted the service, crying out, "Pharaoh king of Egypt is but a noise," ver. 17. He can hector, and bounce, and talk big, what mighty things he would do, but that is all, he brings nothing to pass. All his promises to those in alliance with him, or that are employed for him, vanish into smoke; he brings not the succours he engaged to bring, or not till it is too late. He hath passed the time appointed, did not keep his word, nor keep his day, and therefore they bid him farewell, they will never serve under him any more. Note, Many times those that make most noise in any business are but a noise; great talkers are little doers.

3. The formidable power of the Chaldean army is here described bearing down all before it. The King of kings, whose name is the Lord of hosts, and before whom the mightiest kings on earth, though gods to us, are but grasshoppers; he hath said it, he hath sworn it, As I live, saith this king, as Tabor overtops the mountains, and Carmel overlooks the sea, so shall the king of Babylon overpower all the force of Egypt, such a command shall he have, such a sway shall he bear, ver. 18. He and his army shall come against Egypt "with axes, as hewers of wood," ver. 22, and the Egyptians shall be no more able to resist them than the tree is to resist the man that comes with an axe to cut it down. So that Egypt shall be felled as a forest is by the hewers of wood, which, if they be many of them, and those well provided with instruments for the purpose, will be done in a little time. Egypt is very populous, full of towns and cities, like a forest, the trees of which cannot be searched or numbered, and very rich: full of hid treasures, many of which will escape the searching eye of the Chaldean soldiers. But they shall make a great spoil in the country, for they are more than the locusts, that come in vast swarms, and overrun a country, devouring every green thing, Joel i. 6, 7; so shall the Chaldeans do, for they are innumerable. Note, The Lord of hosts hath numberless hosts at his command.

4. The desolation of Egypt hereby is foretold, and the waste that should be made of that rich country. Egypt is now like a very fair heifer or calf, ver. 20, fat and shining, and not accustomed to the yoke of subjection; wanton as a heifer that is well fed and very sportful. Some think here is an allusion to Apis, the bull or calf which the Egyptians worshipped, from whom the children of Israel learned to worship the golden calf. Egypt is as fair as a goddess, and adores herself; but destruction cometh, cutting up comes, (so some read it;) it comes out of the north. Thence the Chaldean soldiers shall come as so many butchers, or sacrificers, to kill and cut up this fair heifer. 1st. The Egyptians shall be brought down, shall be tamed, and their tune changed. "The daughter of Egypt shall be confounded," ver. 24, shall be filled with astonishment. Their voice shall go like a serpent, that is, it shall be very low and submissive; they shall not low like a fair heifer that makes a great noise, but hiss out of their holes like serpents. They shall not dare to make loud complaints of the cruelty of their conquerors, but vent their griefs in silent murmurs. They shall not now, as they used to do, answer roughly, but with the poor use entreaties and beg for their lives. 2nd. They shall be carried away prisoners into their enemies' land; ver. 19, "O thou daughter," dwelling securely and delicately in Egypt, that fruitful pleasant country, do not think this world will last always, but "furnish thyself to go into captivity;" instead of rich clothes, which will but tempt the enemy to strip thee, get plain and warm clothes; instead of fine shoes provide strong ones, and inure thyself to hardship, that thou mayest bear it the better. Note, It concerns us, among all our preparations, to prepare for trouble; we provide for the entertainment of our friends, let us not neglect to provide for the entertainment of our enemies, nor among all our furniture omit furniture for captivity. The Egyptians must prepare to flee, for their cities shall be evacuated; Noph particularly shall be "desolate, without an inhabitant," so general shall the slaughter and the captivity be. There are some penalties which we say the king and the multitude are exempted from, but here even these are obnoxious. The multitude of No shall be punished; it is called "populous No," Nah. iii. 8. Though hand join in hand, yet they shall not escape; nor can any think to go off in the crowd. Be they never so many, they shall find God will be too many for them. Their kings and all their petty princes shall fall, and their gods too, ch. xliii. 12, 13, their idols and their great men. Those which they call tutelar deities shall be no protection to them. Pharaoh shall be brought down, and all those that trust in him, ver. 25, particularly the Jews that came to sojourn in his country, trusting in him rather than in God. All these shall be delivered into the hand of the northern nations, ver. 24; into the hand not only of Nebuchadnezzar, that mighty potentate, but into the hand of his servants, according to the curse on Ham's posterity, of which the Egyptians were, that they should be the servant of servants. These seek their lives, and into their hands they shall be delivered.

5. An intimation is given that in process of time Egypt shall recover itself again; ver. 26, "Afterwards it shall be inhabited," shall be peopled again, whereas by this destruction it was almost dispeopled. Ezekiel foretells that this should be at the end of forty years, Eze. xxix. 13. See what changes the nations of the earth are subject to, how they are emptied and increased again; and let not nations that prosper be secure, nor those that for the present are under hatches despair.

Secondly.—Here is comfort and peace spoken to the Israel of God, ver. 27, 28. Some understand it of those whom the king of Egypt had carried into captivity with Jehoahaz, but we read not of any that were carried captives with him; it may therefore refer rather to the captives in Babylon whom God had mercy in store for, or, more generally to all the people of God, designed for their encouragement in the most difficult times, when the judgments of God are abroad among the nations. We had these words of comfort before, ch. xxx. 10, 11.

1. Let the wicked of the earth tremble, they have cause for it; "But fear not thou, O my servant Jacob; and be not dismayed, O Israel." And again, "Fear thou not, O Jacob." God would not have his people be a timorous people. 2. The wicked of the earth shall be put away like dross, not to be looked after any more; but God's people, in order to their being saved, shall be found out and gathered, though they be afar off; shall be redeemed, though they be held fast in captivity, and shall return. 3. The wicked is like the troubled sea when it cannot rest, flee when none pursues; but Jacob being at home in God, shall be in rest and at ease, and none shall make him afraid; for what time he is afraid, he has a God to trust to. 4. The wicked, God beholds afar off; But wherever thou art, O Jacob, I am with thee, a very present help. 5. A full end shall be made of the nations that oppress God's Israel, as Egypt and Babylon; but mercy shall be kept in store for the Israel of God. They shall be corrected, but not cast off, the correction shall be in measure, in respect of degree and continuance. Nations have their periods; the Jewish nation itself is come to an end as a nation; but the gospel church, God's spiritual Israel, still continues, and will to the end of time. In that this promise is to have its full accomplishment, that though God correct it he will never make an end of it.

CHAPTER XLVII.

This chapter reads the Philistines their doom, as the former read the Egyptians theirs; and by the same hand, that of Nebuchadnezzar. It is short, but terrible; and Tyre and Sidon, though they lay at some distance from them, come in sharers with them in the destruction here threatened. I. It is foretold that the forces of the northern crowns should come upon them, to their great terror, ver. 1—5. II. That the war should continue long, and their endeavours to put an end to it should be in vain, ver. 6, 7.

THE word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah the prophet against the Philistines, before that Pharaoh smote Gaza. 2 Thus saith the LORD;

Behold, waters rise up out of the north,
And shall be an overflowing flood,
And shall overflow the land, and all that is therein;
The city, and them that dwell therein:
Then the men shall cry,
And all the inhabitants of the land shall howl. [horses,
3 At the noise of the stamping of the hoofs of his strong
At the rushing of his chariots,
And at the rumbling of his wheels,
The fathers shall not look back to their children
For feebleness of hands;
4 Because of the day that cometh
To spoil all the Philistines,
And to cut off from Tyrus and Zidon
Every helper that remaineth:
For the LORD will spoil the Philistines,
The remnant of the country of Caphtor.
5 Baldness is come upon Gaza;
Ashkelon is cut off with the remnant of their valley:
How long wilt thou cut thyself?
6 O thou sword of the LORD,
How long will it be ere thou be quiet? put up thyself into thy scabbard, Rest, and be still.
7 How can it be quiet,
Seeing the LORD hath given it a charge
Against Ashkelon, and against the sea shore?
There hath he appointed it.

ASHKELON.

magnitude and splendour, has for ages been in ruins, and indeed the ruins themselves have almost all disappeared. Diodorus calculated the city at over seventeen English miles in circuit, but this may be a somewhat exaggerated estimate.

xlvi. 20. The comparison of Egypt here to a heifer may very well be an allusion to the worship of the bull Apis.

xlvi. 22. Like a serpent which dare not emerge from the hollow tree in which it lurks, but hisses at those who bring their axes to destroy its refuge, so shall the Egyptians proclaim their hostility and their fear, but equally in vain.

xlvi. 25. Instead of "the multitude of No" we may and should read "Amon of No," Amon being an Egyptian deity, and No a city. The Amon meant is the Jupiter Ammon of the classics, and one of the chief gods of Egypt. The city of No was Thebes, one of the greatest and most magnificent of the cities on the Nile, and still an object of wonder, though reduced to ruins. In the Greek version

As the Egyptians had often proved false friends, so the Philistines had always been sworn enemies, to the Israel of God, and the more dangerous and vexatious for their being such near neighbours to them. They were pretty well humbled in David's time, but it seems they had got head again, and were a considerable people till Nebuchadnezzar cut them off with other their neighbours, which is the event here foretold. The date of this prophecy is observable; it was before Pharaoh smote Gaza. When this blow was given to Gaza by the king of Egypt is not certain; whether in his expedition against Carchemish, or in his return from thence, after he had slain Josiah, or when he afterwards came with design to relieve Jerusalem; but this is mentioned here to shew that this word of the Lord came to Jeremiah against the Philistines, when they were in their full strength and lustre, themselves and their cities in good condition, in no peril from any adversity, or evil occurrent, when no disturbance of their repose was foreseen by any human probabilities; yet then Jeremiah foretold their ruin, which Pharaoh's smiting Gaza soon after would be but an earnest of, and, as it were, the beginning of sorrows to that country. It is here foretold,

First. That a foreign enemy, and a very formidable one, shall be brought upon them; "Waters rise up out of the north," ver. 2. Waters sometimes signify multitudes of people and nations, Rev. xvii. 15; sometimes great and threatening calamities, Ps. lxix. 1; these here signify both. They rise out of the north, whence fair weather used to come, and the wind that drives away rain; but now a terrible storm comes out of that cold climate. The Chaldean army shall overflow the land like a deluge. Probably this happened before the destruction of Jeru alem, for it should seem that in Gedaliah's time, which was just after, the army of the Chaldeans was quite withdrawn out of those parts. The country of the Philistines was but of small extent, so that it would soon be overwhelmed by so vast an army.

Secondly. That they shall all be in a mighty fright and consternation upon it. The men shall have no heart to fight, but shall sit down and cry like children; "All the inhabitants of the land shall howl," so that nothing but lamentation shall be heard in all places. The occasion of the fright is elegantly described, ver. 3; before it comes to killing and slaying, the very stamping of the horses, and rattling of the chariots, when the enemy makes his approach, shall strike a terror upon the people, to that degree that parents in their fright shall seem void of natural affection, for they "shall not look back to their children," to provide for their safety, or so much as to see what becomes of them. Their hands shall be so feeble, that they shall despair of carrying them off with them, and therefore they shall not care for seeing them, but leave them to take their lot; or they shall be in such a consternation that they shall quite forget even those pieces of themselves. Let none be over fond of their children, nor doat upon them, since such distress may come as that they may either wish they had none or forget that they have, and have no heart to look upon them.

Thirdly. That the country of the Philistines shall be spoiled and laid waste, and the other countries adjoining to them, and in alliance with them. It is a day to spoil the Philistines, for the Lord will spoil them, ver. 4. Note, Those whom God will spoil must needs be spoiled, for if God be against them who can be for them? Tyre and Sidon were strong and wealthy cities, and they used to help the Philistines in a strait, but now they shall themselves be involved in the common ruin, and God will cut off from them every helper that remains. Note, Those that trust to help from creatures will find it cut off when they most need it, and will thereby be put into the utmost confusion. Who the "remnant of the country of Caphtor" were is uncertain, but we find that the Caphtorim were near akin to the Philistines, Gen. x. 14, and probably, when their own country was destroyed, such of them as remained came and settled with their kinsmen the Philistines, and were now spoiled with them. Some particular places are here named, Gaza and Askelon, ver. 5. Baldness is come upon them, the invaders have stripped them of all their ornaments, or, they have made themselves bald in token of extreme grief; and they are cut off, with the other cities that were in the plain or valley about them. The products of their fruitful valleys shall be spoiled, and made a prey of by the conquerors.

Fourthly. That these calamities shall continue long. The prophet in the foresight of this, with his usual tenderness, asks them first, ver. 5, How long will you cut yourselves? as men in extreme sorrow and anguish do. O how tedious will the calamity be! not only cutting, but long cutting. But he turns from the effect to the cause; they cut themselves, for the sword of the Lord cuts them. And therefore, 1. He bespeaks that to be still; ver. 6, "O thou sword of the Lord, how long wilt it be ere thou be quiet?" He begs it would put up itself into the scabbard, would devour no more flesh, drink no more blood. This expresseth the prophet's earnest desire to see an end of the war, looking with compassion as became a man, even upon the Philistines themselves, when their country was made desolate by the sword. Note, War is the sword of the Lord, with it he punisheth the crimes of his enemies, and pleads the cause of his own people. When war is once begun, it often lasts long; the sword once drawn doth not quickly find the way into the scabbard again; nay, some when they draw the sword throw away the scabbard, for they delight in war. So deplorable are the desolations of war, that the blessing of peace cannot but be very desirable. O that swords might be beaten into ploughshares! 2. Yet he gives a satisfactory account of the continuance of the war, and stops the mouth of his own complaint; ver. 7, "How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge" against such and such places, particularly specified in its commission? "there hath he appointed it." Note, 1st. That the sword of war hath its charge from the Lord of hosts. Every bullet hath so; you call them blind bullets, but they are directed by an all-seeing God. The war itself is so: he saith to it, Go, and it goes; Come, and it comes; Do this, and it doth it; for he is commander-in-chief. 2nd. When the sword is drawn, we cannot expect it should be sheathed till it has fulfilled its charge. As the word of God, so his rod and his sword, shall accomplish that for which he sends them.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

Moab is next set to the bar before Jeremiah the prophet, whom God had constituted judge over the nations and kingdoms, from his mouth to receive its doom. Isaiah's predictions concerning Moab had had their accomplishment; we had the predictions, Isa. xv. and xvi., and the like, Am. ii. 1; and they were fulfilled when the Assyrians under Salmanasser invaded and distressed Moab. But this is a prophecy of the desolations of Moab by the Chaldeans, which were accomplished under Nebuzar-adan, about five years after he had destroyed Jerusalem. Here is, I. The destruction foretold, that it should be great and general, should extend itself to all parts of the country, ver. 1—6, 8; and again, ver. 21—25, 34; that spoilers should come upon them, and force some to flee, ver. 9; should carry many into captivity, ver. 12, 46; that the enemy should come shortly, ver. 16; come swiftly and surprise them, ver. 40, 41; that he should make thorough work, ver. 10; and lay the country quite waste, though it was very strong, ver. 14, 15; that there should be no escaping, ver. 42, 45; that that should force them to quit their idols, ver. 13, 35; and put an end to all their joy, ver. 33, 34; their neighbours shall lament them, ver. 17—19; and the prophet himself doth, ver. 31, 36, &c. II. The causes of this destruction assigned; it was sin that brought this ruin upon them, their pride and security, and carnal confidence, ver. 7, 11, 14, 29; and contempt of, and enmity to, God and his people, ver. 26, 27 30. III. A promise of the restoration of Moab ver. 47.

AGAINST Moab thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Woe unto Nebo! for it is spoiled:
Kiriathaim is confounded and taken:
Misgab is confounded and dismayed.
2 There shall be no more praise of Moab:
In Heshbon they have devised evil against it;
Come, and let us cut it off from being a nation.
Also thou shalt be cut down, O Madmen;
The sword shall pursue thee.
3 A voice of crying shall be from Horonaim, Spoiling and great destruction.
4 Moab is destroyed;
Her little ones have caused a cry to be heard.
5 For in the going up of Luhith
Continual weeping shall go up;
For in the going down of Horonaim
The enemies have heard a cry of destruction.
6 Flee, save your lives,
And be like the heath in the wilderness.
7 For because thou hast trusted in thy works and in thy treasures,
Thou shalt also be taken:
And Chemosh shall go forth into captivity
With his priests and his princes together.
8 And the spoiler shall come upon every city,
And no city shall escape:
The valley also shall perish,
And the plain shall be destroyed,
As the LORD hath spoken.
9 Give wings unto Moab,
That it may flee and get away:
For the cities thereof shall be desolate,
Without any to dwell therein.
10 Cursed be he that doeth the work of the LORD deceitfully,
And cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood.
11 Moab hath been at ease from his youth,
And he hath settled on his lees,
And hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel,
Neither hath he gone into captivity:
Therefore his taste remained in him,
And his scent is not changed.
12 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD,
That I will send unto him wanderers, that shall cause him to wander,
And shall empty his vessels, and break their bottles.
13 And Moab shall be ashamed of Chemosh,
As the house of Israel was ashamed of Beth-el their confidence.

We may observe in these verses,

First. The author of Moab's destruction. It is the Lord of hosts, that has armies, all armies at his command, and the God of Israel, ver. 1, who will herein plead the cause of his Israel against a people that has always been vexatious to them, and will punish them now for the injuries done to Israel of old, though Israel was forbidden to meddle with them, Deu. ii. 9; therefore the destruction of Moab is called the work of the Lord, ver. 10, for it is he that pleads for Israel, and his work will exactly agree with his word, ver. 8.

Secondly. The instruments of it. Spoilers shall come, ver. 8, shall come with a sword, a sword that shall pursue them, ver. 2; "I will send unto him wanderers," (ver. 12,) such as come from afar, as if they were vagrants, or had missed their way, but they shall "cause him to wander." They seem as wanderers themselves, but they shall make the Moabites to be really wanderers, some to flee, and others to be carried into captivity. These destroyers stir up themselves to do execution; they have devised evil against Heshbon, one of the principal cities of Moab, and they aim at no less than the ruin of the kingdom; "Come, and let us cut it off from being a nation," ver. 2. Nothing less will serve the turn of the invaders; they come not to plunder it, but to ruin it. The prophet in God's name engageth them to make thorough work of it; ver. 10, "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord deceitfully." This bloody work, this destroying work, though it goes against the grain with men of compassion, yet it is the work of the Lord, and must not be done by the halves. The Chaldeans have it in charge, by a secret instinct, (saith Mr. Gataker,) to destroy the Moabites, and therefore they must not spare, must not out of foolish pity keep back their sword from blood. They would thereby bring a sword, and a curse with it, upon themselves, as Saul did by sparing the Amalekites, and Ahab by letting Benhadad go. Thy life shall go for his life. To this work is applied that general rule, given to all that are employed in any service for God; "Cursed be he that doeth the work of the Lord deceitfully," or negligently, that pretends to do it, but doth it not to purpose; makes a show of serving God's glory, but is really serving his own ends, and carries on the work of the Lord no farther than will suit his own purposes; or that is slothful in business for it is called Diospolis, which means the city of Jupiter, that is, of Amon.

xlvi. 26. After about forty years from the time of its subjection by Nebuchadnezzar, Egypt threw off the yoke of Babylon, and asserted its freedom.

xlvii. 1. The Philistines, from whom the whole land came to be called Palestine, inhabited the coast region to the south of the Phœnicians. The exploit of Pharaoh here mentioned is nowhere else recorded, but it was probably connected with the events referred to in the note on chap. xlvi. 2. The Pharaoh mentioned may, therefore, have been Pharaoh-Necho.

xlvii. 2, 3. The "waters" in the first of these verses, and the army implied by the second, are the Babylonian invaders.

xlvii. 4, 5. The Philistines were the auxiliaries of Tyre and Sidon, and their overthrow would weaken those famous cities. By Caphtor Crete is now generally understood, though the ancients mostly

God, and takes neither care nor pains to do it as it should be done, Mal. i. 14. Let not such deceive themselves, for God will not thus be mocked.

Thirdly. The woful instances and effects of this destruction. The cities shall be laid in ruins, they shall be spoiled, ver. 1, and cut down, ver. 2; they shall be desolate, ver. 9, "without any to dwell therein." There shall be no houses to dwell in, or no people to dwell in them, or no safety and ease to those that would dwell in them. Every city shall be spoiled, and no city escape. The strongest city shall not be able to secure itself against the enemies' power, nor shall the finest city be able to recommend itself to the enemies' pity and favour. The country also shall be wasted, the valley shall perish, and the plain be destroyed, ver. 8. The corn and the flocks that used to cover the plains, and make the valleys rejoice, shall all be destroyed, eaten up, trodden down, or carried off. The most sacred persons shall not escape; the priests and people shall go together into captivity. Nay, Chemosh, the god they worship, who they expect should protect them, shall share with them in the ruin, his temple shall be laid in ashes, and his image carried away with the rest of the spoil. Now the consequence of all this will be, 1. Great shame and confusion. Kiriathaim is confounded, and Misgab is so. They shall be ashamed of the mighty boasts they have sometimes made of their cities. There shall be no more vaunting in Moab concerning Heshbon, so it might be read, ver. 2; they shall no more brag of the strength of that city, when the evil which is designed against it is brought upon it. Nor shall they any more boast of their gods, ver. 13, they shall be ashamed of Chemosh, ashamed of all the prayers they made, and all the confidence they put in the dunghill deity; as Israel was ashamed of Bethel, of the golden calf they had at Bethel, which they confided in as their protector, but were deceived in, for it was not able to save them from the Assyrians: nor shall Chemosh be able to save the Moabites from the Chaldeans. Note, Those that will not be convinced and made ashamed of the folly of their idolatry by the word of God, shall be convinced and made ashamed of it by the judgments of God, when they shall find by woful experience the utter inability of the gods they have served to do them any service. 2. There will be great sorrow. There is a "voice of crying" heard, ver. 3, and the cry of nothing but "spoiling and great destruction." Alas! alas! "Moab is destroyed," ver. 4. The great ones having quitted the cities to shift for their own safety, even the "little ones have caused a cry to be heard," the meaner sort of people, or the little children, the innocent, harmless ones, whose cries at such a time are the most piteous. Go up to the hills, go down to the valleys, and you meet with continual weeping, weeping with weeping, all are in tears, you light on none with dry eyes. Even the enemies have heard the cry, from whom it had been policy to conceal it, for they will be animated and encouraged by it; but it is so great it cannot be hid. 3. There will be great hurry. They will cry to one another, Away, away, "flee, save your lives," ver. 6, shift for your own safety, with all imaginable speed, though you escape as bare and naked as the heath, or grig, or dry shrub in the wilderness; think not of carrying away any thing you have, for it may cost you your life to attempt it, Mat. xxiv. 16—18. Take shelter, though it be in a barren wilderness, that you may have your lives for a prey. The danger will come suddenly and swiftly, and therefore "give wings unto Moab," ver. 9, that would be the greatest kindness you could do them; that is that they will call for; O that we had wings like a dove! For unless they had wings, and could fly, there will be no escaping.

Fourthly. The sins for which God will now reckon with Moab, and which justify God in these severe proceedings against them. 1. It is because they have been secure, and have trusted to their wealth and strength, in their works, and in their treasures, ver. 7. They had taken a great deal of pains to fortify their cities, and make large works about them, and to fill their exchequer, and private coffers; so that they thought themselves in as good a posture for war as any people could be, and that none durst invade them, and therefore set danger at defiance; they trusted in the abundance of their riches, and strengthened themselves in their wickedness, Ps. lii. 7. Now for this reason, that they may have a sensible conviction of the vanity and folly of their carnal confidences, God will send an enemy that shall master their works, and rifle their treasures. Note, We forfeit the comfort of that creature which we repose that confidence in that should be reposed in God only. The reed will break that is leaned upon. 2. It is because they have not made a right improvement of the days of their peace and prosperity, ver. 11. 1st. They had been long undisturbed; "Moab hath been at ease from his youth." It was an ancient kingdom before Israel was, and had enjoyed great tranquillity, though a small country, and surrounded with potent neighbours. God's Israel was afflicted from their youth, Ps. cxxix. 1, 2; but Moab at ease from his youth. He "hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel," has not known any troublesome, weakening changes, but is as wine kept on the lees, and not racked or drawn off, by which it retains its strength and body. He has not been unsettled, nor any way made uneasy; he has not gone into captivity, as Israel hath often done, and yet Moab is a wicked, idolatrous nation, and one of the confederates against God's hidden ones, Ps. lxxxiii. 6. Note, There are many that persist in unrepented of iniquity, and yet enjoy uninterrupted prosperity. 2nd. They had been as long corrupt and unreformed. "He hath settled on his lees," he hath been secure and sensual in his prosperity, hath rested in it, and fetched all the strength and life of the soul from it, as the wine from the lees; "his taste remained in him, and his scent is not changed." He is still the same, as bad as ever he was. Note, While bad people are as happy as they used to be in the world, it is no marvel if they are as bad as they used to be. They have no changes of their peace and prosperity, therefore fear not God; their hearts and lives are unchanged, Ps. lv. 19.

14 How say ye, We are mighty
And strong men for the war?
15 Moab is spoiled, and gone up out of her cities,
And his chosen young men are gone down to the slaughter,
Saith the King, whose name is the LORD of hosts.
16 The calamity of Moab is near to come,
And his affliction hasteth fast.
17 All ye that are about him, bemoan him;
And all ye that know his name, say,
How is the strong staff broken,
And the beautiful rod!
18 Thou daughter that dost inhabit Dibon,
Come down from thy glory, and sit in thirst;
For the spoiler of Moab shall come upon thee,
And he shall destroy thy strong holds
19 O inhabitant of Aroer,
Stand by the way, and espy;
Ask him that fleeth, and her that escapeth,
And say, What is done?
20 Moab is confounded; for it is broken down:
Howl and cry;
Tell ye it in Arnon, that Moab is spoiled,
21 And judgment is come upon the plain country;
Upon Holon, and upon Jahazah, and upon Mephaath,
22 And upon Dibon, and upon Nebo, and upon Beth-diblathaim, [Beth-meon,
23 And upon Kiriathaim, and upon Beth-gamul, and upon 24 And upon Kerioth, and upon Bozrah,
And upon all the cities of the land of Moab, far or near 25 The horn of Moab is cut off,
And his arm is broken, saith the LORD
26 Make ye him drunken:
For he magnified himself against the LORD:
Moab also shall wallow in his vomit,
And he also shall be in derision.
27 For was not Israel a derision unto thee?
Was he found among thieves?
For since thou spakest of him, thou skippedst for joy.
28 O ye that dwell in Moab,
Leave the cities, and dwell in the rock,
And be like the dove
That maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth.
29 We have heard the pride of Moab, (he is exceeding proud)
His loftiness, and his arrogancy,
And his pride, and the haughtiness of his heart
30 I know his wrath, saith the LORD;
But it shall not be so;
His lies shall not so effect it.
31 Therefore will I howl for Moab,
And I will cry out for all Moab;
Mine heart shall mourn for the men of Kir-heres.
32 O vine of Sibmah,
I will weep for thee with the weeping of Jazer:
Thy plants are gone over the sea,
They reach even to the sea of Jazer:
[thy vintage
The spoiler is fallen upon thy summer fruits and upon 33 And joy and gladness is taken
From the plentiful field, and from the land of Moab;
And I have caused wine to fail from the winepresses:
None shall tread with shouting;
Their shouting shall be no shouting.
34 From the cry of Heshbon even unto Elealeh,
And even unto Jahaz, have they uttered their voice,
From Zoar even unto Horonaim,
As an heifer of three years old:
For the waters also of Nimrim shall be desolate.
35 Moreover I will cause to cease in Moab, saith the LORD,
Him that offereth in the high places,
And him that burneth incense to his gods.
36 Therefore mine heart shall sound for Moab like pipes,
And mine heart shall sound like pipes for the men of Kir-heres:
Because the riches that he hath gotten are perished.
37 For every head shall be bald,
And every beard clipped:
Upon all the hands shall be cuttings,
And upon the loins sackcloth.
[tops of Moab,
38 There shall be lamentation generally upon all the house-
And in the streets thereof:

supposed Cappadocia was meant. Gaza and Ashkelon were chief cities of the Philistines.

xlviii. 1—9. The Moabites are said by Josephus to have been subdued by Nebuchadnezzar when he marched into Egypt. The cities mentioned in these verses were in Moab, and the positions of several of them are now well known. The word rendered "heath" in verse 6 denotes some kind of shrub, most likely a juniper. Chemosh was the national deity of the Moabites.

xlviii. 11—13. Moab had from the beginning been comparatively undisturbed, and therefore continued strong, like wine which had remained upon its lees, and not rendered insipid by frequent removal from one vessel to another. This was not to be much longer. Moab would be scattered, his cities depopulated, and his strongholds broken down; his very god Chemosh would no more be able to protect him than the golden calf of Jeroboam had been to defend Israel.

For I have broken Moab
Like a vessel wherein is no pleasure, saith the LORD.
39 They shall howl, saying, How is it broken down!
How hath Moab turned the back with shame!
So shall Moab be a derision
And a dismaying to all them about him.
40 For thus saith the LORD;
Behold, he shall fly as an eagle,
And shall spread his wings over Moab.
41 Kerioth is taken, and the strong holds are surprised,
And the mighty men's hearts in Moab at that day shall be
As the heart of a woman in her pangs.
42 And Moab shall be destroyed from being a people,
Because he hath magnified himself against the LORD.
43 Fear, and the pit, and the snare, shall be upon thee,
O inhabitant of Moab, saith the LORD
44 He that fleeth from the fear shall fall into the pit;
And he that getteth up out of the pit shall be taken in
For I will bring upon it, even upon Moab, [the snare:
The year of their visitation, saith the LORD.
45 They that fled
Stood under the shadow of Heshbon because of the force:
But a fire shall come forth out of Heshbon,
And a flame from the midst of Sihon,
And shall devour the corner of Moab,
And the crown of the head of the tumultuous ones.
46 Woe be unto thee, O Moab!
The people of Chemosh perisheth:
For thy sons are taken captives,
And thy daughters captives
47 Yet will I bring again the captivity of Moab
In the latter days, saith the LORD
Thus far is the judgment of Moab.

The destruction is here farther prophesied of very largely, and with a great copiousness and variety of expression; and very pathetically and in moving language, designed not only to awaken them by a national repentance and reformation to prevent the trouble, or by a personal repentance and reformation to prepare for it, but to affect us with the calamitous state of human life, which is liable to such lamentable occurrences; and with the power of God's anger, and the terror of his judgments, when he comes forth to contend with a provoking people. In reading this long roll of threatenings, and meditating the terror of them, it will be of more use to us to keep this in our eye, and to get our hearts thereby possessed with a holy awe of God, and of his wrath, than to inquire critically into all the lively figures and metaphors here used.

First. It is a surprising destruction, and very sudden that is here threatened. They were very secure, thought themselves strong for war, and able to deal with the most powerful enemy, ver. 14; and yet the calamity is near, and he is not able to keep it off, nor so much as to keep the enemy long in parley, for the affliction hastens fast, ver. 16, and will soon come to a crisis. The enemy shall fly as an eagle, so swiftly, so strongly shall he come, ver. 40, as an eagle flies upon his prey; and he shall spread his wings, the wings of his army, over Moab; he shall surround it that none may escape. The strongholds of Moab are taken by surprise, ver. 41, so that all their strength stood them in no stead; and this made the hearts even of their mighty men to fail, for they had not time to recollect the considerations that might have animated them. It requires a more than ordinary degree of courage not to be afraid of sudden fear.

Secondly. It is an utter destruction, and such as lays Moab all in ruins. "Moab is spoiled," ver. 15; quite spoiled, is confounded and broken down, ver. 20. Their cities are laid in ashes, or seized by the enemy, so that they are forced to quit them, ver. 15. Divers cities are here named, upon which judgment is come, and the list concludes with an et cætera,—'and such like;' what need he mention more particulars, when it comes upon all the cities of Moab in general, far and near? ver. 21—24. Note, When iniquity is universal, we have reason to expect that calamity should be so too. The kingdom is deprived of its dignity and authority, "the horn of Moab is cut off;" of its strength and power, both offensive and defensive: "his arm is broken," that he can neither give a blow, nor save a blow, ver. 25. Is the youth of the kingdom the strength and beauty of it? "His chosen young men are gone down to the slaughter," ver. 15; They went down to the battle, promising themselves that they should return victorious, but God told them they went down to the slaughter; so sure are they to fall against whom God fights. In a word, "Moab shall be destroyed from being a people," ver. 42. Those that are enemies to God's people will soon be made no people.

Thirdly. It is a lamentable destruction; it will be just matter of mourning, and will turn joy into heaviness.

1. The prophet that foretells it doth himself lament it; and mourns at the very foresight of it, from a principle of compassion to his fellow-creatures, and concern for the human nature. The prophet will himself "howl for Moab," his very heart shall mourn for them, ver. 31; he will weep for the vine of Sibmah, ver. 32; his heart shall "sound like pipes" for Moab, ver. 36. Though the destruction of Moab would prove him a true prophet, yet he could not think of it without trouble. The ruin of sinners is no pleasure to God; and, therefore, should be a pain to us; even those that give warning of it should lay it to heart. These passages, and many others in this chapter, are much the same with what Isaiah had used in his prophecies against Moab, Isa. xv. and xvi.; for though there was a long distance of time between that prophecy and this, yet they were both dictated by one and the same Spirit; and it becomes God's prophets to speak the language of those that went before them. It is no plagiarism sometimes to make use of old expressions, provided it be with new affections and applications.

2. The Moabites themselves shall lament; it will be the greatest mortification and grief imaginable to them. Those that sat in glory, in the midst of wealth, and mirth, and all manner of pleasure, shall sit in thirst, in a dry and thirsty land, where no water, no comfort is, ver. 18. It is time to sit in thirst, and inure themselves to hardship, when the spoiler is come, that will strip them of all, and empty them. The Moabites in the remote corners of the country, that are farthest from the danger, will be inquisitive how the matter goes, what news from the army, will ask every one that escapeth, "What is done?" ver. 19. And when they are told that all is gone, that the invader is the conqueror, they will howl and cry in bitterness and anguish of spirit, ver. 20. They will abandon themselves to solitude to lament the desolations of their country, they will leave the cities that used to be full of mirth, and dwell in the rock, where they may have their fill of melancholy. They shall no more be singing birds, but mourning birds, like the dove, ver. 28; the doves of the valleys Eze. vii. 16. Those that give up themselves to mirth, let them know that God can soon change their note. Their sorrow shall be so very extreme, that they shall make themselves bald, and cut themselves, ver. 37; which were expressions of a desperate grief, such as tempted men to be even their own destroyers. Job indeed rent his mantle, and shaved his head, but he did not cut himself. When the flood of passion riseth never so high, wisdom and grace must set bounds to it, set banks to it, to restrain it from such barbarities. The sorrow shall be universal; ver. 38, "there shall be a general lamentation upon all the housetops of Moab," where they worshipped their idols, to whom they shall in vain bemoan themselves; and in all the streets where they conversed with one another, for they shall be free in communicating their griefs and fears, and in propagating them, for they see all lost: "I have broken Moab like a vessel wherein is no pleasure," which shall not be regarded, and cannot be pieced again. That which Moab used to rejoice in was their pleasant fruits, and the abundance of their rich wines. The delights of sense were all the matter of their joy. Take away these, destroy their gardens and vineyards, and you make all their mirth to cease, Hos. ii. 11, 12. There is great weeping when their plants are transplanted, are "gone over the sea," ver. 32; are carried into other countries to be planted there: "The spoiler is fallen upon thy summer fruits, and upon thy vintage;" and that is it that makes the cry of Heshbon to reach even to Elealeh, ver. 34. Take joy and gladness from the plentiful field, and you take it from the land of Moab, ver. 33. If the wine fail from the winepresses, that used to be trodden with acclamations of joy, all their gladness is cut off. Take away that shouting, and there shall be no shouting. Note, Those who make the delights of sense their chief joy, their exceeding joy, since those are things they may easily be deprived of in a little time, subject themselves to the tyranny of the greatest grief; whereas they that rejoice in God may do that even when the fig-tree doth not blossom, and there is no fruit in the vine. These Moabites lost not only their wine, but their water too, even "the waters of Nimrim shall be desolate," ver. 34; and, therefore, their grief grew extravagantly loud and noisy, and their lamentations were heard in all places like the lowing of a heifer of three years old. The expressions here are borrowed from Isa. xv. 5, 6.

3. All their neighbours are called to mourn with them, and to condole their ruin; ver. 17, "All ye that are about him, bemoan him." Let him have that allay to his grief, let him see himself pitied by the adjoining countries. Nay, let those at a distance, that do but know his name, and have heard of his fame, take notice of his fall, and say, "How is the strong staff broken," whose strength was the terror of its enemies; "and the beautiful rod," whose beauty was the pride of its friends. Let the nations take notice of this, and receive instruction. Let none be puffed up with, or put confidence in, their strength or beauty, for neither will be a security against the judgments of God.

Fourthly. It is a shameful destruction, and such as shall expose them to contempt. Moab is made drunk, ver. 26; and he that is made drunk is made vile. He shall wallow in his vomit, and become an odious spectacle, and shall justly be in derision. Let the Moabites be intoxicated with the cup of God's wrath, until they stagger and fall, and be brought to their wits' end, and make themselves ridiculous by the wildness not only of their passions, but of their counsels. And again, ver. 39, Moab shall be a derision, and a dismaying to all about him; they shall laugh at the fall of the pomp and power he was so proud of. Note, They that are haughty are preparing reproach and ignominy for themselves.

Fifthly. It is the destruction of that which is dear to them, not only of their summer fruits and their vintage, but of their wealth; ver. 36, "The riches that he hath gotten are perished;" though he thought he had laid them up very safe, and promised himself a long enjoyment of them, yet they are gone. Note, The money that is hoarded in the chest is as liable to perish as the summer fruits that lie exposed in the open fields. Riches are shedding things, and, like dust as they are, slip through our fingers then when we are in most care to hold them fast, and gripe them hard. Yet this is not the worst neither: even those whose religion was false and foolish, were fond of it above any thing, and such as it was, would not part with it; and, therefore, though it was really a promise, yet to them it was a threatening, (ver. 35,) that God will "cause to cease him that offereth in the high places," for the high places shall be destroyed, and the fields of offerings shall be laid waste; and the priests themselves, that burnt incense to their gods, shall be slain or carried into captivity, ver. 7. Note, It is only the true religion, and the worship and service of the true God, that will stand us in stead in a day of trouble.

Sixthly. It is a just and righteous destruction, and that which they have deserved and brought upon themselves by sin.

1. The sin which they had been most notoriously guilty of, and for which God now reckoned with them, was pride. It is mentioned six times, ver. 29. We have all heard of the pride of Moab; his neighbours took notice of it, it has testified to his face, as Israel's did; he is exceedingly proud, and grows worse and worse. Observe his loftiness, his arrogancy, his pride, his haughtiness; the multiplying of words to the same purpose intimates in how many instances he discovered his pride, and how offensive it was both to God and man. It was charged upon them, Isa. xvi. 6; but here it is expressed more largely than there. Since then they had been under humbling providences, and yet were unhumbled; nay, they grew more arrogant and haughty, which plainly marked them for that utter destruction which pride is the forerunner of. Two instances are here given of the pride of Moab: 1st. He had carried it insolently towards God. He must be brought down with shame, ver. 26; for he hath "magnified himself against the Lord;" and again, ver. 42, he shall be "destroyed from being a people," for this very reason. The Moabites preferred Chemosh before Jehovah, and thought themselves a match for the God of Israel, whom they set at defiance. 2nd. He had carried it scornfully towards Israel, particularly in their late troubles; therefore Moab shall fall into the same troubles, into the same hands, and be a derision, for Israel was a derision to him, ver. 26, 27. The generality of the Moabites, when they heard of the calamities and desolations of their neighbours the Jews, instead of lamenting them, rejoiced in them, as if xlviii. 16. It is supposed that this prophecy was fulfilled about twenty-three years after it was received by Jeremiah.

xlviii. 18—24. Here we have a second enumeration of places in Moab, including some not previously named. Dibon was well supplied with water; hence the summons to come into a condition of thirst. Several of the localities mentioned in this chapter are also mentioned in the famous Moabite inscription of King Mesha. (See 2 Kings iii. 4) xlviii. 25. The horn is a symbol of power and glory, and the arm a symbol of strength. Moab was to be altogether abased.

xlviii. 27. The Moabites, in their security, ridiculed the Israelites in their trouble, and when possible added injury to insult.

xlviii. 28. A few miles from the site of Heshbon there are numerous artificial caverns in perpendicular cliffs, some of them containing chambers, &c., to sleep in. To fastnesses like these would the Moabites resort, like the pigeons which so commonly frequent they had been thieves taken in the act of robbing. As often as they spoke of them they skipped for joy. Many in such a case entertain in their minds a secret pleasure at the fall of those they had a dislike to, who yet have so much discretion as to conceal it, it is so invidious a thing; but the Moabites industriously proclaimed their joy, and avowed the enmity they had to Israel, triumphing over every Israelite they met with in distress, and laughing at him; which was as inhuman as it was impious, and an impudent affront both to men, whose nature they were of, and to God whose name they were called by. Note, Those that deride others in distress, will justly and certainly, sooner or later, come into distress themselves, and be had in derision. Those that are glad at calamities, especially the calamities of God's church, shall not long go unpunished.

2. Besides this, they had been guilty of malice against God's people, and treachery in their dealings with them, ver. 30. They made a jest of the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem, and pretended when they laughed at them, it was but in sport, and to make themselves merry; but, saith God, "I know his wrath," I know it comes from the old enmity he hath to the seed of Abraham, and the worshippers of the true God. I know he thinks these calamities of the Jewish nation will end in their utter extirpation. He now tells the Chaldeans what ill people the Jews are, and irritates them against them; but it shall not be so as he expects, "his lies shall not so effect it." The nation, whose fall they triumph in, shall recover itself. Some read it, 'I know his rage, is it not so?' (is he not very furious against the people of God?) 'and his lies I know also, do they not do so? Do they not belie them?' Note, All the fury and all the falsehood of the church's enemies is perfectly known to God, whatever the pretences are with which they think to cover it, Isa. xxxvii. 28.

Seventhly. It is a complicated destruction, and by one instance after another will at length be completed; for those that make their escape from one judgment shall perish by another; "Fear, and the pit, and the snare shall be upon them," ver. 43. There shall be fear to drive them into the pit, and a snare to hold them fast in it when they are in it; so that they shall neither escape from the destruction nor escape out of it. What was said of sinners in general, Isa. xxiv. 17, 18, that they who flee from the fear shall fall into the pit, and they who come up out of the pit shall be taken in the snare, is here particularly foretold concerning the sinners of Moab, ver. 44; for it is the year of their visitation, when God comes to reckon with them, and will be known by the judgments which he executeth, for he is "the King whose name is the Lord of hosts," ver. 15; he is not only the King that has authority to give judgment, but he is the Lord of hosts, that is able to do what he has determined. The figurative expressions used, ver. 44, are explained in one instance, ver. 45. Those that fled out of the villages for fear of the enemy's forces, put themselves "under the shadow of Heshbon," stood there, and supposed they stood safe, as now armies sometimes retire under the cannon of a fortified city, and it is their protection; but here they should be disappointed, for when they flee out of the pit they fall into the snare. Heshbon, which they thought would have sheltered them, devours them, as Moses had foretold long since, Num. xxi. 28. "A fire is gone out of Heshbon, and a flame from the city of Sihon," and devours those that come from all the corners of Moab, and fastens upon the crown of the head of the tumultuous, noisy ones; or of the revellers, or children of noise; not meant of the rude, clamorous multitude, but of the great men that bluster, and hector, and make a noise. The judgments of God shall light on them. Shall we hear the conclusion of this whole matter? We have it, ver. 46, "Woe be unto thee, O Moab," thou art undone; the people that worship Chemosh perisheth, and is gone; farewell Moab. The sons and daughters, the hopes of the next generation, are gone into captivity after the Jews, whose calamities they rejoiced in.

Eighthly. Yet it is not a perpetual destruction. The chapter concludes with a short promise of their return out of captivity in the latter days. God, that brings them into captivity, will bring again their captivity, ver. 47. Thus tenderly does God deal with Moabites, much more with his own people; even with Moabites he will not contend for ever, nor be always wroth. When Israel returned, Moab did; and perhaps the prophecy was intended chiefly for the encouragement of God's people, to hope for that salvation which even Moabites shall share in. Yet it looks farther to gospel times, (the Jews themselves refer it to the days of the Messias,) then the captivity of the Gentiles, under the yoke of sin and Satan, shall be brought back by Divine grace, which shall make them free, free indeed. This prophecy concerning Moab is long, but here it ends; it ends comfortably, "Thus far is the judgment of Moab."

CHAPTER XLIX.

The cup of trembling still goes round, and the nations must all drink of it according to the instruction given to Jeremiah, ch. xxv. 15. This chapter puts it into the hands, I. Of the Ammonites, ver. 1—6. II. Of the Edomites, ver. 7—22. III. Of the Syrians, ver. 23—27. IV. Of the Kedarenes, and the kingdoms of Hazor, ver. 28—33. V. Of the Elamites, ver. 34—39. When Israel was scarcely saved, where shall all these appear?

CONCERNING the Ammonites, thus saith the LORD;
Hath Israel no sons?
Hath he no heir?
When then doth their king inherit Gad,
And his people dwell in his cities?
2 Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the LORD
That I will cause an alarm of war to be heard
In Rabbah of the Ammonites;
And it shall be a desolate heap,
And her daughters shall be burned with fire:
Then shall Israel be heir unto them that were his heirs,
saith the LORD.
3 Howl, O Heshbon, for Ai is spoiled:
Cry, ye daughters of Rabbah,
Gird you with sackcloth;
Lament, and run to and fro by the hedges;
For their king shall go into captivity,
And his priests and his princes together
4 Wherefore gloriest thou in the valleys,
Thy flowing valley, O backsliding daughter?
That trusted in her treasures, saying,
Who shall come unto me?
5 Behold, I will bring a fear upon thee,
Saith the Lord GOD of hosts,
From all those that be about thee;
And ye shall be driven out every man right forth;
And none shall gather up him that wandereth.
6 And afterward I will bring again the captivity
Of the children of Ammon, saith the LORD.

The Ammonites were next both in kindred and in neighbourhood to the Moabites, and therefore are next set to the bar. Their country joined to that of the two tribes and a half on the other side Jordan, and was but an ill neighbour; however, being a neighbour, they shall have a share in these circular predictions.

First. An action is here brought in God's name against the Ammonites for an illegal encroachment upon the rightful possessions of the tribe of Gad, that lay next them, ver. 1. A writ of inquiry is brought to discover what title they had to those territories which, upon the carrying away of the Gileadites by the king of Assyria, (2 Kin. xv. 29; 1 Chr. v. 26,) were left almost depeopled, at least unguarded, and an easy prey to the next invader. What! doth it escheat ob defectum sanguinis?—'for want of an heir?' "Hath Israel no sons? hath he no heir?" Are there no Gadites left to whom the right of inheritance belongs? Or if there were not, are there no Israelites, none left of Judah that is nearer akin to them than you are? Why then doth their king, as if he were entitled to the forfeited estates, or Milcom their idol, as if he had the disposal of it to his worshippers, "inherit Gad, and his people dwell in the cities" which fell by lot to that tribe of God's people? Nay, there were sons and heirs of their own body, en ventre de sa mere,—'in their mothers' wombs,' and the Ammonites, to prevent their claim, most barbarously murdered them; Am. i. 13, "They ripped up the women with child, of Gilead, that they might enlarge their border;" that having seized it, none might rise up hereafter to recover it from them. Thus they "magnified themselves against their border," and boasted it was their own, Zeph. ii. 8. Note, Though among men might often prevails against right, yet that might shall be controlled by the Almighty, who sits in the throne judging right; and those will find themselves mistaken who think every thing their own that they can lay their hands on, or which none yet appears to lay claim to. As there is justice owing to owners, so also to their heirs, when they are dead, whom it is a great sin to defraud, though they either know not their right or know not how to come at it. This shall be reckoned for particularly when injuries of this kind are done to God's people.

Secondly. Judgment is here given against them for this violence.

1. Terrors shall come upon them. God will "cause an alarm of war to be heard," even in Rabbah, their capital city, and a very strong one, ver. 2. The Lord God of hosts, that has all armies at his command, will bring a fear upon them from all that be about them, ver. 5. Note, God has many ways to terrify those that have been a terror to his people.

2. Their cities shall be laid in ruins. Rabbah, the mother city, shall be a desolate heap; and her daughters, the other cities that have a dependence upon her, and receive law from her as daughters, shall be burnt with fire; so that the inhabitants shall be forced to quit them, and they shall cry, and gird themselves with sackcloth, as having lost all they have, and not knowing whither to betake themselves.

3. Their country, which they were so proud of, shall be wasted: ver. 4, "Wherefore gloriest thou in the valleys," and trustest in thy treasures, "O backsliding daughter?" They are charged with backsliding, or turning away from God and from his worship, for they were the posterity of righteous Lot. It is true they had never been so in covenant with God as Israel was; yet all idolaters may be called backsliders, for the worship of the true God was prior to that of false gods. They were untoward and refractory, so some read it: and when they had forsaken their God they gloried in their valleys, particularly one that was called the flowing valley, because it flowed with all good things. These they had violently taken away from Israel, and gloried in it when they had done so. They gloried in the strength of their valleys, so surrounded with mountains, that they were inaccessible; gloried in the products of them, gloried in the treasures they got together out of them, saying, "Who shall come unto me?" While they bathed themselves in the pleasures of their country, they flattered themselves with a conceit that they should never be disturbed in the enjoyment of them. To-morrow shall be as this day; therefore they set God and his judgments at defiance. They are proud, voluptuous, and secure; but wherefore dost thou do so? Note, Those who backslide, and turn away from God, have little reason either to take a complacency or to put a confidence in any worldly enjoyments whatsoever, Hos. ix. 1.

4. Their people, from the least to the greatest, shall be forced out of the country. Some shall flee to seek for shelter, others shall be carried into captivity, so that their land shall be quite evacuated. Their king and his princes, nay, and Milcom their god, and his priests, shall go into captivity, ver. 3, and every man shall be driven out right forth, shall take the next way, and make the best of it in his flight, ver. 5, forgetting the valleys, the flowing valleys, which now fail them. And, to complete their misery, none shall gather up him that wandereth, none shall open their doors to them, as Jael to Sisera, to entertain them; and those that flee shall be so much in care to secure themselves, that they shall not take notice of others, no, not of those that are nearest to them, that wander, and are at a loss which way to go, as ch. xlvii. 3.

5. Then the country of the Ammonites shall fall into the hands of the remaining Israelites; ver. 2, "Then shall Israel be heir to them that were his heirs," shall possess himself of their land who had possessed themselves of his, by way of reprisal. Note, The equity of Divine providence is to be acknowledged when the losses of the injured are recompensed out of the unjust gains of the injurious. Though the enemies of God's Israel may make a prey of them for a while, the tables will shortly be turned.

Thirdly. Yet there is a prospect given them of mercy hereafter, ver. 6, as before to Moab. The day will come when the captivity of the children of Ammon will be brought again; for so it is in human affairs, the wheel goes round.

7 Concerning Edom, thus saith the LORD of hosts:
Is wisdom no more in Teman?
Is counsel perished from the prudent?

such places. Dr. Tristram, speaking of the vast numbers of rock pigeons, says, "Above all, they people the recesses of the cliffs which shut in the Arnon and the Zerka in the land of Moab, as they did in the time of Jeremiah."

xlviii. 30. Dr. Henderson renders this verse, "I know, saith Jehovah, his indignation, and the falsehood of his pretensions, the falsehood which he practises." This, although not very literal, comes nearer to the sense of the original than the authorised version does.

xlviii. 42. The fall of Moab as an independent nation is well known, and the fulness of woe predicted in this and the corresponding portions of Isaiah has long since come upon it. Repeated invasions, ending in permanent foreign occupation, and the elimination of the national element, have brought it to its actual condition, as a country half desolate, covered with ruins, and scarcely safe to traverse.

xlviii. 45. By Sihon here Heshbon, the city where Sihon ruled,

Is their wisdom vanished?
8 Flee ye, turn back, dwell deep, O inhabitants of Dedan;
For I will bring the calamity of Esau upon him,
The time that I will visit him.
9 If grapegatherers come to thee,
Would they not leave some gleaning grapes?
If thieves by night, they will destroy till they have [enough.
10 But I have made Esau bare,
I have uncovered his secret places,
And he shall not be able to hide himself:
His seed is spoiled, and his brethren, and his neighbours,
And he is not.
11 Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive;
And let thy widows trust in me.
12 For thus saith the LORD; [cup
Behold, they whose judgment was not to drink of the
Have assuredly drunken;
And art thou he that shall altogether go unpunished?
Thou shalt not go unpunished,
But thou shalt surely drink of it.
13 For I have sworn by myself, saith the LORD.
That Bozrah shall become a desolation,

BOZRAH.

A reproach, a waste, and a curse;
And all the cities thereof shall be perpetual wastes.
14 I have heard a rumour from the LORD,
And an ambassador is sent unto the heathen, saying,
Gather ye together, and come against her,
And rise up to the battle.
15 For, lo, I will make thee small among the heathen,
And despised among men.
16 Thy terribleness hath deceived thee,
And the pride of thine heart, O thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock,
That holdest the height of the hill: [eagle,
Though thou shouldest make thy nest as high as the
I will bring thee down from thence, saith the LORD.
17 Also Edom shall be a desolation:
Every one that goeth by it shall be astonished,
And shall hiss at all the plagues thereof.
18 As in the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah
And the neighbour cities thereof, saith the LORD,
No man shall abide there,
Neither shall a son of man dwell in it
19 Behold, he shall come up
Like a lion from the swelling of Jordan
Against the habitation of the strong:
But I will suddenly make him run away from her:
And who is a chosen man, that I may appoint over her?
For who is like me? and who will appoint me the time?
And who is that shepherd that will stand before me?
20 Therefore hear the counsel of the LORD,
That he hath taken against Edom;
And his purposes, that he hath purposed against the inhabitants of Teman:
Surely the least of the flock shall draw them out:
Surely he shall make their habitations desolate with them.
21 The earth is moved at the noise of their fall,
At the cry the noise thereof was heard in the Red sea.
22 Behold, he shall come up and fly as the eagle,
And spread his wings over Bozrah: [Edom be
And at that day shall the heart of the mighty men of
As the heart of a woman in her pangs.

The Edomites come next to receive their doom from God by the mouth of Jeremiah. They also were old enemies to the Israel of God, but their day will come to be reckoned with, and it is now at hand; and is foretold, not only for warning to them, but for comfort to the Israel of God, whose afflictions were very much aggravated by their triumphs over them, and joy in their calamity, Ps. cxxxvii. 7. Many of the expressions used in this prophecy concerning Edom are borrowed from the prophecy of Obadiah, which is concerning Edom; for, all the prophets being inspired by one and the same Spirit, there must needs be a wonderful harmony and agreement in their predictions. Now here it is foretold,

First. That the country of Edom shall be wasted and made desolate; that the calamity of Esau should be brought upon him, the calamity he has deserved, and God has long designed him, for his old sins, ver. 8. The time is at hand when God will visit him, and call him to an account; and then they shall flee from the sword, turn back from the battle, and dwell deep in some close caverns where they shall hide themselves. All they have shall be carried off by the conqueror. Whereas grape-gatherers will leave some gleanings, and even thieves know when they have enough, and will destroy no farther, they that destroy them shall never be satiated; ver. 9, 10, they shall make Esau quite bare, shall strip the Edomites of all they have, shall find out ways and means to come at their most hidden treasure, shall discover even the secret places where they thought to secure their wealth, and rifle them; so that they shall none of them save their wealth, no, nor save themselves or their children, that might be concealed in a little room; "He shall not be able to hide himself," and his seed, too, is spoiled. His brethren the Moabites, and his neighbours the Philistines, whom he might have expected succours from, or at least shelter with, are spoiled as well as he, and disabled to do him any service. And he is not, or, there is not he, there is none to him, none left him that may say what follows, ver. 11, "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive." When they are flying or dying, there shall be none left; no relation, no friend, no, not so much as any parish officers, to take care of their wives and children that they leave behind. Edom is not, he is cut off and gone; nor is there any to say, Leave me thine orphans. If the master of a family be cut off, or forced away, it is some comfort if he have a friend to leave his family with whom he can confide in; but they shall have none such, for they shall all be involved in the same calamity. The Chaldee makes these to be the words of God to his people, distinguishing them from the Edomites in this calamity; and they read it, 'But you, O house of Israel, you shall not leave your orphans; I will secure them, and let your widows rest on my word;' whatever becomes of the widows and fatherless of the Edomites, I will take care of yours. Note, It is unspeakable comfort to the people of God when they are dying, that they may leave their surviving relations with God, may in faith commit them to him, and encourage them to trust in him; and, though they cannot promise themselves great things in the world for them, yet they may hope that he will preserve them alive, always provided that they trust in him. Let the Edomites, for their part, count upon no other but to be made a desolation and a reproach, for the decree is gone forth, God hath sworn it by himself, ver. 13, that their city shall be wasted; nay, they shall be perpetual wastes, they shall be made mean and despicable. They had made a mighty figure, but God will make them "small among the heathen;" and they that despised God's people shall themselves be "despised among men," ver. 15; Obad. 2. Nay, they shall be made monstrous, and even a prodigy, ver. 17; Edom shall be such a desolation, that every one that goes by shall be astonished; nay, worse yet, they shall be made a terror. Edom shall be made like Sodom and Gomorrah, none shall care for coming near the ruins of it; "no man shall abide there," ver. 18, such a frightful place shall it be made.

Secondly. That the instruments of this destruction should be very resolute and formidable. They have their commission from God, he summons them into this service; ver. 14, "I have heard a rumour," or report from the Lord, heard it by the prophecy of Obadiah, heard it by a whisper to myself, that an ambassador, or herald, or messenger, is sent to the Gentiles, that are to lay Edom waste, saying, "Gather ye together," muster all the forces ye can, and come against her; for, ver. 20, this is the counsel that he hath taken against Edom. The matter is settled, the decree is gone forth, and there is no resisting it. God has determined that Edom shall be laid waste, and then he that is to be employed in it shall come swiftly and strongly. Nebuchadnezzar is he of whom it is here foretold, 1. That he shall "come up like a lion," with fierceness and fury; like a lion enraged by the swelling of Jordan overflowing his banks, which force him out of his covert by the water side into the higher grounds ver. 19. He shall come roaring, come to devour all that come in his way; he shall come "against the habitation of the strong," the forts and castles; and I will cause him to come suddenly into the land, (so the next words might well be read,) so as to find them unprovided with necessaries for a defence: for I will look out a chosen man to appoint over her, to do this execution, a man fit for the purpose, one chosen out of the people; for when God has work to do he will find out the fittest instruments to be employed in it. And in this who is like me for choosing the instruments, and spiriting them for the work? and "who will appoint me the time?" that is, who will challenge me, and fix a time and place to meet? who will join issue with me in battle? And when I send a lion into the flock, "who is that shepherd," that can dare stand before me, or against me, to oppose that lion, and think to rescue any of the flock? Note, When God has work of any kind, he will soon find those that are able to engage in it; and all the world cannot find those that are able to engage against it. Nay, if God will have Edom destroyed, and their people dislodged, there needs not a lion, a fierce lion to do it, even "the least of the flock shall draw them out.

must be understood. The corner of the beard is meant by "corner," and signifies the extremities of the land. The crown of the head, in similar manner, signifies the more elevated portions of it.

xlviii. 46, 47. "The people of Chemosh" are the Moabites, who worshipped Chemosh. The period intended by the last verse is uncertain.

xlix. 1. The Ammonites lived on the east of the Jordan, to the north of Moab. The tribe of Gad was subject to Ammonite incursions, and is represented by the prophet as occupied by their king. It is very probable that Moloch, the Ammonite god, is meant by their king.

xlix. 2. Rabbah was the metropolis of Ammon, but it has long been "a desolate heap," and the whole country round is almost uninhabited.

xlix. 3. Ai was another Ammonite city. The "daughters of Rabbah" are most likely the villages and towns dependent upon it ver. 20: the meanest servant in Nebuchadnezzar's retinue, the weakest of all that follow his camp, shall draw them out for the slaughter, shall force them to flee or to surrender, and "make their habitations desolate with them." God can bring to pass the greatest works by instruments least likely. When the Chaldean army comes against the Edomites, all hands shall be employed, and the poorest soldier in it shall have a pluck at them. 2. Nebuchadnezzar shall come, not only like a lion, the king of beasts, but like an eagle, the king of birds; ver. 22, He shall fly as the eagle upon his prey, so swiftly, so strongly; shall clap his wings upon Bozrah, to secure it for himself, as before, ch. xlviii. 40; and immediately the hearts of the mighty men shall fail them, for they shall see he is an enemy that it is in vain to struggle with.

Thirdly. That the Edomites' confidences should all fail them in the day of their distress. 1. They trusted to their wisdom, but that shall stand them in no stead; this is the first thing fastened upon in this prophecy against Edom, ver. 7. That nation used to be famous for wisdom, and their statesmen were thought to excel in politics, and yet now they shall take such wrong measures in all their counsels, and be so baffled in all their designs that people shall ask with wonder, What is the matter with the Edomites? "Is wisdom no more in Teman?" Are the wise men of the east country, 1 Kin. iv. 30, become fools? Are those at their wits' end that were thought to have the monopoly of prudence? Is counsel perished from the understanding of men? It is so, when God is designing the ruin of a people; for whom he will destroy he infatuates: see Job xii. 20, "Is their wisdom vanished?" Is it tired? so some; is it worn out? so others; is it become useless? so others. Yes, it will do them no service, when God comes forth to contend with them. 2. They trusted to their strength, but neither shall that avail them, ver. 16. They had been a terror to all their neighbours, every body feared them and truckled to them, and this made them proud and conceited of themselves and their own strength, and very secure; because no neighbour nation durst meddle with them, they thought no nation in the world durst. Their country was much of it mountainous, having many passes which they thought themselves able to make good against any invader; but this terribleness of theirs deceived them, and so did their imaginary inaccessibleness; they did not prove so strong as they were formidable, nor so safe as they were secure. As high as they are God will bring them down; for as there is no wisdom, so there is no might against the Lord: see these expressions, Obad. 3, 4, 8.

Fourthly. That their destruction should be inevitable, and very remarkable. 1. God hath determined it, ver. 12; he hath said it; nay, ver. 13, he hath sworn it, that the Edomites shall not go unpunished, but they shall drink the cup of trembling, which is put into the hands of all their neighbours. Even they whose judgment or doom was not to drink of the cup, that is, that had not so well deserved it as they had done, nations that had not been such enemies to Israel as they had been,—or, Israel itself, that was God's peculiar people, and among whom there were many, very many, that kept his ordinances, upon which account they might have expected an exemption,—and yet they had been made to drink of the bitter cup; and shall the Edomites think to pass it? No, they shall surely drink of it. Note, When God punisheth the less guilty, it is folly for the more guilty to promise themselves impunity; and when judgment begins at God's house, it will reach the strangers. 2. All the world shall take notice of it; ver. 21, "The earth is moved," and all the nations put into a concern, "at the noise of their fall;" the news of it shall make them tremble. The noise of the outcry is heard to the Red sea, which flowed upon the coasts of Edom; so loud shall be the shouts of the conquerors and the shrieks of the conquered, and such a mighty noise shall the news of this destruction of Idumea make in the nations, that it shall be heard among the ships that lie in the Red sea, to take in lading, 1 Kin. ix. 26, and they shall carry the news of it to the remotest shores. Note, Those that have affected to make a noise with their pomp and power, their fall, when it comes, will make so much the greater noise.

23 Concerning Damascus.
Hamath is confounded, and Arpad:
For they have heard evil tidings:
They are fainthearted:
There is sorrow on the sea;
It cannot be quiet.
24 Damascus is waxed feeble,
And turneth herself to flee,
And fear hath seized on her:
Anguish and sorrows have taken her,
As a woman in travail.
25 How is the city of praise not left,
The city of my joy!
26 Therefore her young men shall fall in her streets,
And all the men of war shall be cut off in that day,
Saith the LORD of hosts.
27 And I will kindle a fire in the wall of Damascus,
And it shall consume the palaces of Ben-hadad.

ANCIENT WALL AND GATE OF DAMASCUS.

The kingdom of Syria lay north of Canaan, as that of Edom lay south, and thither we must now remove, and take a view of the approaching fate of that kingdom, which had been often vexatious to the Israel of God. Damascus was the metropolis of that kingdom, and the ruin of the whole is supposed in the ruin of that; yet Hamath and Arpad, two other considerable cities, are named, ver. 23. And the palaces of Benhadad, which he built, are particularly marked for ruin, ver. 27, as also Am. i. 9. Some think Benhadad, the son of Hadad, either their idol, or one of their ancient kings whence the rest descended, was a common name of the kings of Syria, as Pharaoh of the kings of Egypt. Now observe concerning the judgment of Damascus,

First. It begins with a terrible fright and faintheartedness. They hear evil tidings, that the king of Babylon, with all his force, is coming against them, and they are confounded, they know not what measures to take for their own safety, their souls are melted, they are fainthearted, they have no spirit left them, they are like the troubled sea, that cannot be quiet, Isa. lvii. 20, or like men in a storm at sea, Ps. cvii. 26; or the sorrow that begins in the city shall go to the sea coast, ver. 23. See how easily God can dispirit those nations that have been most celebrated for valour; Damascus now waxeth feeble, ver. 24. A city that thought she could have looked the most formidable enemy in the face, now turns herself to flee, and owns it is to no more purpose to think of contending with her fate than for a woman in labour to contend with her pains, which she cannot escape, but must yield to. It was a "city of praise," ver. 25; not praise to God, but to herself, a city much commended and admired by all strangers that visited it. It was a city of joy, where there was an affluence and confluence of all the delights of the sons of men, and abundance of mirth in the enjoyment of them. We read it, though it needs not, "the city of my joy," which the prophet himself had sometimes visited with pleasure; or, it may be the speech of the king, lamenting the ruin of the city of his joy. But now it is all overwhelmed with fear and grief. Note, Those deceive themselves who place their happiness in carnal joys; for God, in his providence, can soon cast a damp upon them and put an end to them. He can soon make a city of praise to be a reproach, and a city of joy to be a terror to itself.

Secondly. It ends with a terrible fall and fire. 1. The inhabitants are slain, ver. 26. The young men, that should fight the enemy and defend the city, shall fall by the sword in the street; and all the men of war, mighty men, expert in war, and engaged in the service of their country, shall be cut off. 2. The city is laid in ashes, ver. 27. The fire is kindled by the besiegers in the wall, but it shall devour all before it, the palaces of Benhadad particularly, where so much mischief had formerly been hatched against God's Israel, for which it is now thus visited.

28 Concerning Kedar, and concerning the kingdoms of Hazor, which Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon shall smite, thus saith the LORD;
Arise ye, go up to Kedar,
And spoil the men of the east.
29 Their tents and their flocks shall they take away:
They shall take to themselves their curtains,
And all their vessels, and their camels;
And they shall cry unto them, Fear is on every side
30 Flee, get you far off,
Dwell deep, O ye inhabitants of Hazor, saith the LORD;
For Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon hath taken counsel against you,
And hath conceived a purpose against you.
31 Arise, get you up unto the wealthy nation,
That dwelleth without care, saith the LORD,
Which have neither gates nor bars,
Which dwell alone.
32 And their camels shall be a booty,
And the multitude of their cattle a spoil:
And I will scatter into all winds them that are in the utmost corners;
And I will bring their calamity
From all sides thereof, saith the LORD.
33 And Hazor shall be a dwelling for dragons,
And a desolation for ever: [dwell in it.
There shall no man abide there, nor any son of man

These verses foretell the desolation that Nebuchadnezzar and his forces should make among the people of Kedar, (who descended from Kedar the son of Ishmael, and inhabited a part of Arabia the Stony,) and of the kingdoms, the petty principalities of Hazor, that joined to them, who perhaps were originally Canaanites of the kingdom of Hazor, in the north of Canaan, which had Jabin for its king, but, being driven thence, settled in the deserts of Arabia, and associated themselves with the Kedarenes. Concerning this people we may here observe, xlix. 6. The Ammonites are supposed to have returned with the Moabites and Israelites, in accordance with the decree of Cyrus.

xlix. 7, 8. As in the prediction concerning Moab Jeremiah repeated much that Isaiah had said, so here he repeats what Obadiah had prophesied. Teman was a province and city of Edom, and its reputation in ancient times was for its philosophy and general enlightenment. Dedan was not actually in Edom, but a neighbouring tribe of Arab descent.

xlix. 10. As is well known, Esau and Edom were names for the same person, and they are interchanged sometimes when the country is meant.

xlix. 11. If the orphans and widows of Dedan are not intended here, we must understand those of Edom who escaped destruction.

xlix. 13. Several cities bore the name of Bozrah. The one here meant was in Edom, and its position was discovered by Burckhardt.

xlix. 16. Edom, or Idumæa, is a mountainous and rocky region,

First. What was their present state and posture. They dwelt in tents, and had no walls but curtains, ver. 29, no fortified cities; they had "neither gates nor bars," ver. 31; they were shepherds, and had no treasures but stock upon land, no money but flocks and camels; they had no soldiers among them, for they were in no fear of invaders; no merchants, for they dwelt alone, ver. 31. Those of other nations neither came among them nor traded with them, but they lived within themselves, content with the products and pleasures of their own country. This was their manner of living, very different from that of the nations that were round about them. And, 1. They were very rich; though they had no trade, no treasures, yet they are here said to be a wealthy nation, ver. 31, because they had a sufficiency to answer all the occasions of human life, and they were content with it. Note, Those are truly rich that have enough to supply their necessities, and know when they have enough. We need not go to the treasures of kings and provinces, or the cash of merchants, to look for wealthy people; they may be found among shepherds that dwell in tents. 2. They were very easy; they dwelt without care, their wealth was such as nobody envied them, or, if any did, they might come peaceably and enjoy the like, and therefore they fear nobody. Note, Those that live innocently and honestly may live very securely, though they have neither gates nor bars.

Secondly. The design of the king of Babylon against them, and the descent he made upon them; "He hath taken counsel against you, and hath conceived a purpose against you," ver. 30. That proud man resolves it shall never be said that he who had conquered so many strong cities will leave those unconquered that dwell in tents. It was strange that eagle would stoop to catch these flies; that so great a prince should play at such small game; but all is fish that comes to the ambitious, covetous man's net. Note, It will not always secure men from suffering wrong to be able to say they have done no wrong; not to have given offence will not be a defence against such men as Nebuchadnezzar. Yet, how unrighteous soever he was in doing it, God was righteous in directing it. These people have lived inoffensively among their neighbours, as many do, who yet like them are guilty before God; and it was to punish them for their offences against him that God said, ver. 28, "Arise ye, go up to Kedar, and spoil the men of the east." They will do it to gratify their own covetousness and ambition, but God orders it for the correcting of an unthankful people, and for warning to a careless world to expect trouble when they seem to be most safe. God saith to the Chaldeans, ver. 31, "Arise, get you up unto the wealthy nation that dwell without care;" go, and give them an alarm, that none may imagine their mountain stands so strong that it cannot be moved.

Thirdly. The great amazement that this put them into, and the great desolation hereby made among them; "They shall cry unto them," that is, those on the borders shall send the alarm into all parts of the country, which shall be put into the utmost confusion by it; they shall cry, "Fear is on every side," we are surrounded by the enemy, the very terror of which shall drive them all to their feet, and they shall none of them have any heart to make resistance. The enemy shall proclaim fear upon them or against them on every side; they need not strike a stroke, they shall shout them out of their tents, ver. 29. Upon the first alarm they shall flee, get far off, and dwell deep, ver. 30, as the Edomites, ver. 8. And it will be found that this fear on every side is not groundless, for their calamity shall be brought from all sides thereof, ver. 32. No marvel there are fears on every side, when there are foes on every side. The issue will be, 1. What they have will be a prey to the Chaldeans. They shall take to themselves their curtains and vessels; though they are but plain and coarse, and they have better of their own, yet they shall take them for spite and spoil, for spoiling sake; they shall carry away their tents and their flocks, ver. 29. Their camels shall be a booty to those that came for nothing else, ver. 32. 2. It is not said that any of them shall be slain, for they attempt not to make any resistance, and their tents and flocks are accepted as a ransom of their lives; but they shall be dislodged and dispersed, though now they dwell in the utmost corners, out of the way, and therefore they think out of the reach of danger. By this character those people were distinguished, ch. ix. 26, xxv. 23; yet they shall from thence be scattered into all winds, into all parts of the world. Note, Privacy and obscurity are not always a protection and security. Many that affect to be strangers to the world may yet, by unthought of providences, be forced into it; and those that live most retired may have the same lot with those that thrust themselves forth and lie most exposed. 3. Their country shall lie uninhabited; for, lying remote and out of all high roads, and having neither cities nor lands inviting to strangers, none shall care to succeed them, so that Hazor shall be "a desolation for ever," ver. 33. If busy men be displaced, many strive to get into their places, because they lived great; but here are easy, quiet men displaced, and no man cares to abide where they did, because they lived mean.

34 The word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah the prophet against Elam in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah, saying,

35 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
Behold, I will break the bow of Elam,
The chief of their might.

36 And upon Elam will I bring the four winds
From the four quarters of heaven,
And will scatter them toward all those winds;
And there shall be no nation
Whither the outcasts of Elam shall not come.

37 For I will cause Elam to be dismayed before their enemies,
And before them that seek their life:
And I will bring evil upon them,
Even my fierce anger, saith the LORD;
And I will send the sword after them,
Till I have consumed them:

38 And I will set my throne in Elam,
And will destroy from thence
The king and the princes, saith the LORD

39 But it shall come to pass in the latter days, [LORD.
That I will bring again the captivity of Elam, saith the

This prophecy is dated in the beginning of Zedekiah's reign; it is probable the other prophecies against the Gentiles going before, were at the same time. The Elamites were the Persians, descended from Elam the son of Shem, Gen. x. 22; yet some think it was only that part of Persia which lay nearest to the Jews, which was called Elymais, and adjoined to Media-Elam, had acted against God's Israel, bare the quiver in an expedition against them, Isa. xxii. 6, and therefore must be reckoned with among the rest. It is here foretold in general that God will "bring evil upon them" even his fierce anger, and that is evil enough, it has all evil in it, ver. 37. In particular,

First. Their forces shall be disabled, and rendered incapable to do them any service. The Elamites were famous archers, but, "Behold, I will break the bow of Elam," ver. 35, will ruin their artillery, and then the chief of their might is gone. God often orders it so that that which we most trust to first fails us, and that which was the chief of our might proves the least of our help.

Secondly. Their people shall be dispersed. There shall come enemies against them from all parts of the world, and they shall all carry some of them away captives into their respective countries, while others shall flee, some one way and some another, to shift for themselves, so that "There shall be no nation whither the outcasts of Elam shall not come," ver. 36. The four winds shall be brought upon them, the storm shall come, sometimes from one point and sometimes from another, to toss and hurry them several ways. And we know not from what point the wind of trouble may blow; but if God compass us with his favour we are safe, and may be easy, which way soever the storm comes. Fear shall drive them into other countries, they shall be dismayed before their enemies; but, as if that were not enough, "I will send the sword after them," ver. 37. Note, God can make his judgments follow those that think by flight to escape them, and to get out of the reach of them; evil pursues sinners.

Thirdly. Their princes shall be destroyed, and the government quite changed; ver. 38, "I will set my throne in Elam." The throne of Nebuchadnezzar shall be set there, or the throne of Cyrus, who began his conquests with Elymais; or it may be meant of the throne on which God sits for judgment. He will make them know that he reigns, that he judgeth in the earth, and that kings and princes are accountable to him, and that, as high as they are, he is above them. The king of Elam was famous of old, Gen. xiv. 1. Chedorlaomer was king of Elam, and a mighty man he was in his day; the nations about him served him; his successors, we may suppose, made a great figure; but the king of Elam is no more to God than another man. When God sets his throne in Elam he will "destroy from thence the king and the princes" that are, and set up whom he pleaseth.

Fourthly. Yet the destruction of Elam shall not be perpetual; ver. 39, "In the latter days I will bring again the captivity of Elam." When Cyrus had destroyed Babylon, brought the empire into the hands of the Persians, the Elamites, no doubt, returned in triumph, out of all the countries whither they were scattered, and settled again in their own country. But this promise was to have its full and principal accomplishment in the days of the Messiah, when we find Elamites particularly among those who, when the Holy Ghost was given, heard spoken in their own tongues the wonderful works of God, Acts ii. 11, and that is the most desirable return of the captivity. If the Son make you free, then you shall be free indeed.

CHAPTER L.

In this chapter, and that which follows, we have the judgment of Babylon, which is put last of Jeremiah's prophecies against the Gentiles, because it was last accomplished, and when the cup of God's fury went round, ch. xxv. 17, the king of Sheshach, that is, Babylon, drunk last. Babylon was employed as the rod in God's hand for the chastising of all the other nations, and now at length that rod shall be thrown into the fire. The destruction of Babylon by Cyrus was foretold, long before it came to its height, by Isaiah, and now again, when it is come to its height, by Jeremiah; for, though at this time he saw that kingdom flourishing like a green bay-tree, yet at the same time he foresaw it withered and cut down. And, as Isaiah's prophecies of the destruction of Babylon, and the deliverance of Israel out of it, seem designed to typify the evangelical triumphs of all believers over the powers of darkness, and in the great salvation wrought out by our Lord Jesus Christ, so Jeremiah's prophecies of the same events seem designed to point at the Apocalyptic triumphs of the Gospel church in the latter days over the New Testament Babylon, many passages in the Revelation being borrowed from hence. The kingdom of Babylon being much larger and stronger than any other of the kingdoms here prophesied against, its fall was the more considerable in itself; and it having been more oppressive to the people of God than any of the other, therefore the prophet is very large upon this subject, for the comfort of the captives; and what was foretold in general often before, ch. xxv. 12, xxvii. 7, is here more particularly described, and with a great deal of prophetic heat as well as light. The terrible judgments God had in store for Babylon, and the glorious blessings he had in store for his people that were captives there, are intermixed and counterchanged in the prophecy of this chapter; for therefore Babylon was destroyed to make way for the turning again of the captivity of God's people. Here is, I. The ruin of Babylon, ver. 1—3; and again, ver. 9—16; and again, ver. 21—32; and again, ver. 35—46. II. The redemption of God's people, ver. 4—8; and again, ver. 17—20; and again, ver. 33, 34. And these being set the one over against the other it is easy to say which one would choose to take one's lot with, the persecuting Babylonians, who, though now in pomp, are reserved for so great a ruin, or the persecuted Israelites, who, though now in thraldom, are reserved for so great a glory.

THE word that the LORD spake against Babylon and against the land of the Chaldeans by Jeremiah the prophet.

2 Declare ye among the nations,
And publish, and set up a standard;
Publish, and conceal not:
Say, Babylon is taken,
Bel is confounded,
Merodach is broken in pieces;
Her idols are confounded,
Her images are broken in pieces.

3 For out of the north there cometh up a nation against her
Which shall make her land desolate,
And none shall dwell therein:

and caves, tombs, and dwellings have been excavated in many places in the solid stone. Various travellers have described the remains of the chief city, Petra, as particularly illustrating the language of this text.

xlix. 19. The conqueror of Edom, here compared to a lion, was Nebuchadnezzar. The Roman occupation probably aided in restoring a certain amount of dignity to the region, but it gradually fell from its high estate, and has long been a ruined and desolate solitude.

xlix. 23. Damascus was the chief city of Syria. Hamath was a city of Syria, which afterwards flourished under the name of Epiphaneia, on the river Orontes, and is now called Hamah. Arpad has been lost sight of, and although in the same region has not certainly been discovered.

xlix. 25. "The city of praise" is an expression meaning the city which is praised; and "the city of my joy" signifies "my rejoicing city."

They shall remove, they shall depart,
Both man and beast.
4 In those days, and in that time, saith the LORD,
The children of Israel shall come,
They and the children of Judah together,
Going and weeping:
They shall go, and seek the LORD their God.
5 They shall ask the way to Zion
With their faces thitherward, saying,
Come, and let us join ourselves to the LORD
In a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten
6 My people hath been lost sheep:
Their shepherds have caused them to go astray,
They have turned them away on the mountains:
They have gone from mountain to hill,
They have forgotten their restingplace.
7 All that found them have devoured them:
And their adversaries said, We offend not,
Because they nave sinned against the LORD, the habitation of justice,
Even the LORD, the hope of their fathers.
8 Remove out of the midst of Babylon,
And go forth out of the land of the Chaldeans,
And be as the he goats before the flocks.

BIRS NIMROUD—THE SUPPOSED SITE OF BABYLON.

Here is, First. A word spoken against Babylon, by him whose works all agree with his word, and none of whose words fall to the ground. The king of Babylon had been very kind to Jeremiah, and yet he must foretell the ruin of that kingdom; for God's prophets must not be governed by favour or affection. Whoever are your friends, if, notwithstanding, they be God's enemies, we dare not speak peace to them.

1. The destruction of Babylon is here spoken of as a thing done, ver. 2. Let it be published to the nations as a piece of news, true news, and great news, and news they are all concerned in; let him hang out the flag, as is usual, on days of triumph, to give notice of it, let all the world take notice of it,—Babylon is taken; let God have the honour of it, let his people have the comfort of it, and therefore do not conceal it. Take care that it be known, that the Lord may be known by those judgments which he executeth, Ps. ix. 16.

2. It is spoken of as a thing done thoroughly; for, 1st. The very idols of Babylon, which the people would protect with all possible care, and from which they expected protection, shall be destroyed. Bel and Merodach were their two principal deities; they shall be confounded, and the images of them broken to pieces. 2nd. The country shall be laid waste, ver. 3, out of the north, from Media, which lay north of Babylon, and from Assyria, through which Cyrus made his descent upon Babylon; from thence the nation shall come that shall make her land desolate. Their land was north to the countries that they destroyed, who were therefore threatened with evil from the north; omne malum ab aquilone,—'every evil comes from the north.' But God will find out nations yet farther north to come upon them. The pomp and power of old Rome was brought down by northern nations, the Goths and Vandals.

Secondly. Here is a word spoken for the people of God, and for their comfort, both the children of Israel and Judah; for many there were of the ten tribes associated with those of the two tribes in their return out of Babylon. Now here,

1. It is promised, that they shall return to their God first, and then to their own land; and the promise of their conversion and reformation is that which makes way for all the other promises, ver. 4, 5. 1st. They shall lament after the Lord, as the whole house of Israel did in Samuel's time, 1 Sam. vii. 2. They shall go weeping. These tears flow not from the sorrow of the world, as those when they went into captivity, but from godly sorrow; they are tears of repentance for sin, tears of joy for the goodness of God, in the dawning of the day of their deliverance, which, for aught appears, doth more towards the bringing of them to mourn for sin than all the calamities of their captivity; that prevails to lead them to repentance when the other did not prevail to drive them to it. Note, It is a good sign God is coming towards a people in ways of mercy when they begin to be tenderly affected under his hand. 2nd. They shall inquire after the Lord; they shall not sink under their sorrows, but bestir themselves to find out comfort where it is to be had; they shall go weeping to seek the Lord their God. Those that seek the Lord must seek him sorrowing, as Christ's parents sought him, Lu. ii. 48. And those that sorrow must seek the Lord, and then their sorrow shall soon be turned into joy, for he will be found of those that seek him. They shall seek the Lord as their God, and shall now have no more to do with idols. When they shall hear that the idols of Babylon are confounded and broken, it will be seasonable for them to inquire after their own God, and return to him who lives for ever. Therefore men are deceived in false gods, that they may depend on the true God only. 3rd. They shall think of returning to their own country again, shall think of it not only as a mercy, but as a duty, because there only is the holy hill of Zion, on which once stood the house of the Lord their God; ver. 5, "They shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward." Zion was the city of their solemnities; they often thought of it in the depth of their captivity, Ps. cxxxvii. 1, but now the ruin of Babylon gave them some hopes of a release; they talk of nothing else but of going back to Zion. Their hearts were upon it before, and now they set their faces thitherwards; they long to be there; they set out for Zion, and resolve not to take up short. The journey is long; they know not the road, but they shall ask the way; for they will press forward till they come to Zion; and, as they are determined not to turn back, so they are in care not to miss the way. This represents the return of poor souls to God; heaven is the Zion they aim at as their end, on this they have set their hearts, towards this they have set their faces, and therefore ask the way thither. Not ask the way to heaven, and set their faces towards the world; nor set their faces towards heaven, and go on at a venture without asking the way. But in all true converts there is both a sincere desire to attain the end and a constant care to keep in the way; and a blessed sight it is to see people thus asking their way to heaven with their faces thitherwards. 4th. They shall renew their covenants with God of closer walking for the future; "Come, and let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant." They had broken covenant with God, had in effect separated themselves from him, but now they resolve to join themselves to him again, by engaging themselves afresh to be his. Thus, when backsliders return, they must do their first works, must renew the covenant they first made, and it must be a perpetual covenant, that must never be broken, and in order to that must never be forgotten; for a due remembrance of it will be the means of a due observance of it.

2. Their present case lamented as very sad, and as having been long so; "My people," (for he owns them as his now they are returning to him) "hath been lost sheep," ver. 6. "They have gone from mountain to hill," have been hurried from place to place, and could find no pasture; "they have forgotten their resting place" in their own country, and cannot find a way to it. And that which aggravated their misery was, 1st. That they were led astray by their own shepherds, their own princes and priests; they turned them from their duty, and so provoked God to turn them out of their own land. It is ill with a people when their leaders cause them to err, when those that should direct and reform them seduce and debauch them, and when those that should secure and advance their interests are the betrayers of them. 2nd. That in their wanderings they lay exposed to the beasts of prey, who thought they were entitled to them, as waifs and strays that had no owner, ver. 7. It is with with them as with wandering sheep, "All that found them have devoured them," and made a prey of them; and when they did them the greatest injuries they laughed at them, telling them it was what their own prophets had many a time told them they deserved. That was far from justifying those who did them wrong, yet they bantered them with this excuse, "We offend not, because they have sinned against the Lord," but they could not pretend they had sinned against them. And see what notion they had of the Lord they had sinned against, not as the only true and living God, but only as "the habitation of justice," and "the hope of their fathers." They had put a contempt upon the temple, and upon the tradition of their ancestors, and therefore deserved to suffer these hard things. And yet it was indeed an aggravation of their sin, and justified God, though it did not justify their adversaries in what was done to them, that they had forsaken "the habitation of justice," and him that was "the hope of their fathers."

3. They are called upon to hasten away as soon as ever the door of liberty was opened to them, ver. 8. Remove not only out of the borders, but "out of the midst of Babylon;" though you be never so well seated there, think not to settle there, but hasten to Zion, and "be as the he-goats before the flocks," that is, strive which shall be foremost, which shall lead in so good a work. A he-goat is therefore comely in going, (Pr. xxx. 31,) because he goes first. It is a graceful thing to be forward in a good work, and to set others a good example.

9 For, lo, I will raise
And cause to come up against Babylon
An assembly of great nations from the north country:
And they shall set themselves in array against her;
From thence she shall be taken:
Their arrows shall be as of a mighty expert man;
None shall return in vain.
10 And Chaldea shall be a spoil:
All that spoil her shall be satisfied, saith the LORD
11 Because ye were glad, because ye rejoiced,
O ye destroyers of mine heritage,
Because ye are grown fat as the heifer at grass,
And bellow as bulls;
12 Your mother shall be sore confounded;
She that bare you shall be ashamed:
Behold, the hindermost of the nations shall be
A wilderness, a dry land, and a desert.
13 Because of the wrath of the LORD it shall not be inhabited,
But it shall be wholly desolate:
Every one that goeth by Babylon shall be astonished,
And hiss at all her plagues.
14 Put yourselves in array against Babylon round about:

xlix. 27. The name of Benhadad seems to have been adopted by several Syrian kings, just as the kings of Egypt were called Pharaoh.

xlix. 28. Kedar is really the name of an Arab tribe which ranged over the country between the Red Sea and the Euphrates. Here, however, the name must denote the territory. Hazor was not an uncommon name for a town or city, but it here seems to mean an Arab tribe or territory. Some maintain that Hazor, a fortified city in the tribe of Naphtali, must be understood, in which case it is not easy to explain why Kedar is joined with it. A still greater difficulty arises from the fact that Kedar and Hazor seem to be associated in the phrase, "the men of the East." Indeed, the whole of this prophecy, to verse 33, seems to require that we should explain Hazor as the name of an Arabian tribe, or rather district.

xlix. 32. The phrase "in the utmost corners" is wrongly rendered, and describes men who trimmed their beards in a peculiar manner.

All ye that bend the bow,
Shoot at her, spare no arrows:
For she hath sinned against the LORD.
15 Shout against her round about:
She hath given her hand:
Her foundations are fallen,
Her walls are thrown down:
For it is the vengeance of the LORD:
Take vengeance upon her;
As she hath done, do unto her.
16 Cut off the sower from Babylon,
And him that handleth the sickle in the time of harvest:
For fear of the oppressing sword
They shall turn every one to his people,
And they shall flee every one to his own land.
17 Israel is a scattered sheep;
The lions have driven him away:
First the king of Assyria hath devoured him,
And last this Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon hath broken his bones.
18 Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel;
Behold, I will punish the king of Babylon and his land,
As I have punished the king of Assyria.
19 And I will bring Israel again to his habitation,
And he shall feed on Carmel and Bashan,
And his soul shall be satisfied
Upon mount Ephraim and Gilead.
20 In those days, and in that time, saith the LORD, [none;
The iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be
And the sins of Judah, and they shall not be found:
For I will pardon them whom I reserve.

God is here, by his prophet, as afterwards in his providence, proceeding in his controversy with Babylon. Observe,

First. The commission and charge given to the instruments that were employed in destroying Babylon. The army that is to do it is called "an assembly of great nations," ver. 9, the Medes and Persians, and all their allies and auxiliaries; it is called an assembly, because regularly formed by the Divine will and counsel to do this execution. God will raise them up to do it,—will incline them to, and fit them for, this service, and then he will cause them to come up, for all their motions are under his conduct and direction. He shall give the word of command, shall order them to put themselves in array against Babylon, ver. 14, and then they shall put themselves in array, ver. 9, for what God appoints to be done shall be done; and from thence presently she shall be taken,—from their first sitting down before it they shall be still gaining ground against it till it be taken. God shall bid them "shoot at her, and spare no arrows," ver. 14; and then "their arrows shall be as of a mighty expert man," that has both skill and strength, a good eye and a good hand; ver. 9, "None shall return in vain." When God gives commission he will give success. Nay, they are bidden not only to "shoot at her," ver. 14, but to "shout against her," ver. 15, with a triumphant shout, as those that are already sure of victory. Those whom God directs to shoot may do it with shouting, for they are sure not to miss the mark.

Secondly. The desolation and destruction itself that shall be brought upon Babylon. This is set forth here in a great variety of expressions. 1. The wealth of Babylon shall be a rich and easy prey to the conquerors; ver. 10, "Chaldea shall be a spoil" to all her destroyers, who shall enrich themselves by plundering her, and, which is strange, "all that spoil her shall be satisfied." They shall have so much, that even they themselves shall say they have enough. 2. The country of Babylon shall be dispeopled, and lie uninhabited; "It shall be wholly desolate," ver. 13, to that degree, that every one that goes by shall triumph in their fall, and, instead of condoling them, shall "hiss at all her plagues," ver. 13. 3. Their ancestors shall be ashamed of their cowardice, in fleeing from the first onset, ver. 12. Or, your mother, that is, Babylon itself, the mother city, shall be confounded, when she sees herself deserted by those that should have been her guards. Thus the first ages of Christians may justly be confounded and ashamed, to see how unlike them the latter ages are, and how wretchedly they have degenerated; and no sin brings a surer and sorer ruin upon persons or people than apostacy. 4. The great admirers of Babylon shall see it rendered very despicable. The last of kingdoms, the very tail of the nations, shall it be, "a wilderness, a dry land, and a desert," ver. 12. The country that was populous shall be dispeopled, that was enriched with a fertile soil shall become barren. 5. The great city, the head of it, shall be quite ruined; "her foundations are fallen," and therefore "her walls are thrown down;" for how can the walls stand when Divine vengeance is at the door, and shakes the very foundations? It is the vengeance of the Lord, which nothing can contend with either in law or battle. 6. There shall not be left in Babylon so much as the poor of the land for vinedressers and husbandmen, as there was in Israel, ver. 16. The sower shall be cut off from Babylon, and him that handleth the sickle; the country shall be so emptied of people that there shall be none to till the ground, and gather in the fruits of it. Harvest shall come, and there shall be no reapers; seedness shall come, but there shall be no sowers; God will do his part, but there shall be no men to do theirs. 7. All their auxiliary forces, which they have hired into their service, shall desert them, as mercenary men often do, upon the approach of danger; ver. 16, "for fear of the oppressing sword, they shall turn every one to his people." This was threatened before concerning Egypt, ch. xlvi. 16.

Thirdly. The procuring provoking cause of this destruction. It comes from God's displeasure: it is "because of the wrath of the Lord," that Babylon is wholly desolate, ver. 13, and his wrath is righteous; for, ver. 14, "She hath sinned against the Lord," therefore "spare no arrows." Note, It is sin that makes men a mark for the arrows of God's judgments. A great deal of idolatry and immorality were to be found in Babylon, yet those are not mentioned as the reason of God's displeasure against them, but the injuries they had done to the people of God, from a principle of enmity to them as his people. They have been the destroyers of God's heritage, ver. 11. Herein indeed God made use of them for the necessary correction of his people; and yet it is laid to their charge as a heinous crime, because they designed nothing but their utter destruction. 1. What they did against Jerusalem they did with pleasure; ver. 11, "Ye were glad, ye rejoiced." God doth not afflict his people willingly, and therefore takes it very ill if the instruments he employs afflict them willingly. When Titus Vespasian destroyed Jerusalem, he wept over it, but these Chaldeans triumphed over it. 2. The spoils of Jerusalem they made use of to feed their own luxury; "Ye are grown fat as the heifer at grass, and bellow as bulls." Your having conquered Jerusalem has made you very wanton and proud, easy to yourselves, and formidable to all about you, and therefore you must be a spoil. They that have thus swallowed down riches must vomit them up again. Therefore they have given their hand, ver. 15; that is, they have surrendered themselves to the conqueror, have tamely yielded, so that now you may take vengeance on her, now you may make reprisals, and do unto her as she hath done. 3. They aimed at nothing less than the utter ruin of God's Israel. "Israel is a scattered sheep," as before, ver. 6, that is, not only barked at and worried by dogs, but even lions, the most potent adversaries, have roared upon him, and driven him away, ver. 17. One king of Assyria carried the ten tribes quite away, and devoured them; another invaded Judah, and plundered and impoverished it; tore the fleece and flesh of this poor sheep, and now at last, this Nebuchadnezzar, that is the terror and plague of all his neighbours, has taken advantage of the low condition to which he is reduced, and he has fallen upon him, and broken his bones, has quite ruined him, has unboned him; and therefore this king of Babylon must be punished as the king of Assyria was, ver. 18. Note, Those who pursue and prosecute the sins of their predecessors must expect to be pursued and prosecuted by their plagues; if they do as they did, let them fare as they fared.

Fourthly. The mercy promised to the Israel of God, which shall not only accompany but accrue from the destruction of Babylon. 1. God will return their captivity; they shall be released out of their bondage, and brought again to their own habitation, as sheep that were scattered to their own fold, ver. 19. They still retained a title to the land of Canaan, it is their habitation still, the discontinuance of their possession was not the destruction of their right; but now they shall recover the enjoyment of it again. 2. He will restore their prosperity. They shall not only live, but live comfortably in their own land again; they shall feed upon Carmel and Bashan, the richest and most fruitful parts of the country. These sheep shall be gathered from the deserts to which they were dispersed, and put again into good pasture, which their soul shall be satisfied with; though they shall come hungry to it, having been so long stinted and straitened, and kept short, yet they shall find enough to satiate them, and shall have hearts to be satiated with it. They inquired the way to Zion, ver. 5, where God was to be served and worshipped, that was it which they chiefly aimed at in their return; but God will not only bring them thither, but bring them also to Carmel and Bashan, where they shall abundantly feed themselves. Note, They that return to God and their duty shall find true satisfaction of soul in so doing; and they that seek first the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof, that aim to make their habitation in Zion, the holy hill, other things shall be added to them, even all the comforts of Ephraim and Gilead, the fruitful hills. 3. God will pardon their iniquity. This is the root of all the rest; ver. 20, "In those days the iniquity of Israel shall be sought for, and there shall be none." Not only the punishments of their iniquity shall be taken off, but the offence which it gave to God shall be forgotten, and he will be reconciled to them. Their sin shall be before him as if it had never been; it shall be blotted out as a cloud, crossed out as a debt, shall be cast behind his back, nay, it shall be cast into the depth of the sea, shall be no longer sealed up among God's treasures, nor in any danger of appearing again, or rising up against them. This notes how fully God forgives sin, he remembers it no more. Note, Deliverances out of trouble are then comforts indeed, when they are the fruits of the forgiveness of sin, Isa. xxxviii. 17. Judah and Israel were so fully forgiven when they were brought back out of Babylon, that they are said to have "received of the Lord's hand double for all their sins," Isa. xl. 2. This may include also a thorough reformation of their hearts and lives, as well as a full remission of their sins. If any seek for idols, or any idolatrous customs among them, after their return, there shall be none, they shall not find them; their dross shall be purely purged away, and by that it shall appear that their guilt is so; "for I will pardon them whom I reserve." I will be propitious to them, so the word is: and that must be through him who is the great propitiation. Note, Those whose sins God pardons he reserves for something very great; for whom he justifies them he glorifies.

21 Go up against the land of Merathaim,
Even against it, and against the inhabitants of Pekod:
Waste and utterly destroy after them, saith the LORD,
And do according to all that I have commanded thee.
22 A sound of battle is in the land,
And of great destruction. [broken!
23 How is the hammer of the whole earth cut asunder and How is Babylon become a desolation among the nations!
24 I have laid a snare for thee, and thou art also taken,
O Babylon, and thou wast not aware:
Thou art found, and also caught,
Because thou hast striven against the LORD
25 The LORD hath opened his armoury,
And hath brought forth the weapons of his indignation:
For this is the work of the Lord GOD of hosts
In the land of the Chaldeans.
26 Come against her from the utmost border,
Open her storehouses:
Cast her up as heaps, and destroy her utterly:

xlix. 33. For "dragons" we must read jackals.

xlix. 34. Elam was in the south-west of Persia.

xlix. 35. The Elamites were celebrated for their skill in the use of the bow, as observed by Isaiah (xxii. 6), Strabo, and Livy.

l. 2. The fall of Babylon is recorded by various ancient writers. It was taken by Cyrus about 538 B.C. Bel was the chief deity of the Babylonians, their Baal or Jupiter. Merodach was another of their gods, or a special name for Bel as Jupiter. Although nowhere else mentioned separately in the Bible, Merodach's name appears joined with that of Baladan in Isa. xxxix. 1, and in inscriptions.

l. 4. In this and the following verses it is predicted that after the fall of Babylon the captive Israelites should be restored. Permission to this effect was granted them by Cyrus, and, as foretold, they never afterwards fell into idolatry.

l. 9. The conquerors of Babylon are represented as coming from the north, and this is a correct representation of the fact.

Let nothing of her be left.
27 Slay all her bullocks;
Let them go down to the slaughter:
Woe unto them! for their day is come,
The time of their visitation. [Babylon,
The voice of them that flee and escape out of the land of
To declare in Zion the vengeance of the LORD our God,
The vengeance of his temple.
29 Call together the archers against Babylon:
All ye that bend the bow,
Camp against it round about;
Let none thereof escape:
Recompense her according to her work;
According to all that she hath done, do unto her:
For she hath been proud against the LORD,
Against the Holy One of Israel.
30 Therefore shall her young men fall in the streets,
And all her men of war shall be cut off in that day, saith the LORD.
31 Behold, I am against thee, O thou most proud,
Saith the Lord GOD of hosts:
For thy day is come, the time that I will visit thee.
32 And the most proud shall stumble and fall,
And none shall raise him up:
And I will kindle a fire in his cities,
And it shall devour all round about him.

Here, First. The forces are mustered and commissioned to destroy Babylon, and every thing got ready for a descent upon that potent kingdom. Go up against that land by Merathaim, that is, the country of the Mardi, that lay part in Assyria and part in Armenia, and go among the inhabitants of Pekod, another country mentioned, Eze. xxiii. 23, which Cyrus took in his way to Babylon. The forces of Cyrus are called to go up against Babylon, ver. 21, to "come against her from the utmost border;" let all come together, for there will be both work and pay enough for them all, ver. 26. Distance of place must not be their hindrance from engaging in this work; the archers particularly must be called together against Babylon, ver. 29. Thus "the Lord hath opened his armoury," ver. 25, his treasury, so the word is, and hath "brought forth the weapons of his indignation," as great princes fetch out of their magazines and stores all necessary provisions for their armies, when they undertake any great expedition. Media and Persia are now God's armoury; thence he fetcheth the weapons of his wrath, Cyrus and his great officers and armies, whom he will make use of for the destruction of Babylon. Note, Great men are but instruments which the great God makes use of to serve his own purposes. He hath variety of instruments, hath them at command, hath armouries ready to be opened according as the occasion is. "This is the work of the Lord God of hosts." Note, When God hath work to do, he will make it appear that he is God of hosts, and will not want instruments to do it with.

Secondly. Instructions are given them what to do. In general, "Do according to all that I have commanded thee," ver. 21. It was said of Cyrus, Isa. xliv. 28, He shall perform all my pleasure in his expedition against Babylon. They must "waste and utterly destroy after them;" when they have destroyed once, they must go over them again; or, destroy their posterity that should come after them. They must "open her storehouses," ver. 26, rifle her treasures, and turn her artillery against herself; they must "cast her up as heaps;" let all the wealth and pomp of Babylon be shovelled up in a heap of ruins and rubbish. 'Tread her down as heaps,' so the margin reads it, and destroy her utterly. See how little account the great God makes of those things which men so much value, and value themselves by. Their princes and great men, that are fat and bulky, shall fall by the sword, not as men of war in the field of battle, which we call a bed of honour, but as beasts by the butcher's hand; ver. 27, "Slay all her bullocks," all her mighty men, let them go down sottishly and insensibly, as an ox to the slaughter. "Woe unto them," their cause is the more sad for the little sense they have of it; their day is come to fall, the time when they must be reckoned with, and they are not aware of it.

Thirdly. Assurances are given them of success. Let them do what God commands, and they shall accomplish what he threatens. A great destruction shall be made, ver. 22. Babylon shall become a desolation, ver. 23; her young men, and all her men of war, shall be cut off in that day, that should have been her defence, ver. 30. God is against her, ver. 31; he hath laid a snare for her, ver. 24; he hath formed this enterprise against her, that she should be surprised as a bird taken in a snare. Cyrus shall no doubt prevail, for he fights under God. God will kindle a fire in the cities of Babylon, ver. 32, and who can stand before him when he is angry, or quench the fire he has kindled?

Fourthly. Reasons are given for these severe dealings with Babylon. They that are employed in this war may, if they please, know the grounds of it, and be satisfied in the justice of it, which it is fit all should be that are called to such work. 1. Babylon has been very troublesome, vexatious, and injurious to all its neighbours. It has been "the hammer of the whole earth," ver. 23, beating, beating down and beating to pieces, all the nations far and near. It has done so long enough, it is time now that it be cut asunder and broken. Note, He that is the God of nations will, sooner or later, assert the injured rights of nations against those that unjustly and violently invade them. The God of the whole earth will break the hammer of the whole earth. 2. Babylon has bid defiance to God himself; "Thou hast striven against the Lord," ver. 24, hast joined issue with him, (so the word signifies,) as in law or battle, hast openly opposed him, set up rivals with him, raised rebellion against him, therefore thou art now found and caught, as in a snare. Note, Those that strive against the Lord will soon find themselves overmatched. 3. Babylon ruined Jerusalem, the holy city, and the holy house there, and must now be called to an account for that. This is the manifesto published in Zion, in the day of Babylon's visitation; it is "the vengeance of the Lord our God, the vengeance of his temple," ver. 28. The burning of the temple, and carrying away the vessels of that, was an article in the charge against Babylon, on which greater stress was laid than upon its being the hammer of the whole earth, for Zion was the joy and glory of the whole earth. Note, Whatever wrong is done to God's church, his temple in the world, it will certainly be reckoned for; and no vengeance will be sorer and heavier than the vengeance of the temple. 4. Babylon had been very haughty and insolent, and therefore must have a fall, for it is the glory of God to look upon those that are proud, and to abase them, Job xl. 12. "I am against thee, O thou most proud," ver. 31. 'Thou pride,' so the word is; and again, ver. 32, as proud as pride itself. Note, The pride of men's hearts sets God against them, and ripens them apace for ruin; for God resists the proud, and will bring them down. The most proud shall stumble and fall; they shall fall not so much by others thrusting them down as by their own stumbling; for they hold their heads so high that they never look under their feet, to choose their way, and avoid stumblingblocks, but walk at all adventures. Babylon's pride must unavoidably be her ruin, for "she has been proud against the Lord, against the Holy One of Israel," ver. 29; has insulted him in insulting over his people; she has made him her enemy, and therefore, when she is fallen none shall raise her up, ver. 32. Who can help those up whom God will throw down?

33 Thus saith the LORD of hosts;
The children of Israel and the children of Judah were oppressed together:
And all that took them captives held them fast:
They refused to let them go.
34 Their Redeemer is strong;
The LORD of hosts is his name:
He shall throughly plead their cause,
That he may give rest to the land,
And disquiet the inhabitants of Babylon.
35 A sword is upon the Chaldeans, saith the LORD,
And upon the inhabitants of Babylon,
And upon her princes, and upon her wise men.
36 A sword is upon the liars; and they shall dote: [mayed
A sword is upon her mighty men; and they shall be dis-37 A sword is upon their horses, and upon their chariots,
And upon all the mingled people that are in the midst
And they shall become as women: [of her;
A sword is upon her treasures; and they shall be robbed.
38 A drought is upon her waters;
and they shall be dried up:
For it is the land of graven images,
And they are mad upon their idols.
39 Therefore the wild beasts of the desert
With the wild beasts of the islands shall dwell there,
And the owls shall dwell therein:
And it shall be no more inhabited for ever;
Neither shall it be dwelt in from generation to generation.
40 As God overthrow Sodom and Gomorrah
And the neighbour cities thereof, saith the LORD;
So shall no man abide there,
Neither shall any son of man dwell therein
41 Behold, a people shall come from the north, and a great nation,
And many kings shall be raised up from the coasts of the earth.

ASSYRIAN GOD.

42 They shall hold the bow and the lance:
They are cruel, and will not shew mercy:
Their voice shall roar like the sea,
And they shall ride upon horses,
Every one put in array, like a man to the battle, Against thee, O daughter of Babylon.
43 The king of Babylon hath heard the report of them,
And his hands waxed feeble:
Anguish took hold of him,
And pangs as of a woman in travail.

---

l. 12. Babylon is here called a mother, in reference to the custom of calling the capital of a country its metropolis or mother city.

l. 16. The country as well as the city was to be desolated, and it is observable that even now desolation reigns round Babylon.

l. 17. The empire of Assyria was overthrown with Nineveh, its capital, and Babylon then became the great ruler of the East.

l. 19. Carmel, Bashan, Ephraim, and Gilead are mentioned to show that the Israelites should occupy the whole land.

l. 21. Merathaim and Pekod are obscure terms, usually understood to apply to Babylon as "doubly rebellious" and "punished." Hence some do not regard them as proper names, but translate them as a doubly rebellious country and people worthy of punishment.

l. 24. The fact that Babylon was taken not by storm, but by a device, is here alluded to. Cyrus made a new channel for the river, and at night, when the people were feasting and off their guard, he turned the stream into the new bed. Having made every preparation

44 Behold, he shall come up
Like a lion from the swelling of Jordan
Unto the habitation of the strong:
But I will make them suddenly run away from her;
And who is a chosen man, that I may appoint over her?
For who is like me? and who will appoint me the time?
And who is that shepherd that will stand before me?
45 Therefore hear ye the counsel of the LORD,
That he hath taken against Babylon;
And his purposes, that he hath purposed against the land of the Chaldeans:
Surely the least of the flock shall draw them out:
Surely he shall make their habitation desolate with them.
46 At the noise of the taking of Babylon the earth is moved,
And the cry is heard among the nations.

We have in these verses,

First. Israel's sufferings, and their deliverance out of those sufferings. God takes notice of the bondage of his people in Babylon, as he did of their bondage in Egypt; he hath surely seen it, and has heard their cry. Israel and Judah were "oppressed together," ver. 33. Those that remained of the captives of the ten tribes, upon the uniting of the kingdoms of Assyria and Chaldea, seemed to have come and mingled themselves with those of the two tribes, and to have mingled tears with them, so that they were oppressed together. They were humble supplicants for their liberty, and that was all; they could not attempt any thing towards it, for all that took them captives held them fast, and were quite too hard for them. But this is their comfort in distress, that, though they are weak, "their Redeemer is strong," ver. 34; their avenger, so the word signifies, that has a right to them, and will claim his right, and make good his claim: he is stronger than their enemies, that hold them fast; he can overpower all the force that is against them, and put strength into his own people, though they are very weak. "The Lord of hosts is his name," and he will answer his name, and make it to appear that he is what his people call him, and will be that to them for which they depend upon him. Note, It is the unspeakable comfort of the people of God that, though they have hosts against them, they have the Lord of hosts for them. And "he shall thoroughly plead their cause;" pleading he shall plead it, plead it with jealousy, plead it effectually, plead it and carry it, "that he may give rest to the land," to his people's land, rest from all their enemies round about. This is applicable to all believers that complain of the dominion of sin, and corruption, and of their own weakness and manifold infirmities, let them know that "their Redeemer is strong," he is able to keep what they commit to him, and he will plead their cause; sin shall not have dominion over them, he will make them free, and they shall be free indeed; he will give them rest, that rest which remains for the people of God.

Secondly. Babylon's sin, and their punishment for that sin.

1. The sins they are here charged with are idolatry and persecution. 1st. They oppressed the people of God, they held them fast, and would not let them go; they "opened not the house of his prisoners," Isa. xiv. 17. This was God's quarrel with them, as of old with Pharaoh; it cost him dear, and yet they would not take warning. Therefore the inhabitants of Babylon must be disquieted, ver. 34, because they have disquieted God's people, whose honour and comfort he is jealous for, and therefore will recompense tribulation to those that trouble them, as well as rest to them that are troubled, 2 Thes. i. 6, 7. 2nd. They wronged God himself, and robbed him, giving that glory to others which is due to him alone; for, ver. 38, it is the land of graven images. All parts of the country abounded with idols, and they were mad upon them, were in love with them, and doated on them, cared not what cost and pains they were at in the worship of them, were unwearied in paying their respects to them; and in all this they were wretchedly infatuated, and acted like men out of their wits. They were carried on in their idolatry without reason or discretion, like men in a perfect fury. The word here used for idols properly signifies terrors, Enim, the name given to giants that were formidable, because they made the images of their gods to look frightful, to strike a terror upon fools and children. Their idols were scarecrows, yet they doated on them. Babylon was the mother of harlots, Rev. xvii. 5, the source of idolatry. Note, It is the maddest thing in the world to make a god of any creature; and those who are proud against the Lord, the true God, are justly given up to strong delusions, to be mad upon idols, that cannot profit. But this madness is wickedness, for which sinners will be certainly and severely reckoned with.

2. The judgments of God upon them for these sins are such as will quite lay them waste, and ruin them.

1st. All that should be their defence and support shall be cut off by the sword. The Chaldeans had long been God's sword, wherewith he had done execution upon the sinful nations round about; but now, they being as bad as any of them, or worse, a sword is brought upon them, even upon the inhabitants of Babylon, ver. 35, a sword of war; and as it is in God's hand, sent and directed by him, it is a sword of justice. It shall be, First. Upon their princes. They shall fall by it, and their dignity, wealth, and power shall not secure them. Secondly Upon their wise men, their philosophers, their statesmen, and privy counsellors. Their learning and policy shall neither secure themselves nor stand the public in any stead. Thirdly. Upon their soothsayers and astrologers, here called the liars, ver. 36, for they cheated with their prognostications of peace and prosperity. The sword upon them shall make them doat, so that they shall talk like fools, and be as men that had lost all their wits. Note, God has a sword that can reach the soul, and affect the mind, and bring men under spiritual plagues. Fourthly. Upon their mighty men. A sword shall be upon their spirits; if they are not slain, yet they shall be dismayed, and shall be no longer mighty men; for what stead will their hands stand them in when their hearts fail them. Fifthly. Upon their militia, ver. 37. The sword shall be upon their horses and chariots; the invaders shall make themselves masters of all their warlike stores, shall seize their horses and chariots for themselves, or destroy them. The troops of other nations, that were in their service, shall be quite disheartened, the mingled people shall become as weak and timorous as women. Sixthly. Upon their exchequer. The sword shall be upon her treasures, which are the sinews of war, and they shall be robbed and made use of by the enemy against them. See what universal destruction the sword makes when it comes with commission.

2nd. The country shall be made desolate, ver. 38, the waters shall be dried up; the water that secures the city. Cyrus drew the river Euphrates into so many channels as made it passable for his army, so that they got with ease to the walls of Babylon, which were thought to be by that river inaccessible. The water likewise that makes the country fruitful should be dried up, so that it shall be turned into barrenness, and shall be no more inhabited by the children of men, but by the "wild beasts of the desert," ver. 39. This was foretold concerning Babylon, Isa. xiii. 19—22. It shall become like Sodom and Gomorrah, ver. 40. The same was foretold concerning Edom, ch. xlix. 18. As the Chaldeans had laid Edom waste, so they shall themselves be laid waste.

3rd. The king and kingdom shall be put into the utmost confusion and consternation by the enemies' invading of them, ver. 41—43. All the expressions here used, speaking the formidable power of the invaders, the terrors wherewith they should array themselves, and the mighty fright which both court and country should be put into thereby, we met with before, ch. vi. 22—24, concerning the Chaldeans' invading the land of Judah. The battle which is there said to be against thee, O daughter of Zion, is here said to be against thee, O daughter of Babylon, to intimate that they should be paid in their own coin. Those that are for terror and destruction to others, God can find out such as shall be for terror and destruction to them; and those who have dealt cruelly, and have shewed no mercy, may expect to be cruelly dealt with, and to find no mercy. Only there is one difference between these passages: there it is said, "We have heard the fame thereof, and our hands wax feeble," &c.; here it is said, "The king of Babylon has heard the report," and "his hands waxed feeble," which intimates, that that proud and daring prince shall in the day of his distress be as weak and dispirited as the meanest Israelites were in the day of their distress.

4th. That they shall be as ill hurt as frightened; for the invader shall come up as a lion, to tear and destroy, ver. 44; and shall make them and their habitation desolate, ver. 45; and the desolation shall be so astonishing, that all the nations about shall be terrified by it, ver. 46. These three verses we had before, ch. xlix. 19—21, in the prophecy of the destruction of Edom, which was accomplished by the Chaldeans, and they are here repeated mutatis mutandis,—'with a few necessary alterations,' in the prophecy of the destruction of Babylon, which was to be accomplished upon the Chaldeans, to shew that, though the distributions of providence may appear unequal for a time, its retributions will be equal at last; When thou shalt make an end to spoil thou shalt be spoiled, Isa. xxxiii. 1; Rev. xiii. 10.

CHAPTER LI.

The prophet in this chapter goes on with the prediction of Babylon's fall, to which other prophets also bare witness. He is very large and lively in describing the foresight God had given him of it, for the encouragement of the pious captives whose deliverance depended upon it, and was to be the result of it. Here is, I. The record of Babylon's doom with the particulars of it, intermixed with the grounds of God's controversy with her, many aggravations of her fall, and great encouragements given from thence to the Israel of God that suffered such hard things by her, ver. 1—58. II. The representation and ratification of this, by the throwing of a copy of this prophecy into the river Euphrates, ver. 59—64.

THUS saith the LORD;
Behold, I will raise up against Babylon,
And against them that dwell in the midst of them that rise up against me,
A destroying wind;
2 And will send unto Babylon fanners,
That shall fan her, and shall empty her land: [about.
For in the day of trouble they shall be against her round
3 Against him that bendeth let the archer bend his bow,
And against him that lifteth himself up in his brigan
And spare ye not her young men; [dine:
Destroy ye utterly all her host.
4 Thus the slain shall fall in the land of the Chaldeans,
And they that are thrust through in her streets.
5 For Israel hath not been forsaken,
Nor Judah of his God, of the LORD of hosts;
Though their land was filled with sin against the Holy One of Israel.
6 Flee out of the midst of Babylon,
And deliver every man his soul:
Be not cut off in her iniquity;
For this is the time of the LORD'S vengeance;
He will render unto her a recompence.
7 Babylon hath been a golden cup in the LORD'S hand,
That made all the earth drunken:
The nations have drunken of her wine;
Therefore the nations are mad.
8 Babylon is suddenly fallen and destroyed:
Howl for her;
Take balm for her pain,
If so be she may be healed.
9 We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed:
Forsake her, and let us go every one into his own country:
For her judgment reacheth unto heaven,
And is lifted up even to the skies.
10 The LORD hath brought forth our righteousness:

for the moment, he and his troops rushed into the city along the old course of the river.

l. 28. Scott says truly, "The Chaldeans were guilty of the greatest impiety in destroying the Temple of God, as well as of cruelty and oppression upon the Jews. Belshazzar was profaning the vessels of the Temple in the most daring and impious manner, when the handwriting announced his destruction; and the ruin of the Chaldeans was the vengeance of God's Temple, and the punishment of their enmity against him and his people." (See Dan. v., and especially verses 1, 2, 3.)

l. 30. Xenophon records that when Cyrus entered Babylon, he sent a body of cavalry up and down through the streets, bidding them kill those that they found abroad, and ordering some who understood the Syrian language to proclaim to those who were in the houses to remain within, and that if they were found abroad they should be killed.

Make the watch strong, set up the watchmen,
Prepare the ambushes:
For the LORD hath both devised and done
That which he spake against the inhabitants of Babylon.
13 O thou that dwellest upon many waters, abundant in treasures,
Thine end is come, and the measure of thy covetousness.
14 The LORD of hosts hath sworn by himself, saying,
Surely I will fill thee with men, as with caterpillers;
And they shall lift up a shout against thee.
15 He hath made the earth by his power,
He hath established the world by his wisdom,
And hath stretched out the heaven by his understanding.
16 When he uttereth his voice, there is a multitude of waters in the heavens;
And he causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of
He maketh lightnings with rain, [the earth:
And bringeth forth the wind out of his treasures.

Every founder is confounded by the graven image:
For his molten image is falsehood,
And there is no breath in them.
18 They are vanity, the work of errors:
In the time of their visitation they shall perish.
19 The portion of Jacob is not like them;
For he is the former of all things:
And Israel is the rod of his inheritance:
The LORD of hosts is his name.

And with thee will I break in pieces captains and rulers.

All their evil that they have done in Zion
In your sight, saith the LORD

And I will stretch out mine hand upon thee,
And roll thee down from the rocks,
And will make thee a burnt mountain.
26 And they shall not take of thee a stone for a corner,
Nor a stone for foundations;
But thou shalt be desolate for ever, saith the LORD.
27 Set ye up a standard in the land,
Blow the trumpet among the nations,
Prepare the nations against her,
Call together against her the kingdoms
Of Ararat, Minni, and Ashchenaz;

They have remained in their holds:
Their might hath failed;
They became as women:
They have burned her dwellingplaces,
Her bars are broken.

And one messenger to meet another,
To shew the king of Babylon
That his city is taken at one end,

And the reeds they have burned with fire,
And the men of war are affrighted.

The daughter of Babylon is like a threshingfloor,
It is time to thresh her:
Yet a little while, and the time of her harvest shall come

And I will dry up her sea, and make her springs dry.
37 And Babylon shall become heaps,
A dwellingplace for dragons,
An astonishment, and an hissing,
Without an inhabitant.
38 They shall roar together like lions:
They shall yell as lions' whelps.
39 In their heat I will make their feasts,
And I will make them drunken, that they may rejoice,
And sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake,
Saith the LORD.

Like rams with he goats.

And I will bring forth out of his mouth that which he hath swallowed up: [him:
And the nations shall not flow together any more unto

l. 38. For "drought" here some versions have "sword," which may be correct, as the Hebrew words for sword and drought are closely alike. Babylon was a city of rampant idolatry, and even in the night when it fell the king and his revellers praised the gods (Dan. v. 4).

l. 39. The so-called "wild beasts of the islands" were no doubt jackals; and by "owls" we must understand ostriches.

li. 1. The Hebrew rendered "them that dwell in the midst of them" really means those that inhabit Chaldea. Two words which give no intelligible sense if otherwise treated, become simple if regarded as a sort of cipher in which one letter is substituted for another, as if we should write s for a, y for b, s for c, &c. The Targum assumes this interpretation, and no doubt correctly. The Greek translators merely turn the Hebrew letters into Greek, and the Syriac fancies they mean "a hard heart." (See note on chap. xxv. 26.)

OVERFLOW OF THE EUPHRATES ON BABYLON.—ver. 42.

The particulars of this copious prophecy are dispersed and interwoven, and the same things left and returned to so often, that it could not well be divided into parts, but we must endeavour to collect them under their proper heads. Let us then observe here,

First. An acknowledgment of the great pomp and power that Babylon had been in, and the use that God in his providence had made of it; ver. 7, "Babylon hath been a golden cup," a rich and glorious empire, a golden city, Isa. xiv. 4; a head of gold, Dan. ii. 38; filled with all good things as a cup with wine; nay, she had been "a golden cup in the Lord's hand;" he had in a particular manner filled and favoured her with blessings; he had made the earth drunk with this cup; some were intoxicated with her pleasures, and debauched by her, others intoxicated with her terrors, and destroyed by her. And in both senses the New Testament Babylon is said to have made the kings of the earth drunk, Rev. xvii. 4; xviii. 3. Babylon had also been God's battle-axe; it was so at this time when Jeremiah prophesied, and was likely to be yet more so, ver. 20. The forces of Babylon were God's weapons of war, tools in his hand with which he broke in pieces and knocked down nations and kingdoms, horses and chariots, which are so much the strength of kingdoms, ver. 21; man and woman, young and old, with which kingdoms are replenished, ver. 22; the shepherd and his flock, the husbandman and his oxen, with which kingdoms are maintained and supplied, ver. 24. Such havoc as this the Chaldeans had made, when God employed them as instruments of his wrath for the chastising of the nations; and yet now Babylon herself must fall. Note, Those that have carried all before them a great while, yet will at length meet with their match, and their day also will come to fall; the rod will itself be thrown into the fire at last; nor can any think it will exempt them from God's judgments, that they have been instrumental in executing his judgments on others.

Secondly. A just complaint made of Babylon, and a charge drawn up against her by the Israel of God. 1. They are complained of for their incorrigible wickedness; ver. 9, "We would have healed Babylon, but she is not healed." The people of God, that were captives among them, endeavoured according to the instructions given them, ch. x. 11, to convince them of the folly of their idolatry, but they could not do it; still they doated as much as ever upon their graven images, and therefore they resolve to quit them, and go to their own country. Yet some understand this as spoken by the forces they had hired for their assistance, declaring they had done their best to save her from ruin; but it was all to no purpose, and therefore they had as good go home to their respective countries; "for her judgment reacheth unto heaven," and it is in vain to withstand it, or think to avert it. 2. They are complained of for their inveterate malice against Israel. Other nations had been hardly used by the Chaldeans, but Israel only complains to God of it, and with confidence appeals to him, ver. 34, 35. "The king of Babylon has devoured me, and crushed me," and never thought he could do enough to ruin me; he has emptied me of all that was valuable, "hath swallowed me up" as a dragon or whale swallows up the little fish by shoals; "he hath filled his belly," filled his treasures, "with my delicates," with all my pleasant things, and "hath cast me out," cast me away as a vessel in which there is no pleasure; and now let them be accountable for all this. Zion and Jerusalem shall say, Let the violence done to me and my children, that are my own flesh, and pieces of myself, and all the blood of my people which they have shed like water, be upon them; let the guilt of it lie upon them, and let it be required at their hands. Note, Ruin is not far off from those that lie under the guilt of wrong done to God's people.

Thirdly. Judgment given upon this appeal by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, on behalf of Israel against Babylon. He sits in the throne judging right, is ready to receive complaints, and answers, ver. 36, "I will plead thy cause, leave it with me;" I will in due time plead it effectually, and take vengeance for thee; and every drop of Jerusalem's blood shall be accounted for with interest. Israel and Judah seem to have been neglected and forgotten, but God has an eye to them, ver. 5. It is true, "their land was filled with sin against the Holy One of Israel." They were a provoking people, and their sins were a great offence to God as a holy God, and as their God,—their Holy One; and therefore he justly delivered them up into the hands of their enemies,—might justly have abandoned them, and left them to perish in their hands; but God deals better with them than they deserve; and, notwithstanding their iniquities, and his severities, Israel is not forsaken, is not cast off, though he be cast out, but is owned and looked after by his God, by the Lord of hosts. God is his God still, and will act for him as the Lord of hosts, a God of power. Note, Though God's people may have broken his laws, and fallen under his rebukes, yet it doth not therefore follow that they are thrown out of covenant, but God's care of them and love to them will flourish again, Ps. lxxxix. 30, 33. The Chaldeans thought they should never be called to an account for what they had done against God's Israel, but there is a time fixed for vengeance, ver. 6. We cannot expect it should come sooner than the time fixed; but then it will come. He will render unto Babylon a recompence; for the avenging of Israel is the vengeance of the Lord, who espouseth their cause; it is the vengeance of his temple, ver. 11, as before, ch. l. 28. The Lord God of recompences, the God to whom vengeance belongs, will surely requite, ver. 56, will pay them home; he will render unto Babylon all the evil they have done in Zion, ver. 24. He will return it in the sight of his people; they shall have the satisfaction to see their cause pleaded with jealousy; they shall not only live to see those judgments brought upon Babylon, but they shall plainly see them to be the punishment of the wrong they have done to Zion. Any man may see it, and say, Verily there is a God that judgeth in the earth; for, just as Babylon "hath caused the slain of Israel to fall," has not only slain those that were found in arms, but all without distinction, even all the land, almost all were put to the sword; so at Babylon shall fall, not only the slain of the city, but of all the country, ver. 49. Cyrus shall measure to the Chaldeans the same that they measured to the Jews, so that every observer may discern that God is recompensing them for what they did against his people. Zion's children shall in a particular manner triumph in it; ver. 10, "The Lord hath brought forth our Madai, may imply that Media had more kings than one; but the expression probably includes the chief rulers of Media and Persia, who were associated in the siege and overthrow of Babylon.

li. 14. The caterpillars here should be locusts. Xenophon gives, in the eighth book of the "Cyropædia," an account of the invading forces of Cyrus, with the order in which they marched into the city: 4,000 guards were posted at the gate, 4,000 guards preceded Cyrus, 2,000 marched on each side of his chariot, and 300 officers followed. Then came on in succession 200 horses of Cyrus, with attendants, 2,000 spearmen, 40,000 horsemen, besides the cavalry of the Medes, Armenians, Hyrcanians, Caducians, and Saceans, the rear being brought up by the chariots four abreast, led by Artabates the Persian.

li. 15—19. These verses are repeated from chapter x. 12—16.

li. 20. Here Babylon is again addressed. For the future tense here and onward to verse 24, some render in the past tense, "have broken," which is better than "will break."

righteousness." He has appeared in our behalf against those that dealt unjustly with us, and has righted us; he has also made it to appear that he is reconciled to us, and that we are yet in his eyes a righteous nation. Let it therefore be spoken to his praise, "Come, and let us declare in Zion the work of the Lord our God," that others may be invited to join with us in praising him.

Fourthly. A declaration of the greatness and sovereignty of that God who espouseth Zion's cause, and undertakes to reckon with this proud and potent enemy, ver. 14. It is the Lord of hosts that hath said it, that hath sworn it, hath sworn it by himself; for he could swear by no greater, that he will fill Babylon with vast and incredible numbers of the enemies' forces; will "fill it with men as with caterpillars," that shall overpower it with multitudes, and need only to lift up a shout against it, for that shall be so terrible as to dispirit all the inhabitants, and make them an easy prey to this numerous army. But who and where is he that can break so powerful a kingdom as Babylon? The prophet gives an account of him from the description he had formerly given of him, and of his sovereignty and victory over all pretenders, ch. x. 12—16, which was there intended for the conviction of the Babylonian idolaters, and the confirmation of God's Israel in the faith and worship of the God of Israel; and it is here repeated to shew that God will convince those by his judgments who would not be convinced by his word, that he is God over all. Let not any doubt but that he who has determined to destroy Babylon is able to make his words good; for, 1. He is the God that made the world, ver. 15, and therefore nothing is too hard for him to do. It is in his name that our help stands, and on him our hope is built. 2. He has the command of all the creatures that he has made, ver. 16. His providence is a continued creation; he hath wind and rain at his dispose; if he speak the word, "there is a multitude of waters in the heavens," and it is a wonder how they hang there; fed by vapours out of the earth, and it is a wonder how they ascend thence. Lightnings and rains seem contraries, as fire and water, and yet they are produced together; and the wind which seems arbitrary in its motions, and we know not whence it comes, yet we are sure is brought out of his treasuries. 3. The idols that oppose the accomplishment of his word are a mere sham, and their worshippers brutish people, ver. 17, 18. The idols are falsehood, they are vanity, they are the work of errors; when they come to be visited, that is, to be examined and inquired into, they perish, that is their reputation sinks, and they appear to be nothing, and those that make them are like unto them. But between the God of Israel and these gods of the heathen there is no comparison; ver. 19, "The portion of Jacob is not like them." God, who speaks this, and will do it, is the former of all things, and the Lord of all hosts, and therefore can do what he will, and there is a near relation between him and his people; for he is their portion, and they are his; they put a confidence in him as their portion, and he is pleased to take complacency in them, and a particular care of them, as the lot of his inheritance; and therefore he will do what is best for them. The repetition of these things here which were said before, intimates both the certainty and importance of them, and obligeth us to take special notice of them. "God hath spoken once, yea, twice have we heard this, that power belongs to God;" power to destroy the most formidable enemies of his church. And if God thus speak once, yea, twice, we are inexcusable if we do not perceive it, and receive it.

Fifthly. A description of the instruments that are to be employed in this service. God hath "raised up the spirit of the kings of the Medes," ver. 11, Darius and Cyrus, who came against Babylon by a Divine instinct; for God's device is against Babylon, to destroy it. They do it, but God devised it; he designed it, they are but accomplishing his purpose, and acting as he directed. Note, God's counsel shall stand, and according to it all hearts shall move. Those whom God employs against Babylon are compared, ver. 1, to a destroying wind, which either by its coldness blasts the fruits of the earth or by its fierceness blows down all before it. This wind is brought out of God's treasuries, ver. 16, and it is here said to be raised up against them that dwell in the midst of the Chaldeans,—those of other nations that inhabit among them, and are incorporated with them. The Chaldeans rise up against God, by falling down before idols, and against them God will raise up destroyers, for he will be too hard for them that contest with him. These enemies are compared to fanners, ver. 2, who shall drive them away as chaff is driven away by the fan. The Chaldeans had been fanners to winnow God's people, ch. xv. 7, and to empty them; and now they shall themselves be in like manner despoiled and dispersed.

Sixthly. An ample commission given them to destroy and lay all waste. Let them bend their bow against the archers of the Chaldeans, ver. 3, and not spare her young men, but utterly destroy them; "for the Lord hath both devised and done what he spake against Babylon," ver. 12. This may animate the instruments he employs, by assuring them of success. The methods they take are such as God has devised, and therefore they shall surely prosper; what he hath spoken shall be done, for he himself will do it. And therefore let all necessary preparations be made; this they are called to, ver. 27, 28. Let a standard be set up, under which to list soldiers for this expedition; let a trumpet be blown to call men together to it, and animate them in it; let the nations out of which Cyrus' army is to be raised prepare their recruits; let the kingdoms of Ararat and Minni, and Ashkenaz, of Armenia, both the higher and the lower, and of Ascania, about Phrygia and Bithynia, send in their quota of men for this service. Let general officers be appointed, and the cavalry advance; let the horses come up in great numbers, as the caterpillars, and come like them leaping and pawing in the valley. Let them lay the country waste as caterpillars do, Joel ii. 4, especially rough caterpillars. Let the kings and captains prepare nations against Babylon, for the service is great, and there is occasion for many hands to be employed in it.

Seventhly. The weakness of the Chaldeans, and their inability to make head against this threatening, destroying force. When God employed them against other nations, they had spirit and strength to act offensively, and went on with admirable resolution, conquering and to conquer. But, now it comes to their turn to be reckoned with, all their might and courage is gone, their hearts fail them, and none of all their men of might and mettle have found their hands to act so much as defensively. They are called upon here to prepare for action, but it is ironically, and in an upbraiding way; ver. 11, "Make bright the arrows," which are grown rusty through disuse; "gather the shields," that in a time of long peace and security have been scattered and thrown out of the way; ver. 12, "Set up the standard upon the walls of Babylon," upon the towers on those walls, to summon all that owed suit and service to that mother city, now to come in to her assistance. Let them make the watch as strong as they can, and appoint the sentinels to their respective posts, and prepare ambushes for the reception of the enemy. This intimates that they would be found very secure and remiss, and would need to be thus quickened,—and they were so to that degree, that they were in the midst of their revels when the city was taken,—but that all their preparations should be to no purpose; who will may call them to it, but they shall have no heart to come at the call, ver. 29. The whole "land shall tremble and sorrow," a universal consternation shall seize upon them; for they shall see both the irresistible arm and the irreversible counsel and decree of God against them; they shall see that God is making Babylon a desolation, and therein is performing what he hath purposed; and then the mighty men of Babylon have forborne to fight, ver. 30. God having taken away their strength and spirit, so that they have remained in their holds not daring so much as to peep forth, the might both of their hearts and of their hands fails. They became as timorous as women, so that the enemy has, without any resistance, burnt her dwelling-places, and broken her bars. It is to the same purpose, ver. 56—58. When the spoiler comes upon Babylon, her mighty men, that should make head against him, are presently taken, their weapons of war fail them; "every one of their bows is broken," and stands them in no stead. Their politics fail them; they call councils of war, but their princes and captains that sit in council to concert measures for the common safety are made drunk; they are as men intoxicated through stupidity or despair; they can form no right notions of things, stagger, and are unsteady in their counsels and resolves, and dash one against another, and like drunken men fall out among themselves; and at length "sleep a perpetual sleep," and never awake from their wine, the wine of God's wrath, for it is to them an opiate that lays them into a fatal lethargy. The walls of their city fail them, ver. 58. When the enemy had found ways to ford Euphrates, which was thought impassable, yet sure, think they, the walls are impregnable; they are the broad walls of Babylon, or, as the margin reads it, the walls of broad Babylon. The compass of the city within the walls was 385 furlongs, some say 408, that is about sixty miles; the walls were 200 cubits high, and fifty cubits broad, so that two chariots might easily pass by one another upon them. Some say there was a threefold wall about the inner city, and the like about the outer; and the stones of the wall being laid in pitch instead of mortar, Gen. xi. 3, were scarce separable. And yet they shall be utterly broken, and the high gates and towers shall be burnt, and the people that are employed in defence of the city shall labour in vain, in the fire; they shall quite tire themselves, but shall do no good.

Eighthly. The destruction that shall be made of Babylon by these invaders.

1. It is a certain destruction. The doom is past, and it cannot be reversed; a Divine power is engaged against it, which cannot be resisted; ver. 8, "Babylon is fallen and destroyed," is as sure to fall, to fall into destruction, as if it were fallen and destroyed already; though when Jeremiah prophesied this, and many a year after, it was in the height of its power and greatness. God declares, God appears against Babylon; ver. 25, "Behold, I am against thee," and those cannot stand long whom God is against; he will stretch out his hand upon it, a hand which no creature can bear the weight of, or withstand the force of. It is his purpose, which shall be performed, that Babylon must be a desolation, ver. 29.

2. It is a righteous destruction. Babylon has made herself meet for it, and therefore cannot fail to meet with it; for, ver. 25, Babylon has been a destroying mountain, very lofty and bulky as a mountain, and destroying all the earth, as the stones that are tumbled from high mountains spoil the grounds about them. But now it shall itself be rolled down from its rocks, which were as the foundations on which it stood; it shall be levelled, its pomp and power broken. It is now a burning mountain, like Etna and the other volcanos, that throw out fire, to the terror of all about them. But it shall be a burnt mountain; it shall at length have consumed itself, and shall remain a heap of ashes; so will this world be at the end of time. Again; ver. 33, "Babylon is like a threshing-floor," in which the people of God have been long threshed, as sheaves in the floor. But now the time is come that she shall herself be threshed, and her sheaves in her. Her princes and great men, and all her inhabitants, shall be beaten in their own land, as in the threshing-floor. The threshing-floor is prepared, Babylon is by sin made meet to be a seat of war, and her people, like corn at harvest, are ripe for destruction, Rev. xiv. 16; Mic. iv. 12.

3. It is an unavoidable destruction. Babylon seems to be well fenced and fortified against it; "She dwells upon many waters," ver. 13. The situation of her country is such as that it seems inaccessible, it is so surrounded, and the march of an enemy into it so embarrassed by rivers. In allusion to this, the New Testament Babylon is said to sit upon many waters, that is, to rule over many nations, as the other Babylon did, Rev. xvii. 15. Babylon is abundant in treasures, and yet "thine end is come," and neither thy waters nor thy wealth shall secure thee. This end that comes shall be "the measure of thy covetousness," that is, it shall be the stint of thy gettings; it shall set bounds to thine ambition and avarice, which otherwise had been boundless. God, by the destruction of Babylon, said to its proud waves, "Hitherto shall ye come, and no farther." Note, If men will not set a measure to their covetousness by wisdom and grace, God will set a measure to it by his judgments. Babylon, thinking herself very safe, and very great, was very proud; but she will be deceived, ver. 53. Though Babylon should mount her walls and palaces up to heaven, and though (because what is high is apt to totter) she should take care to "fortify the height of her strength," yet all will not do, God will send spoilers against her, that shall break through her strength, and bring down her height.

4. It is a gradual destruction, which, if they had pleased, they might have foreseen, and had warning of; for, ver. 46, a rumour will come one year, that Cyrus is making vast preparations for war, and after that, in another year, shall come a rumour, that his design is upon Babylon, and he is steering his course that way; so that when he was a great way off they might have sent and desired conditions of peace; but they were too proud, too secure, to do that, and their hearts were hardened to their destruction.

5. Yet when it comes it is a surprising destruction. Babylon is suddenly fallen, ver. 15; the destruction comes upon them when they did not think of it, and is perfected in a little time, as that of the New Testament Babylon in one hour, Rev. xviii. 17. The king of Babylon, who should have been observing the approaches of the enemy, was himself at such a distance from the place where the attack was made, that it was a great while ere he had notice that the city was taken, so that they who were posted near the place sent one messenger, one courier, after another with advice of it, ver. 31. The foot-posts shall meet at the court from several quarters with this intelligence to the king of Babylon, that his city is taken at one end, and there is nothing to obstruct the progress of the conquerors, but they will be at the other end quickly. They are to tell him that the enemy hath seized the passes, ver. 32, the forts, or blockades upon the river; and, having got over the river, they set fire to the reeds, on the river side, to alarm and terrify the city, so that all the men of war are affrighted and have thrown down their arms, and surrendered at discretion. The messengers come like Job's, one upon the heels of another, with these tidings, which are immediately confirmed with a witness, by the enemies being in the palace, and slaying the king himself, Dan. v. 30. And that profane feast which they were celebrating at the very time when the city was taken, which was both an evidence of their strange security and a great advantage to the enemy, seems here to be referred to; ver. 38, 39, "They shall roar together like lions," as men in their revels use to do, when the wine is got into their heads. They call it singing, but in Scripture language, and in the language of sober men, it is called yelling like lions' whelps. It is likely they were drinking confusion to Cyrus and his army, with loud huzzas. Well, saith God, in their heat, when they are inflamed (Isa. v. 11) and their heads are hot with hard drinking, I will make their feasts, I will give them their potion; they have passed their cup li. 27. Ararat, Minni, and Ashchenaz are regarded by most as names for provinces in or near Armenia, the allies of Cyrus. The Syriac version puts Armenia for Minni, and Sir H. Rawlinson thinks Minni was the original name of the country. Ashchenaz is very obscure, but it may signify the region called Sacassene in Armenia. The "caterpillars" here again should doubtless be locusts.

li. 31. This indicates the extent of Babylon. Herodotus and Aristotle both say it was days before the whole city knew of the capture.

li. 32. We understand this to mean that the avenues to the city were in the hands of the enemy, that the reed-beds in the neighbouring marshes—an important means of defence—had been set on fire, and that fear and dismay had fallen upon the soldiers.

li. 34. The so-called "dragon" here is not a jackal, as often, but a sea-monster—the leviathan, or the crocodile.

li. 36. The Hebrew word translated "sea" denotes any large body of water, and may therefore mean a river, as here the Euphrates.

round, now "the cup of the ...rs right hand shall be turned unto them," Hab. ii. 15, 16; a cup of fury, which shall make them drunk, that they may rejoice, or rather that they may revel it, and sleep a perpetual sleep. Let them be as merry as they can with that bitter cup, but it shall lay them to sleep never to wake more, as ver. 57; for on that night, in the midst of the jollity, was Belshazzar slain.

6. It is to be a universal destruction. God will make thorough work of it; for, as he will perform what he hath purposed, so he will perfect what he has begun. The slain shall fall in great abundance throughout the land of the Chaldeans; multitudes shall be "thrust through in her streets," ver. 4. They are brought "down like lambs to the slaughter," ver. 40, in such great numbers, so easily, and the enemies make no more of killing them than the butcher doth of killing lambs. The strength of the enemy, and their invading of them, is here compared to an irruption and inundation of waters; ver. 42, "The sea is come up upon Babylon," which, when it has once broke through its bounds, there is no fence against, so that she is covered with the multitude of its waves, —overpowered by a numerous army. Her cities then become a desolation, an uninhabited, uncultivated desert, ver. 43.

7. It is a destruction that shall reach the gods of Babylon, the idols and images, and fall with a particular weight upon them. In token that the whole land shall be confounded, and all her slain shall fall, and that throughout all the country the wounded shall groan, "I will do judgment upon her graven images," ver. 47; and again, ver. 52. All must needs perish, if their gods perish from whom they expect protection. Though the invaders are themselves idolaters, yet they shall destroy the images and temples of the gods of Babylon, as an earnest of the abolishing of all counterfeit deities. Bel was the principal idol that the Babylonians worshipped, and therefore that is by name here marked for destruction; ver. 44, "I will punish Bel," that great devourer, that image to which such abundance of sacrifices are offered, and such rich spoils dedicated, and to whose temple there is such vast resort, he shall disgorge what he has so greedily regaled himself with; God will bring forth out of his temple all the wealth laid up there, Job xx. 15. His altars shall be forsaken, none shall regard him any more, and so that idol, which was thought to be a wall to Babylon, shall fall, and fail them.

8. It shall be a final destruction. You may "take balm for her pain," but in vain; she that would not be healed by the word of God shall not be healed by his providence, ver. 8, 9. Babylon shall become heaps, ver. 37; and, to complete its infamy, no use shall be made even of the ruins of Babylon, so execrable shall they be, and attended with ill omens; ver. 26, "They shall not take of thee a stone for a corner, nor a stone for foundations." People shall not care for having any thing to do with Babylon, or whatever belonged to it. Or it notes, that there shall be nothing left in Babylon on which to ground any hopes or attempts of raising it into a kingdom again; for, as it follows here, it shall be desolate for ever. St. Jerome saith, that in his time, though the ruins of Babylon's wall were to be seen, yet the ground inclosed by them was a forest of wild beasts.

Ninthly. Here is a call to God's people to go out of Babylon. It is their wisdom when the ruin is approaching to quit the city, and retire into the country; ver. 6, "Flee out of the midst of Babylon," and get into some remote corner, that you may save your lives, and may not be cut off in her iniquity. When God's judgments are abroad it is good to get as far as we can from those against whom they are levelled, as Israel from the tents of Korah. This agrees with the advice Christ gave his disciples, with reference to the destruction of Jerusalem: "Let them which be in Judæa flee to the mountains," Mat. xxiv. 16. It is their wisdom to get out of the midst of Babylon, lest they be involved, if not in her ruins, yet in her fears; ver. 45, 46, "Lest your heart faint, and ye fear for the rumour that shall be heard in the land." Though God told them that Cyrus should be their deliverer, and Babylon's destruction their deliverance, yet they had been told also that in the peace thereof they should have peace, and therefore the alarms given to Babylon would put them into a fright, and perhaps they might not have faith and consideration enough to suppress those fears, for which reason they are here advised to get out of the hearing of the alarms. Note, Those who have not grace enough to keep their temper in temptation should have wisdom enough to keep out of the way of temptation. But this is not all: it is not only their wisdom to quit the city when the ruin is approaching, but it is their duty to quit the country too when the ruin is accomplished, and they are set at liberty by the pulling down of the prison over their heads. This they are told, ver. 50, 51: Ye Israelites that have escaped the sword of the Chaldeans your oppressors, and of the Persians their destroyers, now the year of release is come, "go away, stand not still," hasten to your own country again, however you may be comfortably seated in Babylon; for this is not your rest, but Canaan is.

1. He puts them in mind of the inducements they had to return. "Remember the Lord afar off," his presence with you now, though you are here afar off from your native soil; his presence with your fathers formerly in the temple, though you are now afar off from the ruins of it. Note, Wherever we are, in the greatest depths, at the greatest distances, we may and must remember the Lord our God; and in the time of the greatest fears and hopes it is seasonable to remember the Lord. And "let Jerusalem come into your mind;" though it be now in ruins, yet favour its dust, Ps. cii. 14; though few of you ever saw it, yet believe the report you have had concerning it from those that wept when they remembered Zion; and think of Jerusalem until you come to a resolution to make the best of your way thither. Note, When the city of our solemnities is out of sight, yet it must not be out of mind; and it will be of great use to us, in our journey through this world, to let the heavenly Jerusalem come often into our mind.

2. He takes notice of the discouragement which the returning captives labour under, ver. 51. Being minded of Jerusalem, they cry out, "We are confounded," we cannot bear the thought of it, shame covers our faces at the mention of it, for we have heard of the reproach of the sanctuary, that it is profaned and ruined by strangers; how can we think of it with any pleasure? To which he answers, ver. 52, that the God of Israel will now triumph over the gods of Babylon, and so that reproach will be for ever rolled away. Note, The believing prospect of Jerusalem's recovery will keep us from being ashamed of Jerusalem's ruins.

Tenthly. Here is the different resentment of Babylon's fall, and it is the same we have of the New Testament Babylon, Rev. xviii. 9, 19. 1. Some shall lament the destruction of Babylon. There is the "sound of a cry," a great outcry coming from Babylon, ver. 54, lamenting this great destruction, the voice of mourning, because the Lord hath destroyed the voice of the multitude, that great voice of mirth which used to be heard in Babylon, ver. 55. We are told what they shall say in their lamentation, ver. 41. "How is Sheshach taken!" and how are we mistaken concerning her! How is that city surprised and become an astonishment among the nations, that was the praise, and glory, and admiration of the whole earth! See how that may fall into a general contempt which has been universally cried up. 2. Yet some shall rejoice in Babylon's fall, not as it is the misery of their fellow creatures, but as it is the manifestation of the righteous judgments of God, and as it opens the way for the release of God's captives; upon these accounts the heaven and earth, and all that is in both, "shall sing for Babylon," ver. 48; the church in heaven, and the church on earth, shall give to God the glory of his righteousness, and take notice of it with thankfulness to his praise. Babylon's ruin is Zion's praise.

59 The word which Jeremiah the prophet commanded Seraiah the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, when he went with Zedekiah the king of Judah into Babylon in the fourth year of his reign. And this Seraiah was a quiet prince. 60 So Jeremiah wrote in a book all the evil that should come upon Babylon, even all these words that are written against Babylon. 61 And Jeremiah said to Seraiah, When thou comest to Babylon, and shalt see, and shalt read all these words; 62 Then shalt thou say, O LORD, thou hast spoken against this place, to cut it off, that none shall remain in it, neither man nor beast, but that it shall be desolate for ever. 63 And it shall be, when thou hast made an end of reading this book, that thou shalt bind a stone to it, and cast it into the midst of Euphrates: 64 And thou shalt say, Thus shall Babylon sink, and shall not rise from the evil that I will bring upon her: and they shall be weary. Thus far are the words of Jeremiah.

We have been long attending the judgment of Babylon in this and the foregoing chapter, now here we have the conclusion of the whole matter.

1. A copy is taken of this prophecy, it should seem by Jeremiah himself, for Baruch his scribe is not mentioned here; ver. 60, Jeremiah wrote in a book all these words that are here written against Babylon. He received this notice that he might give it to all whom it might concern. It is of great advantage both to the propagating and to the perpetuating of the word of God to have it written, and to have copies taken of the law, prophets, and epistles.

2. It is sent to Babylon, to the captives there, by the hand of Seraiah, who went thither attendant on, or ambassador for, king Zedekiah, in the fourth year of his reign; ver. 59, He went with Zedekiah, or, as the margin reads it, on the behalf of Zedekiah, into Babylon. The character given of him is observable, that this Seraiah was a quiet prince, a prince of rest; he was in honour and power, but not as most of the princes then were, hot and heady, making parties and heading factions, and driving things furiously, but was of a calm temper, studied the things that made for peace, endeavoured to preserve a good understanding between the king his master and the king of Babylon, and to keep his master from rebelling. He was no persecutor of God's prophets, but a moderate man. Zedekiah was happy in the choice of such a man to be his envoy to the king of Babylon, and Jeremiah might safely intrust such a man with his errand too. Note, It is the real honour of great men to be quiet men; it is the wisdom of princes to put such men into places of trust.

3. Seraiah is desired to read it to his countrymen that were already gone into captivity. When thou shalt come to Babylon, and shalt see what a magnificent place it is, how large a city, how strong, how rich, and how well fortified, and shalt therefore be tempted to think, Sure it will stand for ever, as the disciples, when they observed the buildings of the temple, concluded nothing would throw them down but the end of the world, Mat. xxiv. 23, then thou shalt read all these words, to thyself, and thy particular friends, for their encouragement in their captivity; let them with an eye of faith see to the end of these threatening powers, and comfort themselves and one another herewith.

4. He is directed to make a solemn protestation of the Divine authority and unquestionable certainty of that which he had read; ver. 62, Then shalt thou look up to God and say, O Lord, it is thou that hast spoken against this place to cut it off. This is like the angel's protestation (Rev. xix. 9) concerning the destruction of the New Testament Babylon: "These are the true sayings of God." And, Rev. xxi. 6, "These words are true and faithful." Though Seraiah sees Babylon flourishing, having read this prophecy, he must foresee Babylon falling; and by virtue of it must curse its habitation, though it be taking root, Job v. 3. "O Lord, thou hast spoken against this place," and I believe what thou hast spoken, that as thou knowest every thing, so thou canst do every thing. Thou hast passed sentence upon Babylon, and it shall be executed. Thou hast spoken against this place to cut it off, and therefore we will neither envy its pomp nor fear its power. When we see what this world is, how glittering its shows are, and how flattering its proposals, let us read in the book of the Lord that its fashion passeth away, and it shall shortly be cut off, and be desolate for ever, and we shall learn to look upon it with a holy contempt. Observe here, When we have been reading the word of God, it becomes us to direct to him, whose word it is, an humble believing acknowledgment of the truth, equity, and goodness of what we have read.

5. He must then tie a stone to the book, and throw it into the midst of the river Euphrates, as a confirming sign of the things contained in it, saying, "Thus shall Babylon sink, and not rise, for they shall be weary;" they shall perfectly succumb, as men tired with a burthen, under the load of the evil that I will bring upon them, which they shall never shake off, or get from under, ver. 63, 64. In the sign, it was the stone that sank the book, which otherwise would have swam, but in the thing signified, it was rather the book that sank the stone; it was the Divine sentence passed upon Babylon in this prophecy that sank that city, which seemed as firm as a stone. The fall of the New Testament Babylon is represented by something like this, but much more magnificent; Rev. xviii. 21, A mighty angel cast a great millstone into the sea, saying, Thus shall Babylon fall. Those that sink under the weight of God's wrath and curse sink irrecoverably. The last words of the chapter seal up the vision and prophecy of this book, "Thus far are the words of Jeremiah;" not that this prophecy against Babylon was the last of his prophecies, for it was dated in the fourth year of Zedekiah, ver. 59, long before he finished his testimony, but this is recorded last of his prophecies, because it was to be the last accomplished of all his prophecies against the Gentiles, ch. xlvi. 1; and the chapter which remains is purely historical, and, as some think was added by some other hand.

li. 37. The "dragons" here should be jackals. The Hebrew word is not the same as that rendered "dragon" in verse 34.

li. 41. See the notes on chapter xxv. 26 and on verse 1 of this chapter, for the mode of interpreting Sheshach as Babylon or Babel.

li. 44. What was called the temple of Bel in Babylon is said to have been an immense structure, portions of which may still remain. The wall of Babylon is celebrated by various ancient writers as one of the most wonderful erections in existence.

li. 58. "The broad walls of Babylon" is an appropriate phrase, for it is said by Diodorus Siculus that six chariots could be driven abreast upon them, while Herodotus declares they were 87 feet broad. There is still at Khorsabad a ruined wall 48 feet 9 inches thick, so at least M. Botta states, and that not the wall of a city, but one which enclosed a royalpalace of the Assyrians. We are told that the walls of Babylon were sixty miles in circumference, and 350 feet high, and that they formed a square, with twenty-five gates in each side.

CHAPTER LII.

History is the best expositor of prophecy; and therefore, for the better understanding of the prophecies of this book, which relate to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the kingdom of Judah, we are here furnished with an account of that sad event. It is much the same with the history we had, 2 Kin. xxiv. and xxv., and many of the particulars we had before in that book; but the matter is here repeated and put together to give light to the book of the Lamentations, which follows next, and to serve as a key to it. That article in the close concerning the advancement of Jehoiachin in his captivity, which happened after Jeremiah's time, gives colour to their conjecture who suppose that this chapter was not written by Jeremiah himself, but by some men Divinely inspired among those in captivity, for a constant memorandum to those who in Babylon preferred Jerusalem above their chief joy. In this chapter we have, I. The ill reign of Zedekiah, very ill in regard both of sin and punishment, ver. 1—3. II. The besieging and taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, ver. 4—7. III. The severe usage which Zedekiah and the princes met with, ver. 8—11. IV. The destruction of the temple and the city, ver. 12—14. V. The captivity of the people, ver. 15, 16; and the numbers of those that were carried away into captivity, ver. 28—30. VI. The carrying off of the plunder of the temple, ver. 17—23. VII. The slaughter of the priests, and some other great men in cold blood, ver. 24—27. VIII. The better days which king Jehoiachin lived to see in the latter end of his time, after the death of Nebuchadnezzar, ver. 31—34.

ZEDEKIAH was one and twenty years old when he began to reign, and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Hamutal the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah. 2 And he did that which was evil in the eyes of the LORD, according to all that Jehoiakim had done. 3 For through the anger of the LORD it came to pass in Jerusalem and Judah, till he had cast them out from his presence, that Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon. 4 And it came to pass in the ninth year of his reign, in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, that Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon came, he and all his army, against Jerusalem, and pitched against it, and built forts against it round about. 5 So the city was besieged unto the eleventh year of king Zedekiah. 6 And in the fourth month, in the ninth day of the month, the famine was sore in the city, so that there was no bread for the people of the land. 7 Then the city was broken up, and all the men of war fled, and went forth out of the city by night by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's garden; (now the Chaldeans were by the city round about:) and they went by the way of the plain. 8 But the army of the Chaldeans pursued after the king, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho; and all his army were scattered from him. 9 Then they took the king, and carried him up unto the king of Babylon to Riblah in the land of Hamath; where he gave judgment upon him. 10 And the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes: he slew also all the princes of Judah in Riblah. 11 Then he put out the eyes of Zedekiah; and the king of Babylon bound him in chains, and carried him to Babylon, and put him in prison till the day of his death.

This narrative begins no higher than the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, though there were two captivities before, one in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, the other in the first of Jeconiah; but probably it was drawn up by some of those that were carried away with Zedekiah, as a reproach to themselves for imagining that they should not go into captivity after their brethren, with which hopes they had long flattered themselves. We have here,

First. God's just displeasure against Judah and Jerusalem for their sin, ver. 3. His anger was against them to that degree that he determined to cast them out from his presence, his favourable, gracious presence, as a father when he is extremely angry with an undutiful son, bids him get out of his presence. He expelled them from that good land that had such tokens of his presence in providential bounty, and that holy city and temple that had such tokens of his presence in covenant grace and love. Note, Those that are banished from God's ordinances have reason to complain that they are in some degree cast out of his presence; yet none are cast out from God's gracious presence but those that by sin have first thrown themselves out of it. This fruit of sin we should therefore deprecate above any thing, as David, Ps. li. 11, "Cast me not away from thy presence."

Secondly. Zedekiah's ill conduct and management, to which God left him in displeasure against the people, and for which God punished him in displeasure against him. Zedekiah was arrived to years of discretion; when he came to the throne he was twenty-one years old, ver. 1. He was none of the worst of the kings; we never read of his idolatries, yet his character is, that he "did evil in the eyes of the Lord," for he did not do the good he should have done. But that ill deed of his which did in a special manner hasten this destruction was his rebelling against the king of Babylon, which was both his sin and his folly, and brought ruin upon his people, not only meritoriously, but efficiently. God was greatly displeased with him for his perfidious dealing with the king of Babylon, as we find, Eze. xvii. 15, &c.; and, because he was angry at Judah and Jerusalem, he put him into the hand of his own counsels to do that foolish thing which proved fatal to him and to his kingdom.

Thirdly. The possession which the Chaldeans at length gained of Jerusalem after eighteen months' siege. They sat down before it and blocked it up in the ninth year of Zedekiah's reign, in the tenth month, ver. 4, and made themselves masters of it in the eleventh year, in the fourth month, ver. 6. In remembrance of these two steps toward their ruin, while they were in captivity, they kept a fast in the fourth month, and a fast in the tenth, Zec. viii. 19. That in the fifth month was in remembrance of the burning of the temple, and that in the seventh of the murder of Gedaliah. We may easily imagine, or rather cannot imagine, what a sad time it was with Jerusalem, during this year and half that it was besieged, when all provisions were cut off from coming to them, and they were ever and anon alarmed by the attacks of the enemy; and being obstinately resolved to hold out to the last extremity, nothing remained but a certain fearful looking for of judgment. That which disabled them to hold out, and yet could not prevail with them to capitulate, was the famine in the city; ver. 6, "there was no bread for the people of the land," so that the soldiers could not make good their posts, but were rendered wholly unserviceable. And then no wonder that the city was broken up, ver. 7. Walls in such a case will not hold out long without men, no more than men without walls; nor will both together stand people in any stead without God and his protection.

Fourthly. The inglorious retreat of the king and his mighty men. They got out of the city by night, ver. 7, and made the best of their way, I know not whither, nor perhaps they themselves. But the king was overtaken by the pursuers in the plains of Jericho, and his guards dispersed, and all his army scattered from him, ver. 8. His fright was not causeless, for where there is guilt there will be fear in time of danger. But his flight was fruitless, for there is no escaping the judgments of God; they will come upon the sinner, and will overtake him, let him flee where he will, Deu. xxviii. 15; and these judgments particularly that are here executed were there threatened, ver. 52, 53, &c.

Fifthly. The sad doom passed upon Zedekiah by the king of Babylon, and immediately put in execution. He treated him as a rebel, "gave judgment upon him," ver. 9. One cannot think of it without the utmost vexation and regret, that a king, a king of Judah, a king of the house of David, should be arraigned as a criminal at the bar of this heathen king. But he "humbled not himself before Jeremiah the prophet," therefore God thus humbled him. Pursuant to the sentence passed upon him by the haughty conqueror, his sons were slain before his eyes, and all the princes of Judah, ver. 10; then his eyes were put out, and he was bound in chains, carried in triumph to Babylon. Perhaps they made sport with him, as they did with Samson, when his eyes were put out; however, he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, wearing out the remainder of his life (I cannot say his days, for he saw day no more,) in darkness and misery; he was kept in prison until the day of his death, but had some honour done him at his funeral, ch. xxxiv. 5. Jeremiah had often told him what it would come to, but he would not take warning when he might have prevented it.

12 Now in the fifth month, in the tenth day of the month, which was the nineteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, came Nebuzar-adan, captain of the guard, which served the king of Babylon, into Jerusalem, 13 And burned the house of the LORD, and the king's house; and all the houses of Jerusalem, and all the houses of the great men, burned he with fire: 14 And all the army of the Chaldeans, that were with the captain of the guard, brake down all the walls of Jerusalem round about. 15 Then Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carried away captive certain of the poor of the people, and the residue of the people that remained in the city, and those that fell away, that fell to the king of Babylon, and the rest of the multitude. 16 But Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard left certain of the poor of the land for vinedressers and for husbandmen. 17 Also the pillars of brass that were in the house of the LORD, and the bases, and the brasen sea that was in the house of the LORD, the Chaldeans brake, and carried all the brass of them to Babylon. 18 The caldrons also, and the shovels, and the snuffers, and the bowls, and the spoons, and all the vessels of brass wherewith they ministered, took they away. 19 And the basons, and the fire-

The outer walls were taken down by order of Cyrus; and the other walls were lowered to the height of fifteen cubits by command of Darius. The story is that Queen Semiramis employed two millions of men in constructing the works. Whatever allowance we may have to make for the exaggeration of ancient writers, these walls and gates must have been enormous.

li. 59. It has been observed that Zedekiah did not go to Babylon until the eleventh year of his reign, while the ordinary version here refers that event to the fourth year of his reign. By some the explanation shown in the margin of our Bible is adopted, viz., that in the fourth year of Zedekiah, Seraiah went to Babylon on behalf of the king. The Syriac version has "eleventh" for "fourth," a reading which would remove all difficulty if it could be established. The Greek and Chaldee versions both understand that Seraiah was sent from Zedekiah, i.e., by him as an ambassador. This view may be justified by other texts, where the word for "with" must be pans, and the bowls, and the caldrons, and the candlesticks, and the spoons, and the cups; that which was of gold in gold, and that which was of silver in silver, took the captain of the guard away. 20 The two pillars, one sea, and twelve brasen bulls that were under the bases, which king Solomon had made in the house of the LORD: the brass of all these vessels was without weight. 21 And concerning the pillars, the height of one pillar was eighteen cubits; and a fillet of twelve cubits did compass it; and the thickness thereof was four fingers: it was hollow. 22 And a chapiter of brass was upon it; and the height of one chapiter was five cubits, with network and pomegranates upon the chapiters round about, all of brass. The second pillar also and the pomegranates were like unto these. 23 And there were ninety and six pomegranates on a side; and all the pomegranates upon the network were an hundred round about.

We have here an account of the woful havoc that was made by the Chaldean army, a month after the city was taken, under the command of Nebuzar-adan, who was "captain of the guard," or general of the army in this action. In the margin he is called the 'chief of the slaughtermen,' or executioners; for soldiers are but slaughtermen, and God employs them as executioners of his sentence against a sinful people. Nebuzar-adan was chief of those soldiers; but in the execution he did we have reason to fear he had no eye to God, but he served the king of Babylon and his own designs. Now he came into Jerusalem, into the very bowels of it, as captain of the slaughtermen there. And, 1. He laid the temple in ashes, having first plundered it of every thing that was valuable; he "burnt the house of the Lord," that holy and beautiful house, where their fathers praised him, Isa. lxiv. 10. 2. He burnt the royal palace, probably that which Solomon built, after he had built the temple, which was ever since the king's house. 3. He burnt "all the houses of Jerusalem," that is, all the houses of the great men, or, those particularly; if any escaped, it was only some sorry cottages, for the poor of the land. 4. "He brake down all the walls of Jerusalem," to be revenged upon them for standing in the way of his army so long; thus of a defenced city was made a ruin, Isa. xxv. 2. 5. He carried away many into captivity, ver. 15. He took away "certain of the poor of the people," that is, of the people in the city; for the poor of the land, that is, the poor of the country, he left for vinedressers and husbandmen. He also carried off "the residue of the people that remained in the city," that had escaped the sword and famine; and the deserters, such as he thought fit, or rather such as God thought fit, for he had already determined some for the pestilence, some for the sword, some for the famine, and some for captivity, ch. xv. 2.

But nothing is more particularly and largely related here, than the carrying away of the appurtenances of the temple. All that were of great value were carried away before, the vessels of silver and gold; yet some of that sort remained, which were now carried away, ver. 19. But most of the temple prey that was now seized was of brass, which, being of less value, was carried off last. When the gold was gone, the brass soon went after, because the people repented not, according to Jeremiah's prediction, ch. xxvii. 19, &c. When the walls of the city were demolished, the pillars of the temple were pulled down too, and both in token that God, who was the strength and stay both of their civil and their ecclesiastical government, was departed from them. No walls can protect those, nor pillars sustain those from whom God withdraws. These pillars of the temple were not for support, (for there was nothing built upon them,) but for ornament and significancy. They were called Jachin, 'he will establish;' and Boaz, 'in him is strength;' so that the breaking of these signified that God would no longer establish his house, nor be the strength of it. These pillars are here very particularly described, ver. 21—23, from 1 Kin. vii. 15, that the extraordinary beauty and stateliness of them may affect us the more with the demolishing of them. All the vessels that belonged to the brazen altar were carried away; for the iniquity of Jerusalem, like that of Eli's house, was not to be purged by sacrifice or offering, 1 Sam. iii. 14. It is said, ver. 20, "The brass of all these vessels was without weight;" so it was in the making of them, 1 Kin. vii. 47; the weight of the brass was not then found out, 2 Chr. iv. 18. And so it was in the destroying of them; those that made spoil of them did not stand to weigh them as purchasers do, for, whatever they weighed, it was all their own.

24 And the captain of the guard took Seraiah the chief priest, and Zephaniah the second priest, and the three keepers of the door: 25 He took also out of the city an eunuch, which had the charge of the men of war; and seven men of them that were near the king's person, which were found in the city; and the principal scribe of the host, who mustered the people of the land; and threescore men of the people of the land, that were found in the midst of the city. 26 So Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard took them, and brought them to the king of Babylon to Riblah. 27 And the king of Babylon smote them, and put them to death in Riblah in the land of Hamath. Thus Judah was carried away captive out of his own land. 28 This is the people whom Nebuchadrezzar carried away captive: in the seventh year three thousand Jews and three and twenty: 29 In the eighteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar he carried away captive from Jerusalem eight hundred thirty and two persons: 30 In the three and twentieth year of Nebuchadrezzar Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carried away captive of the Jews seven hundred forty and five persons: all the persons were four thousand and six hundred.

We have here a very melancholy account,

First. Of the slaughter of some great men in cold blood at Riblah, seventy-two in number, according to the number of the elders of Israel, Num. xi. 26, 27, so they are computed, 2 Kin. xxv. 18, 19, five out of the temple, two out of the city, five out of the court, and sixty out of the country. The account here agrees with that, except in one article: there it is said there were five, here there were seven, of those that were near the king; which Dr. Lightfoot reconciles thus, that he took away seven of those that were near the king, but two of them were Jeremiah himself and Ebed-melech, but they were both discharged, as we have read before; so that there were only five of them put to death, and so the number was reduced to seventy-two; some of all ranks, for they had all corrupted their way. And it is probable such were made examples of as had been most forward to excite and promote the rebellion against the king of Babylon. Seraiah the chief priest is put first, whose sacred character could not exempt him from this stroke; how should it, when he himself had profaned it by sin? Seraiah the prince was a quiet prince, ch. li. 59, but perhaps Seraiah the priest was not so, but unquiet and turbulent, by which he had made himself obnoxious to the king of Babylon. The leaders of this people had caused them to err, and now they are in a particular manner made monuments of Divine justice.

Secondly. Of the captivity of the rest. Come and see how "Judah was carried away captive out of his own land;" ver. 27, and how it spewed them out, as it spewed out the Canaanites that went before them, which God had told them it would certainly do, if they trod in their steps, and copied out their abominations, Lev. xviii. 28. Now here is an account,

1. Of two captivities, which we had an account of before, one in the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar, the same with that which is said to be in his eighth year, 2 Kin. xxiv. 12, another in his eighteenth year, the same with that which is said, ver. 12, to be in his nineteenth year. But the sums here are very small, in comparison with what we find expressed concerning the former, 2 Kin. xxiv. 14, 16, when there were eighteen thousand carried captive, whereas here they are said to be three thousand and twenty-three; and with what we may reasonably suppose concerning the latter: for when all the residue of the people were carried away, ver. 15, one would think there should be more than eight hundred and thirty-two souls. Therefore Dr. Lightfoot conjectures that, these accounts being joined to the story of the putting to death of the great men at Riblah, all that were here said to be carried away were put to death as rebels.

2. Of a third captivity not mentioned before, which was in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, four years after the destruction of Jerusalem, ver. 30. Then Nebuzar-adan came and carried away seven hundred and forty-five Jews. It is probable this was done in revenge of the murder of Gedaliah, which was another rebellion against the king of Babylon, and that these who were now taken were aiders and abetters of Ishmael in that murder, and were not only carried away, but put to death for it; yet this is uncertain. If this be the sum total of the captives which we have, ver. 30, "All the persons were four thousand and six hundred," we may see how strangely they were reduced from what they had been, and may wonder as much how they came to be so numerous again as afterwards we find them; for, it should seem that, as at first in Egypt, so again in Babylon, the Lord made them fruitful in the land of their affliction; and the more they were oppressed the more they multiplied. And the truth is, these people were often miracles both of judgment and mercy.

31 And it came to pass in the seven and thirtieth year of the captivity of Jehoiachin king of Judah, in the twelfth month, in the five and twentieth day of the month, that Evil-merodach king of Babylon in the first year of his reign lifted up the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah, and brought him forth out of prison, 32 And spake kindly unto him, and set his throne above the throne of the kings that were with him in Babylon, 33 And changed his prison garments: and he did continually eat bread before him all the days of his life. 34 And for his diet, there was a continual diet given him of the king of Babylon, every day a portion until the day of his death, all the days of his life.

This passage of story concerning the reviving which king Jehoiachin had in his bondage, we had likewise before, 2 Kin. xxv. 27—30, only there it is said to rendered "from with," "from," or "on behalf of." The words "Seraiah was a quiet prince" have often been understood to mean some office, but what that office was is much disputed.

li. 64. The words "and they shall be weary" seem superfluous, and repeated from verse 58. The Greek omits them, but the other ancient versions have them. The concluding words are also regarded as an addition, due to some early editor. They are omitted by the Greek.

lii. 1. It has been much doubted whether Jeremiah wrote this chapter, which to verse 27 is almost a repetition of 2 Kings xxiv. 18—xxv. 21. Verses 28 to 30 do not appear in 2 Kings xxv., where we have other statements instead. The four last verses are in 2 Kings xxv. 27—30. There are some differences of detail in the two accounts, but none of serious importance. Thus in verse 20 we read that the twelve brasen bulls were under the bases, whereas the bases were under them. We may render the words, "The two pillars, the one be done on the twenty-fifth day of the twelfth month, here on the twenty-seventh; but in a thing of this nature two days breaks no squares in the account. It is probable the orders were given for his release on the twenty-fifth day, but he was not presented to the king till the twenty-seventh. We may observe in this story,

First. That new lords make new laws. Nebuchadnezzar had long kept this unhappy prince in prison; and his son, though well affected to the prisoner, could not procure him any favour, nor one smile from his father, any more than Jonathan could for David from his father; but when the old peevish man was dead his son countenanced Jehoiachin, and made him a favourite. It is common for children to undo what their fathers have done; it were well if it were always as much for the better as this here.

Secondly. That the world we live in is a changing world. Jehoiachin in his beginning fell from a throne to a prison; but here he is advanced again to a throne of state, ver. 32, though not to a throne of power. As before the robes were changed into prison garments, so now they were converted into robes again. Such chequer-work is this world; prosperity and adversity are set the one over against the other, that we may learn to rejoice as though we rejoiced not, and weep as though we wept not.

Thirdly. That though the night of affliction be very long, yet we must not despair but that the day may dawn at last. Jehoiachin was thirty-seven years a prisoner, in confinement, in contempt, ever since he was eighteen years old; in which time we may suppose him so inured to captivity that he had forgotten the sweets of liberty; or, rather, that after so long an imprisonment it would be doubly welcome to him. Let those whose afflictions have been lengthened out encourage themselves with this instance; the vision will at the end speak comfortably, and therefore wait for it. Dum spiro spero,—'while there is life there is hope;' non si male nunc, et olim sic erit,—'though now we suffer, we shall not always suffer.'

Fourthly. That God can make his people to find favour in the eyes of those that are their oppressors, and unaccountably turn their hearts to pity them, according to that word; Ps. cvi. 46, "He made them to be pitied of all those that carried them captives." He can bring those that have spoken roughly to speak kindly, and those to feed his people that have fed upon them. Those, therefore, that are under oppression will find that it is not in vain to hope, and quietly to wait, for the salvation of the Lord. Therefore our times are in God's hand, because the hearts of all we deal with are so.

And now upon the whole matter, comparing the prophecy and the history of this book together, we may learn in general, 1. That it is no new thing for churches and persons highly dignified to degenerate and become very corrupt. 2. That iniquity tends to the ruin of those that harbour it; and if it be not repented of and forsaken, will certainly end in their ruin. 3. That external professions and privileges will not only not amount to an excuse for sin, and an exemption from ruin, but will be a very great aggravation of both. 4. That no word of God shall fall to the ground, but the event will fully answer the prediction; and the unbelief of man shall not make God's threatenings, any more than his promises, of none effect. The justice and truth of God are here written in bloody characters, for the conviction or the confusion of all those that make a jest of his threatenings. Let them not be deceived, God is not mocked.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES TO THE BOOK OF JEREMIAH.

CHAP. I.—4. The word of the Lord came. This seems to have been a visible appearance of the Divine majesty,—by the Son of God or the second person of the blessed Trinity, Gen. viii. 2; Jos. v. 13; Eze. i. 26; Dan. viii. 15, 18; x. 6, 10. —Lowth.

CHAP. II.—22. Nitre. See Supplementary Note on Pr. xxv. 20.

CHAP. III.—12. Mine anger to fall. 'I will not look down upon you with a lowering brow.' Literally, 'I will not let my countenance fall upon you.' So when Cain was wroth, it is said, that "his countenance fell," Gen. iv. 5. On the contrary, the lifting up of the countenance upon any person denotes favour and goodwill towards him, Num. vi. 26.—Blaney.

CHAP. IV.—17. As keepers of a field. Returning in the evening through the fields of melons, we disturbed 'the keepers of a field,' the same as those mentioned by the prophet. A rude shed made of four upright poles, that supported a covering of twined branches, protected from the weather an old decrepid Arab, who sat watching against any intrusion that might be made by man or beast upon his field.—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative. (See wood engraving, Job xxvii. 18.)

CHAP. VI.—6. Cast a mount, rendered in the margin, engine of shot, and probably resembling those spoken of 2 Kin. xxv. and 2 Chr. xxvi., (where see wood engravings,) as the balistæ and catapultæ of the Romans. 20. Sweet cane. The sweet cane, or calamus aromaticus, is a reed of a very fragrant smell, which, when dried and powdered, is mixed in the richest perfumes. 27. A tower—a fortress. 'I have appointed thee to make an essay among my people as to the gold thereof.'—Blayney. This agrees with the context, and he considers that the images of a tower and fortress are wrongly introduced by the translators.—Religious Tract Society's Bible. 28. Grievous revolters. 'They are all of them the dross of revolters, passing with a fraudulent currency. Brass and iron all of them; instruments of adulteration are they.'—Blayney.

CHAP. VII.—12. Shiloh—see what I did to it. The words of the prophet are still full of meaning. It was visited by Dr. Wilson in 1843, who describes it as a heap of ruins.—Lands of the Bible, vol. ii. 294. 18. Queen of heaven. See Supplementary Note on ch. xliv. 19.

CHAP. IX.—17. Mourning women Near sunset, we had the opportunity of witnessing the funeral of an old Jewess at Lemberg.—Arriving at a small portico or covered walk in the grave-yard, they set down the bier, and uncovered the face of the dead. All the relations gathered round, and bending over the corpse till their lips almost touched the lips of the deceased, entreated her to forgive them, if they had injured her in any way. After this they proceeded to the grave, and the body alone was lowered down into it with the face uncovered. Several of the women now joined in a loud and bitter wail, but their tears and lamentations were only feigned, for at one time they appeared very lugubrious, then, all of a sudden, they stopped and began to scold, or appeared utterly careless. They were specimens of "the mourning women" mentioned in the Scriptures: see Jer. ix. 17; Mat. xi. 17.—Bonar and M'Cheyne's Narrative.

CHAP. X.—9, 10. But the Lord is the true God. The contrast is very expressive and instructive between the most expensive and most richly ornamented dead images and "the living and true God, the everlasting King, or King of eternity; at whose wrath the earth doth tremble, and the nations shall not be able to abide his indignation." They (the idols) are 'indebted to the art and labour of man for all their costly ornaments, their splendid outward show. Upon what ground, then, could the thing formed pretend to a nature more excellent than its former!'—Blayney. Where, but in the Scriptures, do we meet with such sublime and rational thoughts concerning the great Creator and Lord of all? The very circumstance that the Bible, and the Bible alone, has established the doctrine of one God of infinite perfection, to the exclusion of all others, who have been or are called God, or have been or are worshipped, is a very convincing argument to a considerate mind, that it is the word of the one living and true God himself.—T. Scott.

CHAP. XIII.—22. Thy skirts discovered, and thy heels made bare. 'I have often been struck with the manner in which a great man sits; for example, when I visited the bashaw, I never saw his feet: they were entirely drawn up under him and covered by his dress. This was dignified. To see his feet his skirts must have been discovered: still more so in order to see the heels, which often serve as the actual seat of an oriental.'—Jowett's Christian Researches.

CHAP. XVI.—7. Neither shall men tear themselves. Commentators prefer the marginal reading, 'break bread for them,' which may refer to the practice of carrying provisions to the house of mourning, probably because the survivors might neglect to prepare food for themselves: see Job xlii. 11; Eze. xxiv. 17. The cup of consolation. Sir J. Chardin says, the custom is still preserved among the oriental Christians, who drink the health of the survivors.—Domestic Bible, by the Rev. Ingram Cobbin. (See wood engraving.) 19, 21. The Gentiles. The prophet, hearing intimations of mercy, addressed the Lord as his Strength, and Fortress, and Refuge. He had revealed to his other prophets, and to him, that he would assuredly call the Gentiles from all the ends of the earth; when they would renounce the idolatry of their fathers, as unprofitable lies and vanity, to worship the God of Israel. The fact now undeniable, that the Gentiles, through so large a part of the world, have actually renounced their idols, to worship, in profession at least, the God of Israel, (that despised nation,) is most wonderful, when compared with the state of things at the time when Jeremiah wrote this remarkable prediction.—T. Scott.

CHAP. XVII.—13-27. O Lord, the hope of Israel—sabbath day. God is the hope of Israel, the hope of believers, and called in Rom. xv. 13, the "God of hope." The fountain of living waters is an expression peculiar to Jeremiah, who is fertile both in terms and sayings of most important significancy. The Lord was the object of his praise; but he was held in great discredit and disrepute by his countrymen. He pleads the matter with God: he had not hasted beyond the pace of a mere follower; he had not outrun God's message. It was not any desire of mine that these tidings of evil should take effect. Be not thou therefore a terror to me, as the offended Jews are. Be thou my refuge from them, and let them be confounded. He utters against them the maledictions of a prophet, but still even then they were not conclusively given over. They are bidden to observe the sabbath, or perhaps were bidden some time before, and with the encouragement of a promise would they but obey. But they did not, and the promise was made void by themselves, and thus they brought on their own destruction. What testimonies for the sabbath from both Isaiah and Jeremiah—and that by prophets who spake of the comparative worthlessness of rites!—Dr. Chalmers' posthumous work, Horæ Biblicæ.

CHAP. XXII.—20. From the passages; in the original, from Abarim. The sight of this mountain scene (a view from the summit of mount Olivet) reminded us of a passage in Jeremiah, the force of which is lost in our version, but which had peculiar meaning when uttered in Jerusalem. It is in reference to the death of Jehoiakim, the son of pious Josiah, and the desolation that followed, "Go up to Lebanon and cry; and lift up thy voice in Bashan, and cry from Abarim; for all thy lovers are destroyed." The cry of woe is first uttered from the heights of Lebanon, the northern boundary of the land; it is echoed back from Bashan the eastern range; and then it resounds from Abarim, the mountains of Moab, seen so distinctly from Jerusalem. In this way the tidings of distress are carried from Lebanon to Bashan, from Bashan to Abarim, and from the Abarim hills to the capital itself.—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative.

CHAP. XXIII.—8. They shall dwell in their own land. This and many passages in the prophecies of Jeremiah, Isaiah, Ezekiel, and in other parts of Scripture, have been considered by not a few authors as pointing out the national restoration of the Jews from their present dispersion to their own land. Mr. Scott, the commentator, thus summed up his own views on the subject, in his work on the Restoration of Israel. He says,—'It is now becoming more and more the opinion of serious Christians, that when Israel shall be converted to their long-rejected Messiah, they will be gathered from their dispersions, and reinstated in their own land; which being rendered as fertile as in times past, (perhaps much more so,) and extended to the utmost limits of the grants made to the patriarchs, will yield them in rich abundance all things needful and comfortable for this present life. It is also thought that they will live in this land under rulers of their own nation as the vicegerents of the sea, and the twelve brasen oxen which were underneath, and the bases which King Solomon had made," &c. The Greek version agrees with this explanation. The Syriac omits all that involves any difficulty.

lii. 28—30. Three removals are mentioned here; a first of 3,023 Jews, a second of 832 Jews of Jerusalem, and a third of 745 Jews, making a total of 4,600. These statements are not found in the Greek version, nor in 2 Kings xxv.; but in 2 Kings xxiv. 14 we find 10,000 instead of the 3,023 here. It seems, however, that in this place the fighting men are not included, and if we add them from 2 Kings xxiv. 16, we shall have 11,600, which is sufficiently near to the round number 10,000. As these are men, the addition of women and children will give a total of probably 50,000. Even this figure may not include all who were taken away from other parts of the country distant from Jerusalem.

lii. 31. A Jewish tradition ascribes the favour shown by Evil-Merodach towards Jehoiachin to a friendship which he had contracted Messiah, of David, or the Son of David, in entire peace and security, free from invader or oppressor, and from the fear of any; and that, along with all spiritual blessings in rich abundance, they will be voluntarily regarded by all other nations, then truly converted, with peculiar love, and gratitude, and honour, as the source of all their spiritual blessings, and especially as most nearly related to their common Messiah and Saviour, who is the light of the Gentiles, and the glory of his people Israel.'

'A general iden,' says the Rev. E. Bickersteth, in his Practical Guide to the Prophecies, 'of the expectations of many students of prophecy which have been entertained for a lengthened period, may be gathered from a collection of promises concerning the calling of the Jews and the glory which shall be in the latter days, taken from Powel's Concordance, published in 1673. It is referred to by Doddridge in his Lectures on Divinity.'

I. The Jews shall be gathered from all parts of the earth where they are now scattered, and brought into their own land.

For this see Isa. xi. 11; xxvii. 12, 13; xliii. 5, 6; xlix. 11, 12; lx. 4. Compare Jer. iii. 18; xvi. 14, 15; xxiii. 3; xxx. 10; xxxi. 7, 8, 10; xxxii. 37. So Hos. xi. 10, 11; Zeph. iii. 10; Zec. viii. 7, 8; x. 8, 9, 10.

II. They shall be carried by the Gentiles to their place, who shall join themselves with the Jews, and become the Lord's people.

Isa. xlix. 22; xiv. 2; lx. 9; lxvi. 18, 20; and ii. 2, 3, 4. Compare Jer. iii. 17; xvi. 19; Eze. xlvii. 22, 23; Mic. v. 3; Zec. ii. 11; viii. 20.

III. Great miracles shall be wrought when Israel is restored, as formerly when they were brought out of Egypt, viz.

1. Drying up the river Euphrates. Isa. xi. 15, 16; Zec. x. 11; Rev. xvi. 12; Hos. xi. 15; Mic. vii. 15.

2. Causing rivers to flow in desert places. Isa. xli. 17, 18, 19; xliii. 19, 20; xlviii. 20, 21.

3. Giving them prophets. Isa. lxvi. 18, 19, 20, 21; Hos. xii. 9, 10.

4. The Lord Christ himself shall appear at the head of them. Isa. xxxv. 8; lii. 12; lviii. 8; Hos. i. 10, 11; Mic. ii. 12, 13.

IV. The Jews, being restored, and converted to the faith of Christ, shall be formed into a state, and have judges and counsellors over them as formerly; the Lord Christ himself being their king, who shall then also be acknowledged King over all the earth.

Isa. i. 26; lx. 17. Compare Jer. xxiii. 4; xxx. 8, 9, 21; Hos. iii. 5; Eze. xxxiv. 23, 24; xxxvii. 24, 25; Isa. liv. 5; Oba. 21; Zec. xiv. 5, 9; Ps. xxii. 27, 28.

V. They shall have the victory over all their enemies, and all kings and nations of the earth shall submit unto them.

For which see Isa. xi. 13, 14; xiv. 1, 2; xli. 14, 15, 16; xlix. 23; lx. 12; xxv. 10, 11, 12; Joel iii. 7, 8, 19, 20; Oba. 17, 18; Mic. iv. 6, 7, 8, 11, 12, 13; v. 5, 6, 7; vii. 16, 17; Zec. ii. 13; ix. 13, 14, 15, 16; ix. 5, 6; xii. 6; Num. xxiv. 17; Isa. xlix. 23; lx. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16; lxvi. 19, 20.

VI. The Jews, restored, shall live peaceably, without being divided into two nations, or contending with one another any more.

Isa. xi. 13, 14; xiv. 1, 2; Jer. iii. 18; l. 4; Eze. xxxvii. 21, 22; Hos. i. 11.

1. They shall be very numerous, and multiply greatly. Isa. xxvii. 6; xliv. 3, 4; xlix. 18, 19, 20, 21; liv. 1, 2, 3; lxi. 9; Jer. xxiii. 3; xxx. 18, 19, 20; xxxi. 27; Eze. xxxiv. 11; xxxvi. 38, 39.

2. They shall have great peace, safety, and outward temporal prosperity. Isa. xxxii. 16, 17, 18; xxxiii. 24; liv. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17; lx. 18, 21; Jer. xxiii. 3, 4, 5, 6; xxx. 10; xxxii. 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40; xxxiii. 6, 7, 8, 9; l. 19, 20; Joel iii. 17, 18; Mic. vii. 18, 19, 20; Zeph. iii. 13; Zec. iii. 9, 10.

3. They shall be very glorious, and a blessing in the whole earth. Isa. xix. 24, 25; lxi. 9; Jer. xxxiii. 9; Ex. xxxiv. 26; Zeph. iii. 19; Zec. viii. 13.

VII. The land of Judæa shall be made eminently fruitful, like a paradise, or the garden of God.

Isa. xxix. 17; xxxv. 1, 2, 7, 9; li. 3, 16; liv. 11, 12, 13; lv. 12, 13; lx. 17; lxv. 17, 25; Eze. xxxiv. 26, 27; xxxvi. 36, 37; Joel iii. 18; Am. ix. 13, 14.

VIII. Jerusalem shall be rebuilt, and after the full restoration of the Jews shall never be destroyed, nor infested with enemies any more.

Isa. lii. 1; xxvi. 1; lx. 18; xxxiii. 6; Joel iii. 17; Oba. 17; Zec. xiv. 10, 11; Jer. xxxi. 38, 39, 40; Eze. xxxviii. 11.

IX. A little before the time of the Jews' call and conversion, there shall be great wars, confusion, and desolation throughout all the earth.

Isa. xxxiv. throughout; Joel iii. 1, 10; Zeph. iii. 8, 9; Eze. xxviii. 25, 26; Hag. ii. 21, 22, 23; Jer. xxx. 7, 8, 9, 10; 2 Chr. xv. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.

So that we may say, as Balaam did, prophesying of that very time, "Alas, who shall live when God doth this!" Num. xxiv. 23.

Such an interpretation of these passages is disputed by other writers, and among them by Professor Alexander, who in his recent work on the Prophecies of Isaiah, (quoted so largely in our Supplementary Notes to that book,) says, 'As to the question in dispute, the ground which I have taken and endeavoured to maintain is the negative position, that the truth of these "exceeding great and precious promises" is not suspended on the future restoration of the Jews to Palestine, without denying such a revelation to be possible or promised elsewhere.' 9. Because of the prophets. Whilst we rejoice in our privileges, if we be zealous for the glory of God, and full of compassion for our fellow sinners, we cannot but be deeply concerned when we consider the present state of mankind, and even that of the visible church. It might well fill us with consternation and amazement, and prompt us to such earnestness in endeavouring to convince men of their guilt and misery, as would be despised by carnal men, and mistaken for inebriation or insanity, to compare the words of God's holiness in the sacred Scriptures with the doctrine and example of a very large majority of rulers and teachers in the church, and with the lives of most professed Christians. For it is evident, that they are awfully deceived, and deceiving each other into a false peace, when the heavy wrath of God is ready to fall upon them. Perhaps God more abhors those who profess to preach his truth, but pervert it by their lies, and disgrace it by their vices, than those who openly abet the cause of infidelity and irreligion. Yet, those who will hearken to such teachers as "speak from their own hearts, and not out of the mouth of the Lord," and whose doctrine tends to render them vain and ungodly, must be answerable for it; for it is easy to distinguish them from those who "stand in the counsel of the Lord" and hear his word; especially as he has promised to give wisdom to those who lack it and pray for it, Pr. ii. 1—6; Jas. i. 5—8.—T. Scott. See Supplementary Note on Pr. xix. 27.

CHAP. XXV.—10. The sound of the millstones. The Easterns bake every day. The millstones are in motion the first thing in the morning, and indicate that the family have survived the night. On going out in the morning its silence is broken by the noise of the mill, and the voices and song of the women grinding. The absence of these are strongly descriptive of a desolate condition. The light of the candle. The houses of Egypt at this time are never without lights. They burn lamps not only all the night long, but in all inhabited apartments in a house, and even the poor would rather retrench a part of their food than neglect it.—Domestic Bible.

CHAP. XXVI.—18. Zion shall be ploughed like a field. From this place, says Dr. Wilson, the steep ascent of mount Zion commences along the wall of the city. A great part of this hill has been long under culture, and Zion, according to prophecy, is thus literally ploughed like a field. How great are the changes which it has seen from the time when its sacred glory and imperial greatness were then the subjects of inspired song. "God is known in her palaces for a refuge. Walk about Zion, and go round about her: tell the towers thereof. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces; that ye may tell it to the generation following," Ps. xlviii.

'Where now the pomp which kings with envy viewed?
Where now the might which all those kings subdued?
No martial myriads muster in thy gate;
No suppliant nations in thy temple wait;
No prophet bards, thy glittering courts among,
Wake the full lyre, and swell the tide of song:
But lawless Force and meagre Want are there,
And the quick darting eye of restless Fear.
While cold Oblivion 'mid thy ruins laid,
Folds his dank wing beneath the ivy shade.'—Heber.

CHAP. XXIX.—22. Roasted. Chardin, in his Travels, after speaking of the most common mode of punishing with death, says, 'But there is still a particular way of putting to death such as have transgressed in civil affairs, either by causing a death, or by selling above the tax by a false weight, or who have committed themselves in any other manner. The cooks are put upon a spit and roasted over a slow fire, bakers are thrown into a hot oven. During the dearth in 1688, I saw such ovens heated on the royal square in Ispahan, to terrify the bakers, and deter them from deriving advantage from the general distress.'—Burder's Oriental Literature, vol. ii. 204.

CHAP. XXX.—1-11. The word that came to Jeremiah, &c. Now comes a most remarkable prophecy not adequately fulfilled by the restoration of Judah from Babylon, and pointing therefore to a future and more general restoration, comprehensive both of Judah and Israel,—a prophecy therefore which it is well to have been recorded in a book, that we, on whom the latter ends of the world have come, may be taught what the things are to which we should look forward. The day of trouble that is associated with this great consummation seems to be the period when there shall be shaking among the nations, prefigured by the overthrow of Nebuchadnezzar's image, at the time when the ten kingdoms shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour. The Jews will somehow be implicated in the universal commotion, as if to be assailed by the potentates of the world,—an event not obscurely intimated in other places of Scripture. But they shall be saved out of it, and the happiness of the millennium shall at length be ushered in, as if the fruit of a laborious and sore travail. Their return to the secure possession of their own land, and under David their king, as well as the full end of all the nations among whom they had been scattered, are events that still lie in the womb of futurity. 11. Yet will I not make a full end of thee. God hath made a full end of the Egyptians, Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldeans, Medes and Persians, and Macedonians, and of the pagan Roman empire, which successively scattered or oppressed Israel; so that each of them has been inseparably united with the conquering nations; yet the Jews, by an unprecedented interposition of Providence, after all their oppressions and dispersions, are preserved a distinct people to this present day! How wonderfully do undeniable facts demonstrate the Divine inspiration of the Scriptures! No doubt the future restoration of that people from their present dispersions, and their quiet settlement in Canaan, will, in a still more astonishing manner, attest the same most important truth, to the conviction and conversion of the nations of the earth.—T. Scott. 12—24. Thy bruise is incurable, &c. The bruise of Israel was incurable by man, but all things are possible to God. They had been delivered up by him to the power of their enemies, and from whom none but himself could rescue them. And he will at length interpose and vindicate before the whole earth his own special relationship with the people whom he had chosen. They should be healed of their wounds, and recalled from the outcast places among which they had been scattered. The goodly temple should be reared on its old foundations, which was typically fulfilled in the first restoration, and will be substantially fulfilled in the second, when the true religion is set up in Jerusalem as the ecclesiastical capital of the world. Among other blessings which are promised, it is said that their nobles shall be of themselves, or they shall have rulers from among their own people. May not the governor be Jesus Christ, a Jew according to the flesh, but who engaged his heart to approach for the people whom he redeemed as their surety and intercessor before God? It is through him that we became God's people, and that he became our God. But this blessed consummation is not unaccompanied with mighty calamities and commotions on the earth; and well, may we repeat, is all this written in a book, that we of the latter days might consider it.

CHAP. XXXI.—1-11. At the same time, saith the Lord, &c. The prophecy of the last chapter continues, and with a heightening evidence. It is the time of the general restoration which, I believe, is here referred to. The grace which Israel is to find in the wilderness is that by which they are recalled from the places of their dispersion, and conducted to their ultimate settlement in their own land. Israel may here be saying, through the prophet, that the love of God to her in old times was again to be manifested. Their prosperity after their restoration is illustrated by a variety of images, and, among others, that they should eat of the produce of their own industry with perfect security and freedom, and under no such restraint as was laid upon them by the distinction between the common and the clean. The return in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah forms no adequate counterpart to the foretellings of this magnificent chapter. They shall yet come from a more wide-spread and general captivity; and come with weeping, too, because they will then look to him whom they have pierced, and weep in bitterness as for a firstborn. 31—40. Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel. Surely the days are yet to come when this covenant shall be entered upon. It is not yet that all men know the Lord, from the least unto the greatest. Hasten this universal shower of grace, O thou most High! What a valuable passage is this, and how mightily to be prayed over! Put thy law, O God, into my inward parts, write it in my heart; and may I at once be one of thy regenerated and reconciled children. And what an assurance we here have for the restoration and perpetuity of Israel as a nation. Here we have one of those fine instances in which the constancy of nature is appealed to as a guarantee for the faithfulness of God's word. The nation of Israel, and as a nation, will last as long as the present economy. And it is as impossible for God to cast them off as for man to explore all the amplitudes and profundities of the universe. These noble declarations in regard to the antitypical are followed by a prophecy respecting the typical, and which had its literal fulfilment. An illustrious chapter.—These Notes on ch. xxx. and xxxi., with the exception marked, are from Dr. Chalmers' posthumous work, Horæ Biblicæ.

CHAP. XXXV.—2. Rechabites. The Rechabites, as may be collected from ver. 7, were not of the children of Israel, but strangers of another race, who dwelt among them. From 1 Chr. ii. 55, they appear to have been Kenites, a with him while in prison. Nebuchadnezzar is said to have been offended with his son, Evil-Merodach, and to have imprisoned him, at which time he became acquainted with Jehoiachin. We do not know how far this is true, but it is mentioned by Jerome.

Supplementary Notes.—It has been already observed, 1, that the order of the chapters of Jeremiah in the Hebrew text and in our version is not that in which they were written; and, 2, that the arrangement of the Greek version differs from the Hebrew. There is a table in Walton's Polyglott which exhibits the order of the ancient text and versions, from the commencement of the divergencies. The Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, and Latin Vulgate throughout coincide, but from chap. xxv. 14, the Greek regularly follows another arrangement. It would be of little use to the general reader to give the succession of the chapters in the Greek, because it can claim no superiority over that in the Hebrew. It may, however, be observed that several portions, from single words to several verses in extent, are omitted people originally settled in that part of Arabia Petræa which was called the land of Midian; and most probably the descendants of Jethro, who is called a Kenite, and said to have severed himself from the rest of his countrymen, and to have dwelt amongst the people of Israel: compare Num. x. 29—32, with Jud. i. 16; iv. 11. 4. Into the chamber of the sons of Hanan. Several chambers belonged to the temple for the residence of the priests and Levites during the time of their ministration, and for other sacred purposes. Chamber of the princes. Where the Sanhedrim assembled: see ch. xxvi. 10. The Sanhedrim always sat in some great room adjoining the temple. 6. Jonadab. The person to whom Jehu shewed so much respect, 2 Kin. x. 15. Ye shall drink no wine, &c. That the people may be the less liable to be corrupted, and lose their original patriarchal simplicity, the laws here enjoined were given. 7. Ye shall dwell in tents. A tribe of Arabs to this day live without fixed habitations, and far from cities, feeding their flocks, and living on their produce, and abstaining from wine. They have neither vineyard, field, nor seed, and are called the Beni-Kheiber.—Domestic Bible.

CHAP. XXXVII.—16. The dungeon. Dr. Blayney thinks that this dungeon was probably a deep pit, like a well, sunk in the court yard, and open to the sky at top; in the sides of which were niches, called in the text cabins, and in the margin cells, where the prisoners were placed, hence the allusion Isa. xiv. 15. 21. Court of the prison. In the king's house, mentioned ch. xxxii. 2. The bakers' street. Some understand by this, the place containing the king's provisions; it however more probably means, a street for bakers, according to the ancient Eastern custom of appropriating different streets for different businesses. Though the Easterns in general bake their own bread, yet small families find it cheaper to purchase of the baker than to have daily grinding and baking at home.

CHAP. XLVI.—19. Noph shall be waste. To the south-west of us, on the other side of the Nile, were the mounds near Metrahenny, indicating the site of Memphis,—the Moph of Hosea, (Hos. ix. 6,) and the Noph of Isaiah, (Isa. xix. 13,) Jeremiah, (Jer. ii. 16; xlvi. 19,) and Ezekiel, (Eze. xxx. 13, 16.) It is a city of the very highest antiquity. Its site, which is said by Diodorus to have formed a circuit of one hundred and fifty stadia, or about fifteen miles, has now nothing to mark it out but a few mounds, and a colossal statue of Rameses the Great, a small figure of red granite greatly mutilated, and a few foundations.—Lands of the Bible, vol. i. 115.

CHAP. XLVII.—5. Baldness is come upon Gaza. Each of us had found minute fragments of polished marble in the flat hollows between the sandhills, the remains no doubt of the palaces of Gaza; and also masses of fused stones, proving that God had "sent a fire on the wall of Gaza," Am. i. 7. We now saw, in a manner we had never done before, that God had fulfilled his own word, "Baldness is come upon Gaza." We saw that not merely mourning, such as 'baldness' indicated in ancient times, but literally and most remarkably the appearance of baldness has come upon Gaza. No spot of verdure, not a single blade of grass, did we see upon these sandhills. One solitary tree there was, which only served to make the bareness more remarkable. This barren, bare hill of sand is the bald head of Gaza. How awfully true and faithful are the words of God.—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative.

CHAP. XLVIII.—9. The cities thereof shall be desolate, without any to dwell therein. The most populous and fertile province in Europe (especially any situated in the interior of a country like Moab) is not covered so thickly with towns as Moab is plentiful in ruins, deserted and desolate though now it be. Burckhardt enumerates about fifty ruined sites within its boundaries, many of them extensive. In general they are a "broken down" (ver. 39) and undistinguishable mass of ruins; and many of them have not been closely inspected. But in some instances there are the remains of temples, sepulchral monuments, the ruins of edifices constructed of very large stones, and many cisterns cut out of the rock. Not one of the ancient cities of Moab now exists, as tenanted by man. 28. O ye that dwell in Moab, leave the cities and dwell in the rock. In a general description of the condition of the inhabitants of that extensive desert which now occupies the place of these ancient flourishing states, Volney, in plain but unmeant illustration of this prediction, remarks, that 'the wretched peasants live in perpetual dread of losing the fruits of their labours; and no sooner have they gathered in their harvest than they hasten to secrete it in private places, and retire among the rocks which border on the Dead Sea.' Towards the opposite extremity of the land of Moab, and at a little distance from its borders, Seetzen relates that there are many families living in caverns; and he actually designates them 'the inhabitants of the rocks.' And, at the distance of a few miles from the ruined site of Heshbon, 'there are artificial caves in a large range of perpendicular cliffs, in some of which are chambers and small sleeping apartments.' While the cities are desolate without any to dwell therein, the rocks are tenanted.—Keith on the Prophecies, which the reader may consult for additional proofs of the accomplishment of the predictions respecting Moab. See also Supplementary Note on Isa. xvi. 14.

CHAP. XLIX.—2. Ammon shall be a desolate heap. See Supplementary Note on Eze. xxv. 5. 13. All the cities thereof shall be perpetual wastes. Referring to the ruins of Petræa, the metropolis of Edom, Dr. Wilson says, (Lands of the Bible, vol. i. 309,) Both in the interior of the palace, and in what must have been its adjoining enclosures, there are many bushes and shrubs growing, such as we should expect to find in any similar body of ruins, (Isa. xxxiv. 13.) Though they are formed in connexion with a fabric which appears to have been erected either by the Greeks or Romans, they are not to be overlooked as the indices of the continued desolations of Idumæa which are set forth in the several places of holy writ, in which it is said that all its cities shall be perpetual wastes. Of the remains of ancient cities still exposed to view in different places throughout Idumæa, Burckhardt (Travels, 418—441) describes 'the ruins of a large town, of which nothing remains but broken walls and heaps of stones; the ruins of several villages in its vicinity; the ruins of an ancient city, consisting of large heaps of hewn blocks of silicious stone; the extensive ruins of Gherandel Arindela, an ancient town of Palæstina Tertia.' 'The following ruined places are situated in Djebal Shera (mount Seir) to the south and south-west of Wady Mousa, Kalaat, Djerba, Basta, Eyl, Ferdakh, Anyk, Bir el Beytar, Shemakh, and Syk. Of the towns laid down in D'Anville's map, Thoana excepted, no traces remain.' Laborde passed the ruins of Elana, a town in Wady (valley) Pambouchebe, of another in Wady Sabra, where there are the ruins of a theatre and several temples—and of Ameime, where there are the ruins of numerous cisterns excavated from the rock, into which the water flowed by an aqueduct nine miles in length.—Keith.

CHAP. LI.—1. Babylon. See Supplementary Note on Isaiah. 37. Shall become heaps. Babylon, the glory of kingdoms, is now the greatest of ruins. 'Immense tumuli of temples, palaces, and human habitations of every description,' are everywhere seen, and form 'long and varied lines of ruins,' which, in some places, 'rather resemble natural hills than mounds which cover the remains of great and splendid edifices.' Those buildings which were once the labour of slaves and the pride of kings, are now misshapen heaps of rubbish. 'The whole face of the country is covered with vestiges of building, in some places consisting of brick walls surprisingly fresh, in others, merely a vast succession of mounds of rubbish, of such indeterminate figures variety, and extent, as to involve the person who should have formed any theory in inextricable confusion.' 'Long mounds running from north to south are crossed by others from east to west,' and are only distinguished by their form, direction, and number, from the decayed banks of canals. 'The greater part of the mounds are certainly the remains of buildings, originally disposed in streets, and crossing each other at right angles.' The more distinct and prominent of these heaps are double, or lie in parallel lines, each exceeding twenty feet, and 'are intersected by cross passages, in such a manner as to place beyond a doubt the fact of their being rows of houses or streets fallen to decay.' Such was the form of the streets of Babylon, leading towards the gates; and such are now the lines of its heaps. Such is the multiplicity of prophecies and the accumulation of facts, that the very abundance of evidence increases the difficulty of arranging, in a condensed form, and thus appropriating its specific fulfilment to each precise and separate prediction, and many of them may be viewed connectedly. All who have visited Babylon concur in acknowledging or testifying that the desolation is exactly such as was foretold. They, in general, apply the more prominent predictions; and, in minute details, they sometimes unconsciously adopt, without any allusion or reference, the very words of inspiration. Babylon is wholly desolate. It has become heaps—it is cut down to the ground—brought down to the grave—trodden on—uninhabited—its foundations fallen—its walls thrown down, and utterly broken—its loftiest edifices rolled down from the rocks—the golden city has ceased—the worms are spread under it, and the worms cover it, &c. There the Arabian pitches not his tent; there the shepherds make not their folds; but wild beasts of the desert lie there, and their houses are full of doleful creatures, and owls dwell there, &c. It is a possession for the bittern, and a dwelling-place for dragons—a wilderness, a dry land and a desert—a burnt mountain—pools of water—spoiled—empty—nothing left—utterly destroyed—every one that goeth by it is astonished, &c.—Keith on Prophecy, where see the authors quoted. (See also wood engraving, Ps. cxxxvii.) 58. The broad walls of Babylon shall be utterly broken. A chapter of sixty pages in length, of Mr. Buckingham's Travels in Mesopotamia, vol. ii. p. 206—307, is entitled, 'Search after the walls of Babylon.' After a long and fruitless search, he discovered on the eastern boundary of the ruins, on the summit of an oval mound from seventy to eighty feet in height, and from three to four hundred feet in circumference, 'a mass of solid wall, about thirty feet in length, by twelve or fifteen in thickness, yet evidently once of much greater dimensions each way, the work being, in its present state, broken and incomplete in every part;' and this heap of ruin and fragment of wall he conjectured to be a part,—the only part, if such it be, that can be discovered,—of the walls of Babylon, so utterly are they broken. Beyond this there is not even a pretension to the discovery of any part of them. It is impossible to think on what Babylon was, and to be an eye-witness of what it is, without astonishment. (ver. 41. "How is Babylon become an astonishment among the nations!") On first entering its ruins, Sir Robert Ker Porter, (Travels, vol. ii. 294,) thus expresses his feelings; 'I could not but feel an indescribable awe in thus passing, as it were, into the gates of fallen Babylon.' 'I cannot pourtray,' says Captain Mignan, (Travels, p. 11,) 'the overpowering sensation of reverential awe that possessed my mind while contemplating the extent and magnitude of ruin and devastation on every side.' How is the hammer of the whole earth cut asunder! How is Babylon become a desolation among the nations! The following interesting description has lately been given from the spot. After speaking of the ruined embankment, divided and subdivided again and again, like a sort of tangled network, over the apparently interminable ground—of large and wide-spreading morasses—of ancient foundations—and of chains of undulating heaps,—Sir R. K. Porter emphatically adds,—'The whole view was particularly solemn. The majestic stream of the Euphrates, wandering in solitude, like a pilgrim monarch through the silent ruins of his devastated kingdom, still appeared a noble river under all the disadvantages of its desert-tracked course. Its banks were hoary with reeds; and the grey osier willows were yet there on which the captives of Israel hung up their harps, and, while Jerusalem was not, refused to be comforted. But how has the rest of the scene changed since then! At that time those broken hills were palaces—those long undulating mounds streets—this vast solitude filled with the busy subjects of the proud daughter of the East. Now wasted with misery, her habitations are not to be found, and for herself, the worm is spread over her.—Keith. So Jeremiah wrote in a book all the evil that should come upon Babylon. It would exceed the limit assigned to these Notes were we to attempt more fully to shew how all the evil here and elsewhere in Scripture denounced against Babylon has come to pass. For farther details we must refer to Supplementary Notes on Isa. xiii. and xiv., and to Dr. Keith's work on the Prophecies, to which we have been so largely indebted. In the words of that excellent author, we may conclude by asking, Has not every purpose of the Lord been performed against Babylon? And having so clear illustrations of the facts before us, what mortal shall give a negative answer to the question subjoined by their omniscient Author to these very prophecies? "Who hath declared this from ancient time? Who hath told it from that time? Have not I the Lord? and there is no God beside me;—declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times the things that are not yet done, saying, My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure." Is it possible that there can be any attestation of the truth of prophecy, if it be not witnessed here? Is there any spot on earth which has undergone a more complete transformation? 'The records of the human race,' it has been said with truth, 'do not present a contrast more striking than that between the primeval magnificence of Babylon and its long desolation.'—Edin. Review, No. 1, p. 439. Its ruins have of late been carefully and scrupulously examined by different natives of Britain, of unimpeached veracity, and the result of every research is a more striking demonstration of the literal accomplishment of every prediction. How few spots are there on earth of which we have so clear and faithful a picture as prophecy gave of fallen Babylon at a time when no spot on earth resembled it less than its present desolate solitary site! Or could any prophecies respecting any single place have been more precise and wonderful, or numerous, or true,—or more gradually accomplished throughout many generations? And when they look at what Babylon was, and what it is, and perceive the minute realization of them all—may not nations learn wisdom—may not tyrants tremble—and may not sceptics think?

altogether from the Greek. With respect to the arrangement of the Hebrew itself, although not chronological, it is very difficult to determine the true chronological order in several cases. Various critics, English and foreign, have prepared tables to explain their views of the real order, but they differ considerably, and therefore we may be satisfied with merely mentioning the fact. The prophecies of Jeremiah were issued under the reigns of Josiah, Jehoiachin, Jehoiakim, and Zedekiah, and the last written portions of the book appeared after the fall of Jerusalem. In the ordinary copies of Matt. xxvii. 9, a passage is ascribed to Jeremiah which belongs to Zechariah. The principal quotations from the book of Jeremiah in the New Testament are as follow: chapter vii. 11, in Matt. xxi. 13, Mark xi. 17, and Luke xix. 46; chapter ix. 24, in 1 Cor. i. 31; chapter xxxi. 15, in Matt. ii. 18; chapter xxxi. 31, &c., in Heb. viii. 8, &c.; chapter xxxi. 33, 34, in Heb. x. 16, 17. The principal portions omitted from the Greek version are chapter viii. 10—12; chapter x. 6—8, 10; chapter xvii. 1—4; chapter xxix. 16—20; chapter xxxiii. 14—26; chapter xxxix. 4—13; chapter lii. 28—30. The idea of some, that chapter lii. belongs to Lamentations, cannot be entertained.

Chap. ix. 11. Here again we meet with the unfortunate word "dragons," which has no right to a place in the Old Testament. Adam Clarke and others render the word jackals, which is probably correct, and now the received opinion. It is quite certain that dragons are not intended.

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

SINCE it is certainly true what Solomon saith, contrary to the common opinion of the world, that "sorrow is better than laughter, and it is better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting," we should come to the reading and consideration of the melancholy chapters of this book, not only willingly, but with an expectation to edify ourselves by them; which that we may do, we must compose ourselves to a holy sadness, and resolve to weep with the weeping Prophet. Let us consider, I. The title of this book. In the Hebrew it has none, but is called (as the books of Moses are) from the first word, Ecah, 'how;' but the Jewish commentators call it as the Greeks do, and we from them, Kinoth, 'Lamentations.' As we have sacred odes, or songs of joy, so we have sacred elegies, or songs of lamentation; such variety of methods has Infinite Wisdom taken to work upon us, and move our affections, and so soften our hearts, and make them susceptible of the impressions of Divine truths, as the wax of the seal. We have not only piped unto you, but have mourned likewise, Mat. xi. 17. II. The penman of this book. It was Jeremiah the prophet, who is here Jeremiah the poet, and vates signifies both; therefore this book is fitly adjoined to the book of his prophecy, and is as an appendix to it. We had there at large the predictions of the desolations of Judah and Jerusalem, and then the history of them, to shew how punctually the predictions were accomplished for the confirming of our faith. Now here we have the expressions of his sorrow upon occasion of them, to shew that he was very sincere in the protestations he had often made, that he did not desire the woful day; but, on the contrary, the prospect of it filled him with bitterness; when he saw these calamities at a distance, he wished his head waters, and his eyes fountains of tears; and when they came, he made it to appear he did not dissemble in that wish, and that he was far from being disaffected to his country, which was the crime his enemies charged him with. Though his country had been very unkind to him, and the ruin of it was both a proof that he was a true prophet and a punishment of them for prosecuting him as a false prophet, which would have tempted him to rejoice in it, yet he sadly lamented it, and herein shewed a better temper than that which Jonah was of with respect to Nineveh. III. The occasion of these lamentations was the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldean army, and the dissolution of the Jewish state, both civil and ecclesiastical, thereby. Some of the rabbins will have these to be the lamentations which Jeremiah penned upon occasion of the death of Josiah, which are mentioned 2 Chr. xxxv. 25. But though it is true, that that opened the door to all the following calamities, yet these lamentations seemed to be penned in the sight, not in the foresight, of those calamities,—when they were already come, not when they were at a distance; and there is nothing of Josiah in them, and his praise, as was, no question, in the lamentations for him. No, it is Jerusalem's funeral that this is an elegy upon. Others of them will have these lamentations to be contained in the roll which Baruch wrote from Jeremiah's mouth, and which Jehoiakim burnt; and they suggest, that at first there were in it only the 1st, 2nd, and 4th chapters; but the 3rd and 5th were the many like words that were afterwards added. But this is a groundless fancy; that roll is expressly said to be a repetition and summary of the Prophet's sermons, Jer. xxxvi. 2. IV. The composure of it. It is not only poetical, but alphabetical, all except the 5th chapter, as some of David's psalms are; each verse beginning with a several letter in the order of the Hebrew alphabet, the first aleph, the second beth, &c.; but the 3rd chapter is a triple alphabet, the three first beginning with aleph, the three next with beth, &c., which was a help to the memory, it being designed that these mournful ditties should be got by heart, and was an elegance of writing then valued, and therefore not now to be despised. They observe, that in the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th chapters the letter pe is put before ajin, which in all the Hebrew alphabets follows it; for a reason of which Dr. Lightfoot offers this conjecture, that the letter ajin, which is the numeral letter for seventy, was thus, by being displaced, made remarkable, to put them in mind of the seventy years, at the end of which God would turn again their captivity. V. The use of it. Of great use, no doubt, it was to the pious Jews in their sufferings, furnishing them with spiritual language to express their natural grief by; helping to preserve the lively remembrance of Zion among them and their children that never saw it, when they were in Babylon; directing their tears into the right channel; for they are here taught to mourn for sin, and mourn to God, and withal encouraging their hopes that God would yet return, and have mercy upon them. And it is of use to us, to affect us with godly sorrow for the calamities of the church of God, as becomes those that are living members of it, and are resolved to take our lot with it.

A.M. 3416. B.C. 588.

CHAPTER I.

We have here the first alphabet of this lamentation; twenty-two stanzas, in which the miseries of Jerusalem are bitterly bewailed, and her present deplorable condition aggravated, by comparing it with her former prosperous state: and all along sin is acknowledged and complained of as the procuring cause of all these miseries, and God is appealed to for justice against their enemies, and applied to for compassion towards them. The chapter is all of a piece, and the several remonstrances are interwoven: but here is, I. A complaint made to God, of their calamities, and his compassionate consideration desired, ver. 1—11. II. The same complaint made to their friends, and their compassionate consideration desired, ver. 12—17. III. An appeal to God, and his righteousness concerning it, ver. 18—22; in which he is justified in their affliction, and is humbly solicited to justify himself in their deliverance.

HOW doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people!
How is she become as a widow!
she that was great among the nations,
And princess among the provinces, how is she become tributary!
2 She weepeth sore in the night,
and her tears are on her cheeks:
Among all her lovers she hath none to comfort her:
All her friends have dwelt treacherously with her, they are become her enemies.
3 Judah is gone into captivity because of affliction, and because of great servitude:
She dwelleth among the heathen, she findeth no rest:
All her persecutors overtook her between the straits.
4 The ways of Zion do mourn, because none come to the solemn feasts:
All her gates are desolate: her priests sigh,
Her virgins are afflicted, and she is in bitterness.
5 Her adversaries are the chief, her enemies prosper;
For the LORD hath afflicted her for the multitude of her transgressions:
Her children are gone into captivity before the enemy.
6 And from the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed:
Her princes are become like harts that find no pasture,
And they are gone without strength before the pursuer.
7 Jerusalem remembered in the days of her affliction and of her miseries
All her pleasant things that she had in the days of old,

Title. In the Hebrew Bible this book is placed among those in which no chronological order is followed, and actually comes between Ruth and Ecclesiastes. There is, however, no reason to think that this arrangement is very ancient, because Josephus no doubt reckoned it as one with Jeremiah, and both in the Greek and Syriac it is placed after Jeremiah. The Greek, it is true, introduces along with it two apocryphal documents—Baruch before it, and the Epistle of Jeremiah after it, but these are uniformly rejected by the Jews, and, as Jerome says, they had them not in their language. The two frequently come together as one book, which is uniformly the case with Roman Catholic Bibles in modern languages, notwithstanding the witness of Jerome against them, and the absence of a Hebrew original. In the Hebrew the Lamentations consist of several elegies, highly poetic, and artificially constructed as acrostics, or so that the leading words of verses, &c., commence with the successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. To the Greek version this introduc-

Yea, she sigheth, and turneth backward.

Those that have any disposition to weep with them that weep, one would think, should scarce be able to refrain from tears at the reading of these verses, so very pathetical are the lamentations here.

First. The miseries of Jerusalem are here complained of as very pressing, and by many circumstances very much aggravated. Let us take a view of these miseries.

1. As to their civil state.

1st. A city that was populous is now depopulated, ver. 1. It is spoken of by way of admiration, Who would have thought that ever it should come to this? Or, by way of inquiry, What is it that hath brought it to this? Or, by way of lamentation, "Alas, alas," (as Rev. xviii. 10, 16, 19,) "how doth the city sit solitary that was full of people!" She was full of her own people, that replenished her, and full of the people of other nations, that resorted to her; with whom she had both profitable commerce and pleasant converse. But now her own people are carried into captivity, and strangers make no court to her; she sits solitary. The chief places of the city are not now as they used to be, places of concourse, where wisdom cried, Pr. i. 20, 21; and justly are they left unfrequented, because wisdom's cry there was not heard. Note, Those that are never so much increased God can soon diminish. "How is she become as a widow?" Her king that was, or should have been, as a husband to her, is cut off and gone; her God is departed from her, and hath given her a bill of divorce; she is emptied of her children; is solitary and sorrowful as a widow. Let no family, no state, not Jerusalem, no, nor Babylon herself, be secure, and say, "I sit as a queen," and shall never sit as a widow, Isa. xlvii. 8; Rev. xviii. 7.

2nd. A city that had dominion is now in subjection. She had been great among the nations, greatly loved by some, and greatly feared by others, and greatly observed and obeyed by both; some made her presents, and others paid her taxes; so that she was really princess among the provinces, and every sheaf bowed to hers, even the princes of the people intreated her favour: but now the tables are turned; she has not only lost her friends and sits solitary, but has lost her freedom too, and sits tributary; she paid tribute to Egypt first, and then to Babylon. Note, Sin brings a people not only into solitude, but into slavery.

3rd. A city that used to be full of mirth is now become melancholy, and upon all accounts full of grief. Jerusalem had been a joyous city, whither the tribes went up on purpose to rejoice before the Lord; she was the joy of the whole earth, but now she weepeth sore, her laughter is turned into mourning, her solemn feasts are all gone. She weeps in the night as true mourners do that weep in secret, in silence, and solitude; in the night, when others compose themselves to rest, her thoughts are most intent upon her troubles, and grief then plays the tyrant. What the prophet's head was for her, when she regarded it not, now her head is—as waters, and her eyes fountains of tears; so that she weeps day and night, Jer. ix. 1; her tears are continually on her cheeks. Though nothing dries away sooner than a tear, yet fresh griefs extort fresh tears, so that her cheeks are never free from them. Note, There is nothing more commonly seen under the sun than the tears of the oppressed, with whom the clouds return after the rain, Eccl. iv. 1.

4th. Those that were separated from the heathen now dwell among the heathen, that were a peculiar people are now a mingled people; ver. 3, "Judah is gone into captivity," out of their own land into the land of their enemies, and there she abides, and is likely to abide among those that are aliens to God, and the covenants of promise, with whom "she findeth no rest," no satisfaction of mind, nor any settlement of abode, but is continually hurried from place to place at the will of the victorious, imperious tyrants. And again, ver. 5, "Her children are gone into captivity before the enemy;" they that were to have been the seed of the next generation are carried off, so that the land that is now desolate is likely to be still desolate, and lost for want of heirs. Those that dwell among their own people, and that a free people, and in their own land, would be more thankful for the mercies they thereby enjoy if they would but consider the miseries of those that are forced into strange countries.

5th. Those that used in their wars to conquer are now conquered and triumphed over. "All her persecutors overtook her between the straits," ver. 3; they gained all possible advantages against her, so that her people unavoidably fall into the hand of the enemy; for there was no way to escape, ver. 7, they were hemmed in on every side, and, which way soever they attempted to flee they found themselves embarrassed, and when they made the best of their way they could make nothing of it, but were overtaken and overcome; so that every where "her adversaries are the chief, and her enemies prosper," ver. 5; which way soever their sword turns, they get the better. Such straits do men bring themselves into by sin. If we allow that which is our greatest adversary and enemy to have dominion over us, and to be chief in us, justly will our other enemies be suffered to have dominion over us.

6th. Those that had been not only a distinguished but a dignified people, on whom God had put honour, and to whom all their neighbours had paid respect, are now brought into contempt; ver. 8, "all that honoured her" before "despise her;" those that courted an alliance with her now value it not; that caressed her when she was in pomp and prosperity, slight her now she is in distress, "because they have seen her nakedness." By the prevalency of the enemies against her they perceive her weakness; and that she is not so strong a people as they thought she had been; and by the prevalency of God's judgments against her they perceive her wickedness, which now comes to light, and is everywhere talked of. Now it appears how they have vilified themselves by their sins, the enemies magnify themselves against them, ver. 9; they trample upon them, and insult over them, and in their eyes they are become vile, the tail of the nations that were the head. Note, Sin is the reproach of any people.

7th. Those that lived in a fruitful land were ready to perish, and many of them did perish, for want of necessary food, ver. 11. All her people sigh in despondency and despair, they are ready to faint away, their spirits fail, and therefore they sigh, for they seek bread, and seek it in vain. They were brought at last to that extremity that there was no bread for the people of the land, Jer. lii. 6; and in their captivity they had much ado to get bread; ch. v. 6, "They have given their pleasant things," their jewels and pictures, and all the furniture of their closets and cabinets, which they used to please themselves with looking upon, they have sold these to buy bread for themselves and their families, have parted with them "for meat to relieve the soul," or, as the margin is, 'to make the soul come again" when they were ready to faint away. They desired no other cordial but meat. All that a man hath will he give for life, and for bread which is the staff of life. Let those that abound in pleasant things not be proud of them, or fond of them, for the time may come when they may be glad to let them go for necessary things. And let those who have competent food to relieve their soul, be content with it, and thankful for it, though they have not pleasant things.

2. We have here an account of their miseries in their ecclesiastical state; the ruin of their sacred interest, which was much more to be lamented than that of their secular concerns.

1st. Their religious feasts were no more observed, no more frequented; ver. 4, "The ways of Zion do mourn," they look melancholy, overgrown with grass and weeds. It used to be a pleasant diversion to see people continually passing and repassing in the highway that led to the temple; but now you may stand there long enough and see nobody stir, for "none come to the solemn feasts," a full end is put to them by the destruction of that which was the city of our solemnities, Isa. xxxiii. 20. The solemn feasts had been neglected and profaned, Isa. i. 11, 12; and therefore justly is an end now put to them. But when thus the ways of Zion are made to mourn, all the sons of Zion cannot but mourn with them. It is very grievous to good men to see religious assemblies broken up and scattered, and those restrained from them that would gladly attend them. And, as the ways of Zion mourned, so the gates of Zion, in which the faithful worshippers used to meet, are desolate, for there is none to meet in them. Time was when "the Lord loved the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob;" but now he hath forsaken them, and is provoked to withdraw from them, and therefore it cannot but fare with him as it did with the temple when Christ quitted it; "Behold your house is left unto you desolate," Mat. xxiii. 38.

2nd. Their religious persons were quite disabled to perform their wonted services, were quite dispirited; "Her priests sigh," for the desolations of the temple, their songs are turned into sighs. They sigh, for they have nothing to do, and therefore there is nothing to be had; they sigh as the people, ver. 11, "for want of bread," because the offerings of the Lord, which were their livelihood, failed. It is time to sigh when the priests, the Lord's ministers, sigh. Her virgins also, that used with their music and dancing to grace the solemnities of their feasts, are afflicted, and in heaviness. Notice is taken of their service in the day of Zion's prosperity, Ps. lxviii. 25, "among them were the damsels playing with timbrels," and therefore notice is taken of the failing of it now. "Her virgins are afflicted," and therefore "she is in bitterness," that is, all the inhabitants of Zion are so, whose character it is that they are sorrowful for the solemn assembly, and that to them the reproach of it is a burthen, Zeph. iii. 18.

3rd. Their religious places were profaned; ver. 10, "The heathen entered into her sanctuary," into the temple itself, into which no Israelite was permitted to enter, though never so reverently and devoutly, but the priests only; "The stranger that comes nigh," even to worship there, "shall be put to death," thither the heathen now crowd rudely in, not to worship, but to plunder. God had commanded that the heathen should not so much as enter into the congregation, nor be incorporated with the people of the Jews. Deu. xxiii. 3; yet now they enter into the sanctuary without control. Note, Nothing is more grievous to those who have a true concern for the glory of God, nor is more lamented, than the violation of God's laws, and the contempt they see put upon sacred things. What the enemy did wickedly in the sanctuary was complained of, Ps. lxxiv. 3, 4.

4th. Their religious utensils, and all the rich things with which the temple was adorned and beautified, and which were made use of in the worship of God, were made a prey to the enemy, ver. 10, "The adversary hath spread out his hand upon all her pleasant things," hath grasped them all, seized them all for himself. What these pleasant things are we may learn from Isa. lxiv. 11, where, to the complaint of the burning of the temple, it is added, "all our pleasant things are laid waste;" the ark and the altar, and all the other tokens of God's presence with them, these were their pleasant things above any other things, and these were now broken to pieces and carried away. Thus "from the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed," ver. 6. The beauty of holiness was the beauty of the daughter of Zion. The temple, that holy and beautiful house, when that was destroyed, her beauty was gone; that was the breaking of the staff of beauty, the taking away of the pledges and seals of the covenant, Zec. xi. 10.

5th. Their religious days were made a jest of; ver. 7, "The adversaries saw her, and did mock at her sabbaths." They laughed at them for their observing of one day in seven as a day of rest from worldly business. Juvenal, a heathen poet, ridicules the Jews in his time for it,—

Cui septima quæque fuit lux,
Ignava et vitæ partem non attigit ullam,—
'They keep their sabbaths to their cost,
And thus one day in seven is lost.'

Whereas sabbaths, if they be sanctified as they ought to be, will turn to a better account than all the days of the week beside. And whereas the Jews professed they did it in obedience to their God, and to his honour, they asked them what they got by it now, what profit had they in keeping the ordinances of their God, who now deserted them in their distress? Note, It is a very great trouble to all that love God to hear his ordinances mocked at, and particularly his sabbaths. Zion calls them her sabbaths, for the sabbath was made for men; they are his institutions, but they are her privileges; and the tory note is prefixed: "And it came to pass after Israel was taken into captivity, and Jerusalem was made desolate, Jeremiah sat weeping, and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said, How doth," &c. In the opinion of most modern expositors, the composition belongs to the date of the overthrow of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. Some have endeavoured to fix the precise point to which each of the five pieces of which the book consists was composed; but since we see nothing in these efforts but learned ingenuity we omit to record them. The authenticity of the book has been very generally admitted, and only a small number of German students seem to have doubted it. In like manner the form and tone of the book have been almost but not quite universally admired. De Wette, the neologian, for example, says, "The Lamentations are, indeed, possessed of considerable merit in their way, but still betray an unpoetic period and degenerated taste." On the other hand, Lowth believes that to detail its beauties would be to copy the whole poem. It is, by the confession contempt put upon sabbaths all the sons of Zion take to themselves, and lay to heart accordingly; and will not look upon sabbaths, or any other Divine ordinances, as less honourable, nor value them less, for being mocked at.

6th. That which greatly aggravated all these grievances was, that her present state was just the reverse of what it had been when time was; ver. 7, now "in the days of affliction and misery," when every thing was black and dismal, "she remembers all her pleasant things that she had in the days of old," and now knows how to value them better than formerly, when she had the full enjoyment of them. God often makes us know the worth of mercies by the want of them; and adversity is most hardly borne by those that are fallen into it from the height of prosperity. This cut David to the heart when he was banished from God's ordinances, that he could remember when he "went with the multitude to the house of God," Ps. xlii. 4.

Secondly. The sins of Jerusalem are here complained of as the procuring, provoking cause of all these calamities. Whoever are the instruments, God is the author of all these troubles; it is the Lord that has afflicted her, ver. 5, and he has done it as a righteous judge, for she has sinned.

1. Her sins are for number numberless. Are her troubles many? her sins are many more; it is for the multitude of her transgressions that the Lord has afflicted her: see Jer. xxx. 14. When the transgressions of a people are multiplied, we cannot say, as Job doth, it is without cause that their wounds are multiplied, Job ix. 17.

2. They are for nature exceeding heinous; ver. 8, "Jerusalem hath grievously sinned;" hath sinned sin, so the word is; sinned wilfully, deliberately, hath sinned that sin which of all others is the abominable thing that the Lord hates, the sin of idolatry. The sins of Jerusalem, that makes such a profession, and enjoys such privileges, are of all other the most grievous sins. She hath sinned grievously, ver. 8, and therefore, ver. 9, she came down wonderfully. Note, Grievous sins bring wondrous ruin; there are some workers of iniquity to whom there is a strange punishment, Job xxxi. 3.

3. They are such sins as may plainly be read in the punishment. 1st. They have been very oppressive, and therefore are justly oppressed; ver. 3, "Judah is gone into captivity," and it is "because of affliction and great servitude," that is, because the rich among them afflicted the poor, and made them serve with rigour, and particularly (as the Chaldee paraphraseth it) because they had oppressed their Hebrew servants, which is charged upon them, Jer. xxxiv. 11. Oppression was one of their crying sins, Jer. vi. 6, 7; and it is a sin that cries loud. 2nd. They have made themselves vile, and therefore are justly vilified. They all despise her, ver. 8, for her filthiness is in her skirts; it appears upon her garments that she hath rolled them in the mire of sin. None can stain our glory if we did not stain it ourselves. 3rd. They have been very secure, and therefore are justly surprised with the ruin; ver. 9, "She remembereth not her last end," she did not take the warning that was given her to consider her latter end, to consider what would be the end of such wicked courses as she took, and therefore she came down wonderfully, in an astonishing manner, that she might be made to feel what she would not fear; therefore God shall make their plagues wonderful.

Thirdly. Jerusalem's friends are here complained of as false and faint-hearted, and very unkind; they "have all dealt treacherously with her," ver. 2; so that in effect "they are become her enemies." Her deceivers have created her as much vexation as her destroyers. The staff that breaks under us may do us as great a mischief as the staff that beats us, Eze. xxix. 6, 7. Her princes, that should have protected her, have not courage enough to make head against the enemy for their own preservation; they are like harts, that upon the first alarm betake themselves to flight, and make no resistance; nay, they are like harts that are famished for want of pasture, and therefore are gone without strength before the pursuer, and, having no strength for flight, are soon run down and made a prey of. Her neighbours are unneighbourly; for, 1. There is none to help her, ver. 7; either they could not or would not; nay, 2. She has no comforter, none to sympathize with her, or suggest any thing to alleviate her griefs, ver. 7, 9; like Job's friends, they saw it was to no purpose, her grief was so great, and miserable comforters were they all in such a case.

Fourthly. Jerusalem's God is here complained to concerning all these things, and all is referred to his compassionate consideration; ver. 9, "O Lord, behold my affliction," and take cognizance of it; and ver. 11, "See, O Lord, and consider," take order about it. Note, The only way to make ourselves easy under our burthens is to cast them upon God first, and leave it to him to do with us as seemeth him good.

12 Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?
Behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, [fierce anger.
Wherewith the LORD hath afflicted me in the day of his 13 From above hath he sent fire into my bones, and it prevaileth against them: [back:
He hath spread a net for my feet, he hath turned me
He hath made me desolate and faint all the day.
14 The yoke of my transgressions is bound by his hand:
they are wreathed, [to fall,
And come up upon my neck: he hath made my strength
The Lord hath delivered me into their hands, from whom
I am not able to rise up.
15 The Lord hath trodden under foot all my mighty men in the midst of me: [young men:
He hath called an assembly against me to crush my
The Lord hath trodden the virgin, the daughter of Judah, as in a winepress.
16 For these things I weep; mine eye, mine eye runneth down with water, [from me:
Because the comforter that should relieve my soul is far
My children are desolate, because the enemy prevailed
17 Zion spreadeth forth her hands, and there is none to comfort her:
The LORD hath commanded concerning Jacob, that his adversaries should be round about him:
Jerusalem is as a menstruous woman among them.
18 The LORD is righteous; for I have rebelled against his commandment:
Hear, I pray you, all people, and behold my sorrow:
My virgins and my young men are gone into captivity.
19 I called for my lovers, but they deceived me:
My priests and mine elders gave up the ghost in the city,
While they sought their meat to relieve their souls.
20 Behold, O LORD; for I am in distress: my bowels are troubled;
Mine heart is turned within me; for I have grievously rebelled:
Abroad the sword bereaveth, at home there is as death.
21 They have heard that I sigh: there is none to comfort me:
All mine enemies have heard of my trouble; they are glad that thou hast done it:
Thou wilt bring the day that thou hast called, and they shall be like unto me.
22 Let all their wickedness come before thee;
And do unto them, as thou hast done unto me for all my transgressions:
For my sighs are many, and my heart is faint.

The complaints here are, for substance, the same with those in the foregoing part of the chapter; but in these verses the prophet, in the name of the lamenting church, doth more particularly acknowledge the hand of God in these calamities, and the righteousness of his hand.

First. The church in distress doth here magnify her affliction; and yet no more than there was cause for. Her groaning was not heavier than her strokes. She appeals to all spectators, "See if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow," ver. 12. This might perhaps be truly said of Jerusalem's griefs; but we are apt to apply it too sensibly to ourselves when we are in trouble, and more than there is cause for. Because we feel most from our own burthen, and cannot be persuaded to reconcile ourselves to it, we are ready to cry out, Surely, never was sorrow like unto our sorrow; whereas, if our troubles were to be thrown into a common stock with those of others, and then an equal dividend made, share and share alike, rather than stand to that, we would each of us say, 'Pray, give me my own again.'

Secondly. She doth here look beyond the instruments to the Author of her troubles, and own them all to be directed, determined, and disposed of by him. It is the Lord that has afflicted me, and he has afflicted me because he is angry with me; the greatness of his displeasure may be measured by the greatness of my distress, it is "in the day of his fierce anger," ver. 12. Afflictions cannot but be very much our griefs, when we see them arising from God's wrath; so the church doth here. 1. She is as one in a fever, and the fever is of God's sending. He hath sent fire into my bones, ver. 13; a preternatural heat, which prevails against them, so that they are burnt like a hearth, Ps. cii. 3, pained, and wasted, and dried away. 2. She is as one in a net, which the more he struggles to get out of, the more he is entangled in; and this net is of God's spreading. The enemies could not have succeeded in their stratagems but that God hath "spread a net for my feet." 3. She is as one in a wilderness, whose way is embarrassed, solitary, and tiresome; He hath turned me back, that I cannot go on; hath made me desolate, that I have nothing to support me with, but am faint all the day. 4. She is as one in a yoke, not yoked for service, but for penance, tied neck and heels together; ver. 14, "The yoke of my transgressions is bound by his hand." Observe, We never are entangled in any yoke but it is framed out of our own transgressions; "The sinner is holden with the cords of his own sins," Pr. v. 22. The yoke of Christ's commands is an easy yoke, Mat. xi. 30; but that of our own transgressions is a heavy one. God is said to bind this yoke when he chargeth guilt upon us, and brings us into those inward and outward troubles which our sins have deserved; when conscience, as his deputy, binds us over to his judgment, then the yoke is bound and wreathed by the hand of his justice, and nothing but the hand of his pardoning mercy will unbind it. 5. She is as one in the dirt, and he it is that has "trodden under foot all her mighty men," that has disabled them to stand, and overthrown them by one judgment after another, and so left them to be trampled upon by their proud conquerors, ver. 15. Nay, she is as one in a winepress, not only trodden down, but trodden to pieces, crushed as grapes in the winepress of God's wrath, and her blood pressed out as wine; and it is God that has thus trodden "the virgin, the daughter of Judah." 6. She is in "the hand of her enemies," and it is the Lord that has delivered her into their hands; ver. 14, "He has made my strength to fail," so that I am not able to make head against them; nay, not only not able to rise up against them, but not able to rise up from them. And then he hath delivered me into their hands; nay, ver. 15, he hath called "an assembly against me to crush my young men," and such an assembly as it is in vain to think of opposing. And again, ver. 17, "The Lord has commanded concerning Jacob, that his adversaries should be round about him." He that had many a time commanded deliverance for Jacob, Ps. xliv. 4, now commands an invasion against Jacob, because Jacob had disobeyed the commands of his law.

Thirdly. She justly demands a share in the pity and compassion of those that were the spectators of her misery; ver. 12, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?" Can you look upon me without concern! What, are your hearts as adamants, and your eyes as marbles, that you cannot bestow upon me one compassionate thought, or look, or tear? Are not you also in the body? Is it nothing to you that your neighbour's house is on fire? There are those to whom Zion's sorrows and ruins are nothing; they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph. How pathetically doth she beg their compassion; ver. 18, "Hear, I pray you, all people, and behold my sorrow;" hear my complaints, and see what cause I had for them. This is a request like that of Job, Job xix. 21, of all, a composition of remarkable boldness and pathos, and one in which imagination performs a conspicuous part. The opening words have often been quoted in connection with the medals and coins struck by Titus, whereon captive Judah is symbolised by a woman sitting on the ground beneath a palm tree. In the course of the first four verses it will be remarked that we have not only the allusion to Jerusalem in verse 1, but the mention of the state (Judah) in verse 3, and of the sanctuary (Zion) in verse 4.

i. 3. "Straits" here are narrow defiles or ravines, from which there is no escape when followed or beset by an enemy.

i. 5. "Her children" means her inhabitants; there is no reference therefore to children in particular, though included by the term.

i. 7. This verse contains four lines in the Hebrew, whereas in the rest of the chapter a verse contains but three.

i. 10. The first Temple was defiled by the heathen when the Chaldeans plundered it; the second Temple was defiled by

"Have pity, have pity upon me, O ye my friends." It helps to make a burthen sit lighter if our friends sympathize with us, and mingle their tears with ours; for that is an evidence that though we are in affliction we are not in contempt, which is commonly as much dreaded in an affliction as any thing.

Fourthly. She justifies her own grief, though it was very extreme, for these calamities; ver. 16, "For these things I weep," I weep in the night, ver. 2, when none sees; "mine eye, mine eye runs down with water." Note, This world is a vale of tears to the people of God; Zion's sons are often Zion's mourners. "Zion spreads forth her hands," ver. 17; which is here an expression rather of despair than of desire; she flings out her hands as giving all for gone. Let us see how she accounts for this passionate grief. 1. Her God is withdrawn from her; and Micah, that had but gods of gold, when they were stolen from him, cried out, "What have I more? And what is this that ye say unto me, What aileth thee?" The church here grieves excessively: For, saith she, "the Comforter that should relieve my soul is far from me." God is the comforter, he used to be so to her; he only can administer effectual comforts, it is his word that speaks them, it is his Spirit that speaks them to us. His are strong consolations, able to relieve the soul, to bring it back when it is gone, and we cannot of ourselves fetch it again. But now he is departed in displeasure, he is far from me, and beholds me afar off. Note, It is no marvel that the souls of the saints faint away, when God, who is the only comforter that can relieve them, keeps at a distance. 2. Her children are removed from her, and are in no capacity to help her. It is for them she weeps, as Rachel for hers, because they were not, and therefore she refuseth to be comforted. "Her children were desolate, because the enemy prevailed" against them; there is "none of all her sons to take her by the hand," Isa. li. 18. They cannot help themselves, and how should they help her? Both the damsels and the youths, that were her joy and hope, are gone into captivity, ver. 18. It is said of the Chaldeans that they had no compassion upon young men or maidens; not on the fair sex, not on the blooming age, 2 Chr. xxxvi. 17. 3. Her friends failed her; some would not, and others could not, give her any relief. She spread forth her hands, as begging relief, but there is none to comfort her, ver. 17; none that can do it, none that cares to do it. She called for her lovers, and, to engage them to help her, called them her lovers; but they deceived her, ver. 19; they proved like the brooks in summer to the thirsty traveller, Job vi. 15. Note, Those creatures that we set our hearts upon, and raise our expectations from, we are commonly deceived and disappointed in. Her idols were her lovers, Egypt and Assyria were her confidants, but they deceived her. Those that made court to her in her prosperity were shy of her, and strange to her in her adversity. Happy they that have made God their friend, and keep themselves in his love; for he will not deceive them. 4. Those whose office it was to guide her were disabled to do her any service. The priests and the elders, that should have appeared at the head of affairs, die for hunger; ver. 19, they "gave up the ghost," or were ready to expire, "while they sought their meat," went a begging for bread to keep them alive. The famine is sore indeed in the land when there is no bread to the wise, when priests and elders are starved. The priests and elders should have been her comforters, but how should they comfort others when they themselves were comfortless? "They have heard that I sigh," which should have summoned them to mine assistance, but "there is none to comfort me." Lover and friend hast thou put far from me. 5. Her enemies were too hard for her, and then insulted over her. They have prevailed; ver. 16, "Abroad the sword bereaveth," and slays all that come in its way; and "at home" all provisions are cut off by the besiegers, so that "there is as death," that is, famine, which is as bad as the pestilence, or worse. The sword without, and terror within, Deu. xxxii. 35. And as the enemies were very barbarous that were the instrument of the calamity, so were they that were the standers by, the Edomites and Ammonites, that bore ill-will to Israel. They "have heard of my trouble, and are glad that thou hast done it," ver. 21; they rejoice in the trouble itself, they rejoice that it is God's doing, it pleaseth them to find that God and his Israel are fallen out; and they carry it accordingly with a great deal of strangeness towards them. "Jerusalem is as a menstruous woman among them," that they are afraid of touching, and are shy of, ver. 17. Upon all these accounts it cannot be wondered at, nor can she be blamed that her sighs are many, in grieving for what is; and her heart is faint, ver. 22, in fear of what is yet farther likely to be.

Fifthly. She justifies God in all that is brought upon her, acknowledging that her sins had deserved these severe chastenings. The yoke that lies so heavy and binds so hard is the yoke of her transgressions, ver. 14. The fetters we are held in are of our own making, and it is with our own rod that we are beaten. When the church had spoken here as if she thought the Lord severe, she doth well to correct herself, at least to explain herself, by acknowledging, ver. 18, "The Lord is righteous." He doth us no wrong in dealing thus with us, nor can we charge him with any injustice in it; how unrighteous soever men are, we are sure the Lord is righteous, and manifests his justice, though they contradict all the laws of theirs. Note, Whatever our troubles are which God is pleased to inflict upon us, we must own that therein he is righteous; we understand neither him nor ourselves if we do not own it, 2 Chr. xii. 6. She owns the equity of God's actions by owning the iniquity of her own: "I have rebelled against his commandments," ver. 18; and again, ver. 20, "I have grievously rebelled." We cannot speak bad enough of sin, and we must always speak worst of our own sin, must call it rebellion, grievous rebellion; and very grievous sin is to all true penitents. It is this that lies heavier upon her than the afflictions she was under; "My bowels are troubled," they work within me as the troubled sea; "My heart is turned within me," is restless, is turned upside down, "for I have grievously rebelled." Note, Sorrow for sin must be great sorrow, and must affect the soul.

Sixthly. She appeals both to the mercy and to the justice of God in her present case. 1. She appeals to the mercy of God concerning her own sorrows, which had made her the proper object of his compassion; ver. 20, "Behold, O Lord, for I am in distress," take cognizance of my case, and take such order for my relief as thou pleasest. Note, It is matter of comfort to us that the troubles that oppress the spirits are open before God's eye. 2. She appeals to the justice of God concerning the injuries that her enemies had done her, ver. 21, 22, "Thou wilt bring the day that thou hast called," the day that is fixed in the counsels of God and published in the prophecies, when mine enemies that now prosecute me shall be like unto me, when the cup of trembling now put into my hands shall be put into theirs. It may be read as a prayer, Let the day appointed come; and so it goes on, "Let their wickedness come before thee," let it come to be remembered, let it come to be reckoned for, take vengeance on them for all the wrong they have done to me, Ps. cix. 14, 15; hasten the time when thou wilt do to them for their transgressions as thou hast done to me for mine. This prayer amounts to a protestation against all thoughts of a coalition with them, and to a prediction of their ruin, subscribing to that which God had in his word spoken of it. Note, Our prayers may and must agree with God's word, and what day God has there called we are to call for, and no other. And though we are bound in charity to forgive our enemies, and to pray for them, yet we may in faith pray for the accomplishment of that which God has spoken against his and his church's enemies, that will not repent to give him glory.

CHAPTER II.

This second alphabetical elegy is set to the same mournful tune with the former, and the substance of it is much the same: it begins with Ecah, as that did, How sad is our case! alas for us. I. Here is the anger of Zion's God taken notice of as the cause of her calamities, ver 1—9. II. Here is the sorrow of Zion's children taken notice as the effect of her calamities, ver. 10—19. III. The complaint is made to God, and the matter referred to his compassionate consideration, ver. 20—22; the hand that wounded must make whole.

HOW hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger, [Israel,
And cast down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of
And remembered not his footstool in the day of his anger!
2 The Lord hath swallowed up all the habitations of Jacob, and hath not pitied:
He hath thrown down in his wrath the strong holds of the daughter of Judah;
He hath brought them down to the ground: he hath polluted the kingdom and the princes thereof.
3 He hath cut off in his fierce anger all the horn of Israel:
He hath drawn back his right hand from before the enemy,
And he burned against Jacob like a flaming fire, which devoureth round about.
4 He hath bent his bow like an enemy: he stood with his right hand as an adversary,
And slew all that were pleasant to the eye in the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion:
He poured out his fury like fire.
5 The Lord was as an enemy: he hath swallowed up Israel,
He hath swallowed up all her palaces: he hath destroyed his strong holds,
And hath increased in the daughter of Judah mourning and lamentation.
6 And he hath violently taken away his tabernacle, as if it were of a garden: he hath destroyed his places of the assembly:
The LORD hath caused the solemn feasts and sabbaths to be forgotten in Zion,
And hath despised in the indignation of his anger the king and the priest. [sanctuary, 7 The Lord hath cast off his altar, he hath abhorred his
He hath given up into the hand of the enemy the walls of her palaces;
They have made a noise in the house of the LORD, as in the day of a solemn feast.
8 The LORD hath purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion:
He hath stretched out a line, he hath not withdrawn his hand from destroying:
Therefore he made the rampart and the wall to lament; they languished together.
9 Her gates are sunk into the ground; he hath destroyed and broken her bars:
Her king and her princes are among the Gentiles:
The law is no more; her prophets also find no vision from the LORD.

It is a very sad representation which is here made of the state of God's church, of Jacob and Israel, of Zion and Jerusalem; but the emphasis in these verses seems to be laid all along upon the hand of God in the calamities which they were groaning under. The grief is not so much that such and such things are done, as that God has done them; that he appears angry with them. It is he that chastens them, and chastens them in wrath, and in his hot displeasure; he is become their enemy, and fights against them; and this, this is the wormwood and the gall in their affliction and their misery.

First. Time was when God's delight was in his church, and he appeared to her and appeared for her as a friend; but now his displeasure is against her; he is angry with her, and appears and acts against her as an enemy. This is frequently repeated here, and sadly lamented. What he has done he has done in his anger; this makes the present day a melancholy day indeed with us, that it is the day of his anger, ver. 1. And again, ver. 2, it is in his wrath; and ver. 3, it is in his fierce anger that he has thrown down and cut off; and ver. 6 "in the indignation of his anger." Note, To those who know how to value God's favour nothing appears more dreadful than his anger. Corrections in love are easily borne, but rebukes in wrath wound deep. It is God's wrath that burns against Jacob as a flaming fire, ver. 3; and it is a consuming fire;

Antiochus and the Greeks; and the third Temple was defiled by Titus and the Romans, when the nation itself was finally dispersed and the Temple destroyed. There were other occasions on which the Temple was profaned by the heathen, but these were the chief.

i. 12. "The words of this verse have been very generally applied, in the language of the pulpit, to the sufferings of our Saviour, and unquestionably they graphically describe the intensity of those sufferings; but considering the extent to which the original sense of the passage has been lost sight of, and the accommodated one substituted in its room, it would be well to notify that the secondary meaning is merely an accommodation of the words" (Henderson).

i. 19. By "lovers" here and "friends" in verse 2, we understand those foreign states with which alliances had been formed. They either could not or would not help in the time of real danger. Such was the common distress that priests and elders were driven to seek their own bread, and expired of hunger in the fruitless search.

it devours round about, devours all her honours, all her comforts. This is the fury that is poured out like fire, ver. 4; like fire and brimstone which was rained upon Sodom and Gomorrah. But it was their sin that kindled this fire. God is such a tender Father to his children, that we may be sure he is never angry with them but when they provoke him and give him cause to be angry; nor is he ever angry more than there is cause for. God's covenant with them was, that if they would obey his voice he would be an enemy to their enemies, Ex. xxiii. 22; and he had been so as long as they had kept close to him; but now he is an enemy to them, at least he is as an enemy, ver. 5; "He hath bent his bow like an enemy," ver. 4. "He stood with his right hand" stretched out against them, and a sword drawn in it "as an adversary." God is not really an enemy to his people; no, not when he is angry with them, and corrects them in anger. We may be sorely displeased against our dearest friends and relations, whom yet we are far from having an enmity to; but sometimes he is an enemy to them, when all his providences concerning them seem, in outward appearance, to have a tendency to their ruin; when every thing makes against them, and nothing for them. But, blessed be God, Christ is our peace, is our peacemaker, who hath slain the enmity, and in him we may agree with our adversary, which it is our wisdom to do, since it is in vain to contend with him, and he offers us advantageous conditions of peace.

Secondly. Time was when God's church appeared very bright and illustrious and considerable among the nations; but now "the Lord has covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud," ver. 1; a dark cloud, which is very terrible to herself, and through which she cannot see his face; a thick cloud, (so the word signifies;) a black cloud, which eclipses all her glory, and conceals her excellency. Not such a cloud as that under which God conducted them through the wilderness, or that in which God took possession of the temple, and filled it with his glory; no, that side of the cloud is now turned towards them which was turned towards the Egyptians in the Red sea. The beauty of Israel is now cast down from heaven to the earth; their princes, 2 Sam. i. 19, their religious worship, their beauty of holiness, all that which recommended them to the affection and esteem of their neighbours, and rendered them amiable, which had lifted them up to heaven, was now withered and gone, because God had covered it with a cloud. "He hath cut off all the horn of Israel," ver. 3; all her beauty and majesty, Ps. cxxxii. 17; all her plenty and fulness, and all her power and authority. They had in their pride lifted up their horn against God, and therefore justly will God cut off their horn. He disabled them to resist and oppose their enemies, he turned back their right hand, so that they were not able to follow the blow which they gave, nor to ward off the blow which was given them. What can their right hand do against the enemy when God draws it back and withers it, as he did Jeroboam's? Thus was the beauty of Israel cast down, when a people famed for courage were not able to stand their ground, or make good their post.

Thirdly. Time was when Jerusalem and the cities of Judah were strong and well fortified, were trusted to by the inhabitants, and let alone by the enemy as impregnable; but now the Lord has in anger swallowed them up, they are quite gone, the forts and barriers are taken away, and the invaders meet with no opposition. The stately structures that were their strength and beauty are pulled down and laid waste. 1. "The Lord hath," in anger, "swallowed up all the habitations of Jacob," ver. 2, both the cities and the country houses; they are burnt or otherwise destroyed, so totally ruined that they seem to have been swallowed up, and no remains left of them. "He hath swallowed up and has not pitied;" one would have thought it pity that such sumptuous houses, so well built, so well furnished, should be quite destroyed, and that some pity should have been had for the poor inhabitants that were thus dislodged and driven to wander; but God's wonted compassions seemed to fail; "He hath swallowed up Israel" as a lion swallows his prey, ver. 5. 2. He hath swallowed up not only her common habitations, but her palaces, all her palaces, the habitations of her princes and great men, ver. 5, though those were most stately and strong, and rich and well guarded. God's judgments, when they come with commission, level palaces with cottages, and as easily swallow them up. If palaces be polluted with sin, as theirs were, let them expect to be visited with a curse, which shall consume them, with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof, Zec. v. 4. 3. He hath destroyed not only their dwelling-places, but their strongholds, their castles, citadels, and places of defence; these "he hath thrown down in his wrath, and brought them to the ground," for shall they stand in the way of his judgments, and give check to the progress of them? No, let them droop like leaves in autumn; let them be razed to the foundations, and made to touch the ground, ver. 2. And again, ver. 5, "He hath destroyed his strongholds;" for what strength could they have against God? And thus "he hath increased in the daughter of Judah mourning and lamentation," for they could not but be in a mighty consternation when they saw all their defence departed from them. This is again insisted upon, ver. 7—9. In order to the swallowing up of her palaces, "he hath given up into the hand of the enemy the walls of her palaces," which were their security, and when they are broken down the palaces themselves are soon broken into. The walls of palaces cannot protect them, unless God himself be a wall of fire round about them. This God did in his anger, and yet he hath done it deliberately; it is the result of a previous purpose, and is done by a wise and steady providence; for "the Lord hath purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion;" he brought the Chaldean army in on purpose to do this execution. Note, Whatever desolations God makes in his church they are all according to his counsels; "He performeth the thing that is appointed for us," even that which makes most against us. But when it is done, "he hath stretched out a line," a measuring line, to do it exactly and by measure: hitherto the destruction shall go and no farther; no more shall be cut off than what is marked to be so. Or, it is meant of the line of confusion, Isa. xxxiv. 11, a levelling line; for he will go on with his work: "he hath not withdrawn his hand from destroying," that right hand which he stretched out against his people as an adversary, ver. 4. As far as the purpose went the performance shall go, and his hand shall accomplish his counsel to the utmost, and not be withdrawn. "Therefore he made the rampart and the wall," which the people had rejoiced in, and upon which, perhaps, they had made merry, "to lament, and they languished together." The walls and the ramparts or bulwarks upon them fell together, and were left to condole one another's fall. "Her gates are" gone in an instant, so that one would think they were "sunk into the ground" with their own weight, and "he hath destroyed and broken her bars," those bars of Jerusalem's gates which formerly he had strengthened, Ps. cxlvii. 13. Gates and bars will stand us in no stead when God hath withdrawn his protection.

Thirdly. Time was when their government flourished, their princes made a figure, and their kingdom was great among the nations, and the balance of power was on their side, but now it is quite otherwise: "He hath polluted the kingdom and the princes thereof," ver. 2. They had first polluted themselves with their idolatries, and then God dealt with them as with polluted things; he threw them to the dunghill, the fittest place for them. He hath given up their glory, which was looked upon as sacred, (that is a character we give to majesty,) to be trampled upon and profaned; and no marvel that the king and the priest, whose characters were always deemed venerable and inviolable, are despised by everybody, when God has "in the indignation of his anger despised the king and the priest," ver. 6. He hath abandoned them, looked upon them as no longer worthy of the honours conveyed to them by the covenants of royalty and priesthood, but as having forfeited both; and then Zedekiah the king was used despitefully, and Seraiah the chief priest put to death as a malefactor. The crown is fallen from their head; "her king and her princes are among the Gentiles," prisoners among them, insulted over by them, ver. 9, and treated not only as common persons, but as the basest, without any regard had to their character. Note, It is but just with God to debase those by his judgments who have by sin debased themselves.

Fifthly. Time was when the ordinances of God were administered among them in their power and purity, and they had those tokens of God's presence with them; but, now those were taken from them, that part of the beauty of Israel was gone which was indeed their greatest beauty.

1. The ark was God's footstool, under the mercy seat, between the cherubims. This was of all other the most sacred symbol of God's presence; it is called his footstool, 1 Chr. xxviii. 2; Ps. xcix. 5; cxxxii. 7. There the Shechinah rested, and with an eye to this Israel was protected and saved many a time; but now he "remembered not his footstool." The ark itself was suffered, as it should seem, to fall into the hands of the Chaldeans. God, being angry, threw that away, for it shall be no longer his footstool; the earth shall be so, as it had been before the ark was, Isa. lxvi. 1. Of what little value are the tokens of his presence when his presence is gone; nor was this the first time God gave his ark into captivity, Ps. lxxviii. 61. God and his kingdom can stand without that footstool.

2. They that ministered in holy things had been "pleasant to the eye in the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion," ver. 4. They had been "purer than snow, whiter than milk," ch. iv. 7; none more pleasant in the eyes of all good people than those that did the service of the tabernacle; but now these are slain, and their blood mingled with their sacrifices. Thus is the priest despised as well as the king. Note, When those that were pleasant to the eye in Zion's tabernacle are slain, God must be acknowledged in it; he has done it; and the "burning which the Lord hath kindled must be bewailed" by the whole house of Israel, as in the case of Nadab and Abihu, Lev. x. 6.

3. The temple was God's tabernacle, as the tabernacle, while that was in being, is called his temple, Ps. xxvii. 4; and this "he has violently taken away," ver. 6. He has plucked up the stakes of it, and cut the cords, it shall be no more a tabernacle, much less his; he has taken it away, as the keeper of a garden takes away his hovel or shade when he has done with it, and has no more occasion for it; he takes it down as easily, as speedily, and with as little regret and reluctancy, as if it were but a "cottage in a vineyard and a lodge in a garden of cucumbers," Isa. i. 8, but a "booth which the keeper makes," Job xxvii. 18. When men profane God's tabernacle, it is just with him to take it from them. God had justly refused to smell in their solemn assemblies, Am. v. 21; they had provoked him to withdraw from them, and then no marvel that he has "destroyed his places of the assembly;" what should they do with the places when the services were become an abomination? "He hath" now "abhorred his sanctuary," ver. 7. It has been defiled with sin, that only thing which he hates; and for the sake of that he abhors even his sanctuary, which he had delighted in, and called his rest for ever, Ps. cxxxii. 14. Thus he had done to Shiloh. Now the enemies have made as great a noise of revelling and blaspheming in the house of the Lord as ever had been made with the temple songs and music in the day of a solemn feast, Ps. lxxiv. 4. Some, by the places of the assembly, ver. 6, understand not only the temple, but the synagogues and the schools of the prophets, which the enemy had burnt up, Ps. lxxiv. 8.

4. The solemn feasts and the sabbaths had been carefully remembered, and the people carefully put in mind of them; but now "the Lord hath caused those to be forgotten," not only in the country among those that lived at a distance, but even in Zion itself; for there were none left to remember them, nor were there the places left where they used to be observed. Now Zion was in ruins, no difference was made between sabbath time and other times, every day was a day of mourning, so that all the solemn feasts were forgotten. Note, It is just with God to deprive those of the benefit and comfort of sabbaths and solemn feasts who have not duly valued them, nor conscientiously observed them; but have profaned them, which was one of the sins that the Jews were often charged with. They that have seen the days of the Son of man, and slighted them, may desire to see one of those days, and not have them, Lu. xvii. 22.

5. The altar that had sanctified their gifts is now cast off; for God will no more accept their gifts, nor be honoured by their sacrifices, ver. 7. The altar was the table of the Lord; but God will no longer keep house among them, neither feast them nor feast with them.

6. They had been blessed with prophets and teachers of the law; but now "the law is no more," ver. 9. It is no more read by the people, no more expounded by the scribes; the tables of the law are gone with the ark, the book of the law is taken from them, and the people are forbidden to have it. What should they do with Bibles that had made no better improvement of them when they had them? "Her prophets also find no vision from the Lord;" God answers them no more by prophets and dreams, which was the melancholy case of Saul, 1 Sam. xxviii. 15. They had persecuted God's prophets, and despised the visions they had from the Lord; and, therefore, it is just with God to say they shall have no more prophets, no more visions. Let them go to the prophets that had flattered and deceived them with visions of their own hearts, for they shall have none from God to comfort them, or tell them how long. They that misuse God's prophets justly lose them.

10 The elders of the daughter of Zion sit upon the ground, and keep silence:
They have cast up dust upon their heads; they have girded themselves with sackcloth: [ground.

For the destruction of the daughter of my people;
Because the children and the sucklings swoon in the streets of the city.

When they swooned as the wounded in the streets of the city,
When their soul was poured out into their mothers' bosom.

ii. 1. This second chapter is a second poem, written like the preceding, as an acrostic, so that the first group of three lines in the Hebrew begins with a, the second group of three with b, and so forth. Here the prophet resumes his survey of the calamities of his people, taking in a wider range than he had done in chapter i., for there he never mentions Israel by name, while here he speaks of Israel as well as of Judah. The phrases "daughter of Zion," "beauty of Israel," "dwellings of Jacob," "daughter of Judah," "horn of Israel," and such like, are poetical as well as figurative. They add something to the bare names of Zion, Israel, Judah, and Jacob, for which they stand in ordinary cases, and give increased effect and vividness to the composition. Some expositors give a special significance to the separate epithets, as that the "beauty of Israel" means the Temple, that the "footstool" means the ark, that the "horn of Israel" means the power and authority of Israel, &c. Amid these figures, however, much is taken literally, as in verse 2, where

13 What thing shall I take to witness for thee? what thing shall I liken to thee, O daughter of Jerusalem?
What shall I equal to thee, that I may comfort thee, O virgin daughter of Zion?
For thy breach is great like the sea: who can heal thee?
14 Thy prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee:
And they have not discovered thine iniquity, to turn away thy captivity; [nishment.
But have seen for thee false burdens and causes of ba-15 All that pass by clap their hands at thee;
They hiss and wag their head at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying,
Is this the city that men call The perfection of beauty,
The joy of the whole earth?
16 All thine enemies have opened their mouth against thee:
They hiss and gnash the teeth: they say, We have swallowed her up:
Certainly this is the day we looked for; we have found,
we have seen it.
17 The LORD hath done that which he had devised; he hath fulfilled his word that he had commanded in the days of old:
He hath thrown down, and hath not pitied: and he hath caused thine enemy to rejoice over thee,
He hath set up the horn of thine adversaries.
18 Their heart cried unto the Lord, O wall of the daughter of Zion,
Let tears run down like a river day and night:
Give thyself no rest; let not the apple of thine eye cease.
19 Arise, cry out in the night: in the beginning of the watches
Pour out thine heart like water before the face of the Lord:
Lift up thy hands toward him for the life of thy young children,
That faint for hunger in the top of every street.
20 Behold, O LORD, and consider to whom thou hast done this. [long?
Shall the women eat their fruit, and children of a span Shall the priest and the prophet be slain in the sanctuary of the Lord?
21 The young and the old lie on the ground in the streets:
My virgins and my young men are fallen by the sword;
Thou hast slain them in the day of thine anger; thou hast killed, and not pitied [about.
22 Thou hast called as in a solemn day my terrors round
So that in the day of the LORD'S anger none escaped nor remained:
Those that I have swaddled and brought up hath mine enemy consumed.

CASTING DUST ON THE HEAD.—ver. 10.

Justly are these called Lamentations, and they are very pathetical ones; the expressions of grief in perfection, mourning and woe, and nothing else, like the contents of Ezekiel's roll, Eze. ii. 10.

First. Copies of lamentation are here presented, and they are painted to the life. 1. The judges and magistrates that used to appear in robes of state have laid them aside, or rather, are stripped of them, and put on the habit of mourners, ver. 10. The elders now sit no longer in the judgment-seats, "the thrones of the house of David;" but they sit upon the ground, having no seat to repose themselves in, or in token of great grief, as Job's friends sat with him upon the ground, Job ii. 13. They open not their mouth in the gate, as usual, to give their opinion, but they keep silence; overwhelmed with grief, and not knowing what to say. They have "cast dust upon their heads, and girded themselves with sackcloth," as deep mourners used to do. They had lost their power and wealth, and that made them take on thus. Ploratur lachrymis amissa pecunia veris,—'Genuine are the tears which we shed over lost property.' 2. The young ladies, that used to dress themselves so richly, and walk with stretched forth necks, Isa. iii. 16, now are humbled; "The virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground," they are made to know sorrow that seemed to bid defiance to it, and were always disposed to be merry. 3. The prophet himself is a pattern to the mourners, ver. 11, "His eyes do fail with tears," that is, he hath wept till he can weep no more; hath almost wept his eyes out, wept himself blind. Nor are the inward impressions of grief short of the outward expressions; his bowels are troubled, as they were when he saw these calamities coming, Jer. iv. 19, 20, which one would think might have excused him now; but even he, to whom they were no surprise, yet felt them an insupportable grief, to that degree, that his liver is poured out on the earth; that is, he felt himself a perfect colliquation. All his entrails were melted and dissolved, as Ps. xxii. 14; Jeremiah himself had better treatment than his neighbours, better than he had had before from his own countrymen; nay, their destruction was his deliverance, their captivity his enlargement, the same that made them prisoners made him a favourite, and yet his private interests are swallowed up in a concern for the public, and he bewails the destruction of the daughter of his people as sensibly as if he himself had been the greatest sufferer in that common calamity. Note, The judgments of God upon the land and nation are to be lamented by us, though we for our parts may escape pretty well.

Secondly. Calls to lamentation are here given. "The heart of the people cried unto the Lord," ver. 18. Some fear it was not a cry of true repentance, but of bitter complaint; their heart was as full of grief as it could hold, and they gave vent to it in doleful shrieks and outcries, in which they made use of God's name; yet we will charitably suppose that many of them did in sincerity cry unto God for mercy in their distress; and the prophet bids them go on to do so. "O wall of the daughter of Zion," either ye that stand upon the wall, ye watchmen on the walls, (Isa. lxii. 6,) when ye see the enemies encamped about the walls, and making their approaches towards them, or "because of the wall," (that is the subject of the lamentation,) because of the "breaking down of the wall," which was not done till about a month after the city was taken; because of this farther calamity let the daughter of Zion lament still. This was a thing which Nehemiah lamented long after, Neh. i. 3, 4, "Let tears run down like a river, day and night;" weep without intermission, "give thyself no rest" from weeping, "let not the apple of thine eyes cease." This intimates, 1. That the calamities would be continuing, and the causes of grief would frequently recur, and fresh occasion would be given them every day and every night to bemoan themselves. 2. That they would be apt by degrees to grow insensible and stupid under the hand of God, and would need to be still called upon to afflict their souls yet more and more, till their proud and hard hearts were thoroughly humbled and softened.

Thirdly. Causes for lamentation are here assigned, and the calamities that are to be bewailed are very particularly and pathetically described.

1. Multitudes perish by famine, a very sore judgment; and piteous is the case of those that fall under it. God had corrected them by scarcity of provisions through want of rain some time before, Jer. xiv. 1, and they were not brought to repentance by that lower degree of this judgment; and therefore now, by the straitness of the siege, God brought it upon them in extremity; for, 1st. The children died for hunger in their mothers' arms; "The children and sucklings" whose innocent and helpless state entitle them to relief as soon as any, yet they "swoon in the streets," ver. 11; "as the wounded," ver. 12. There being no food to be had for them, they that are starved die as surely as they that are stabbed. They lie a great while crying to their poor mothers for corn to feed them, and wine to refresh them; for they are such as had been bred up to the use of wine, and wanted it now, but there is none for them; so that at length "their souls are poured out into their mothers' bosom," and there they breathe their last. This is mentioned again, ver. 19, they "faint for hunger in the top of every street." Yet this is not the worst. 2nd. There were some little children that were slain by their mothers' hands, and eaten, ver. 20. Such was the scarcity of provision, that the women ate the fruit of their own bodies, even their children, when they were but of five span long, according to the threatening, Deu. xxviii. 53. The like was done in the siege of Samaria, 2 Kin. vi. 29; such extremities, nay, such barbarities, were they brought to by the famine. Let us in our abundance thank God that we have food convenient not only for ourselves, but for our children.

2. Multitudes fall by the sword, which devours one as well as another, especially when it is in the hand of such cruel enemies as the Chaldeans were. 1st. They spared no character, no, not the most distinguished; even the priest and the prophet, who of all men, one would think, might expect protection from Heaven, and veneration on earth, yet are slain, not abroad in the field of battle where they are out of their place, as Hophni and Phinehas, but in the sanctuary of the Lord, the place of their business, and which they hoped would have been a refuge to them. 2nd. They spared no age, not those that by reason of their tender or their decrepit age were exempted from taking up the sword, for even they perished by the sword; the young that were not yet come to bear arms, and the old that had their quietus, yet lie on the ground slain in the streets, till some kind hand is found that will bury them. 3rd. They spared no sex; "My virgins and my young men are fallen by the sword." In the most barbarous military executions that ever we read of, the virgins are spared and made part of the spoil, Num. xxxi. 28; Jud. v. 30; but here the virgins were put to the sword, as well as the young men. 4th. This was the Lord's doing, he suffered the sword of the Chaldeans to devour thus without distinction; "Thou hast slain them in the day of thine anger," for it is God that kills and makes them alive, and saves alive as he pleaseth. But that which follows is very harsh; "Thou hast killed and not pitied," for his soul is grieved for the misery of Israel. The enemies that used them thus cruelly were such as he had both mustered and summoned; ver. 22, "Thou hast called as in a solemn day my terrors round about;" that is, the Chaldeans, that are such a terror to me. Enemies crowded into Jerusalem now as thick as ever worshippers used to do on a solemn festival, so that we were quite overpowered with numbers, and "none escaped nor remained;" Jerusalem was made a perfect slaughter-house. Mothers are cut to the heart to see those whom they have taken such care of, and pains with, and whom they have been so tender of, thus inhumanly used; suddenly cut off that were not so soon reared. "Those that I have swaddled and brought up hath mine enemy consumed," as if they were brought forth for the murderer, like lambs for the butcher, Hos. ix. 13. Zion, that was a mother to them all, lamented to see those who were brought up in her courts, and under the tuition of her oracles, thus made a prey.

3. Their false prophets cheated them, ver. 14. This was a thing which Jeremiah had lamented long before, and had observed with a great concern,

"habitations" is understood of towns and houses, "strongholds" of real fortifications, and "kingdom" and "princes" of the realm and its rulers.

ii. 4. In the Hebrew this is very graphic. The archer has bent his bow, and his right hand is upon the string, steadying the arrow and preparing to shoot, or, as we might say, in the act of taking aim. "All that were pleasant to the eye in the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion" signifies all our beloved ones, the dearest members of our families. As in many other cases, "all" must be taken as requiring some limitation.

ii. 5. The Hebrew words rendered "swallowed" really have that meaning, but they often occur, as here, in the sense of "destroyed."

ii. 6. The first clause may be understood to denote that the tabernacle of his people had been broken down and trodden upon, as a garden might be by the invader, who is reckless of beauty. For "tabernacle" some translate "fence" or "enclosure."

Jer. xiv. 13, "Ah, Lord God, the prophets say unto them, Ye shall not see the sword." And here he inserts it among his lamentations, "Thy prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee;" they pretended to discover for thee, and then to discover to thee, the mind and will of God, to see the visions of the Almighty, and then to speak his words: but they were all vain and foolish things, their visions were all their own fancies, and if they thought they had any it was only the product of a crazed head, or a heated imagination, as appeared by what they delivered, which was all idle and impertinent. Nay, it is most likely they themselves knew the visions they pretended were counterfeit, and all a sham, and made use of only to colour that which they designedly imposed upon the people with, that they might make an interest in them for themselves. They are thy prophets, not God's prophets; he never sent them, nor were they pastors after his heart, but the people set them up, told them what they should say, so that they were prophets after their hearts. 1st. Prophets should tell people of their faults; should shew them their sins, that they may bring them to repentance, and so prevent their ruin. But these prophets knew that would lose them the people's affections and contributions, and knew they could not reprove their hearers without reproaching themselves at the same time; and therefore, "They have not discovered thine iniquity;" they saw it not themselves, or, if they did, saw so little evil in it or danger by it, that they would not tell them of it, though that might have been a means by taking away their iniquity to turn away their captivity. 2nd. Prophets should warn people of the judgments of God coming upon them; but these saw for them false burthens. The messages they pretended to deliver to them from God they knew to be false and falsely ascribed to God, so that by soothing them up in carnal security they caused that banishment which by plain dealing they might have prevented.

4. Their neighbours laughed at them; ver. 15, "All that pass by thee clap their hands at thee." Jerusalem had made a great figure, got a great name, and borne a great sway among the nations; it was the envy and terror of all about, and when that city was thus reduced they all (as men are apt to do in such a case) triumphed in its fall; "They hissed and wagged the head," pleasing themselves to see how much it was fallen from its former pretension. "Is this the city," said they, "that men called The perfection of beauty?" Ps. l. 2. How is it now the perfection of deformity! Where is all its beauty now? "Is this the city that was" called "the joy of the whole earth," Ps. xlviii. 2; which rejoiced in the gifts of God's bounty and grace more than any other place, and which all the earth rejoiced in? where is all its joy now, and all its glorying? It is a great sin thus to make a jest of others' miseries, and adds very much affliction to the afflicted.

5. Their enemies triumphed over them, ver. 16. Those that wished ill to Jerusalem and her peace now vent their spite and malice, which before they concealed; they now open their mouths, nay, they widen them, they hiss and gnash their teeth in scorn and indignation; they triumph in their own success against her, and the rich prey they have got in making themselves masters of Jerusalem. We have swallowed her up, it is our doing, and it is our gain, it is all our own now; Jerusalem shall never be either courted or feared as she has been; certainly "this is the day that we have long looked for, we have found it, we have seen it; aha! so would we have it." Note, The enemies of the church are apt to take its shocks for its ruins, and to triumph in them accordingly. But they will find themselves deceived, for "the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church."

6. Their God in all this appeared against them; ver. 17, "The Lord hath done that which he had devised." The destroyers of Jerusalem could have no power against her unless it were given them from above. They are but the sword in God's hand, it is he that has thrown down, and has not pitied; that is, in this controversy of his with us we have not had the usual instances of his compassion towards us; "He hath caused the enemy to rejoice over thee:" see Job xxx. 11. "He hath set up the horn of thine adversaries;" hath given them power, and matter for pride. This is indeed the highest aggravation of the trouble, that God is become their enemy, and yet it is the strongest argument for patience under it. We are bound to submit to what God doth, for, 1st. It is the performance of his purpose; "The Lord has done that which he had devised." It is done with counsel and deliberation, not rashly or upon a sudden resolve; it is the evil that he has framed, Jer. xviii. 11; and we may be sure it is framed so as exactly to answer the intention. What God deviseth against his people is designed for them, and so it will be found in the issue. 2nd. It is the accomplishment of his predictions; it is the fulfilling of the Scripture. He has now put in execution "his word that he had commanded in the days of old." When he gave them his law by Moses, he told them what judgments he would certainly inflict upon them if they transgressed that law; and now they had been guilty of the transgression of this law he had executed the sentence of it, according to Lev. xxvi. 16, &c.; Deu. xxviii. 15. Note, In all the providences of God concerning his church, it is good to take notice of the fulfilling of his word; for there is an exact agreement between the judgments of God's hand and the judgments of his mouth, and when they are compared they will mutually explain and illustrate each other.

Fourthly. Comforts for the cure of these lamentations are here sought for and prescribed. 1. They are sought for and inquired after, ver. 13. The prophet seeks to find out some suitable, acceptable words to say to her in this case; Wherewith shall I "comfort thee, O virgin daughter of Zion?" Note, We should endeavour to comfort those whose calamities we lament; and when our passions have made the worst of them, our wisdom should correct them, and labour to make the best of them. We should study to make our sympathies with our afflicted friends turn to their consolation. Now the two most common topics of comfort in case of affliction are here tried, but are laid by because they would not hold. We commonly endeavour to comfort our friends by telling them, 1st. That their case is not singular, nor without precedent; there are many whose trouble is greater, and lies heavier upon them than theirs doth. But Jerusalem's will not admit this argument; "What thing shall I liken to thee, or what shall I equal to thee, that I may comfort thee?" What city, what country is there whose case is parallel to thine? What witness shall I produce to prove an example that will reach thy present calamitous event? Alas, there is none; no sorrow like thine, because there is none whose honour was like thine. 2nd. We tell them that their case is not desperate, but it may easily be remedied; but neither will that be admitted here upon a view of human probabilities, for "thy breach is great like the sea," like the breach which the sea sometimes makes upon the land, which cannot be repaired, but still grows wider and wider. Thou art wounded, and "who shall heal thee?" No wisdom or power of man can repair the desolations of such a broken, shattered state; it is to no purpose, therefore, to administer any of these common cordials; therefore, 2. The method of cure prescribed is, to address themselves to God, and by a penitent prayer to commit their case to him, and to be instant and constant in such prayers; ver. 19, "Arise," out of thy dust, out of thy despondency, "cry out in the night," watch unto prayer; when others are asleep, be thou upon thy knees, importunate with God for mercy; "in the beginning of the watches," of each of the four watches of the night, let thine eyes prevent them, (Ps. cxix. 148,) then "pour out thine heart like water before the Lord:" be free and full in prayer, be sincere and serious in prayer, open thy mind, spread thy case before the Lord: "Lift up thine hands towards him" in holy desire and expectation; beg "for the life of thy young children," those poor lambs, what have they done? 2 Sam. xxiv. 17. Take with you words, take with you these words, ver. 20, "Behold, O Lord, and consider to whom thou hast done this;" with whom thou hast dealt thus. Are they not thine own; the seed of Abraham thy friend, and of Jacob thy chosen? Lord, take their case into thy compassionate consideration. Note, Prayer is a salve for every sore, even the sorest, a remedy for every malady, even the most grievous. And our business in prayer is not to prescribe, but to subscribe to the wisdom and will of God; to refer our case to him, and then leave it with him. "Lord," behold and consider," and "thy will be done."

CHAPTER III.

The scope of this chapter is the same with that of the two foregoing chapters, but the composure is somewhat different; that was in long verse, this in short, another kind of metre; that was in single alphabets, this in a treble one. Here is, I. A sad complaint of God's displeasure, and the fruits of it, ver. 1—20. II. Words of comfort to God's people when they are in trouble and distress, ver. 21—36. III. Duty prescribed in this afflicted state, ver. 37—41. IV. The complaint renewed, ver. 42—54. V. Encouragement taken to hope in God, and continue waiting for his salvation; with an appeal to his justice against the persecutors of the church, ver. 55—63. Some make all this to be spoken by the prophet himself when he was imprisoned and persecuted, but it seems rather to be spoken in the person of the church now in captivity, and in a manner desolate; and in the desolations of which the prophet did in a particular manner interest himself. But the complaints here are somewhat more general than those in the foregoing chapter, being accommodated to the case as well of particular persons as of the public; and intended for the use of the closet rather than of the solemn assembly. Some think Jeremiah makes these complaints not only as an intercessor for Israel, but as a type of Christ, who was thought by some to be Jeremias the weeping prophet, because he was much in tears, Mat. xvi. 14, and to him many of the passages here may be applied.

I AM the man that hath seen affliction by the rod of his wrath. [into light.

The title of the 102nd psalm might very fitly be prefixed to this chapter, "The prayer of the afflicted when he is overwhelmed, and pours out his complaint before the Lord;" for it is very feelingly and fluently that the complaint is here poured out. Let us observe the particulars of it.

First. The prophet complains that God is angry. This gives both birth and bitterness to the affliction; ver. 1, "I am the man," the remarkable man, "that hath seen affliction," and has felt it sensibly "by the rod of his wrath." Note, God is sometimes angry with his own people; yet it is to be complained of, not as a sword to cut off, but only as a rod to correct; it is to them the rod of his wrath, a chastening which, though grievous for the present, will in the issue be advantageous. By this rod we must expect to see affliction; and, if we be made to see more than ordinary affliction by that rod, we must not quarrel, for we are sure the anger is just, and the affliction mild, and mixed with mercy.

Secondly. That he is at a loss, and altogether in the dark. Darkness is put for great trouble and perplexity; that want both of comfort and of direction. This was the case of the complainant; ver. 2, "He hath led me" by his providence, and an unaccountable chain of events, "into darkness but not into light," the darkness I feared, and not into the light I hoped for. And, ver. 6, "He hath set me in dark places," dark as the grave, "like those that be dead of old," that are quite forgotten, nobody knows who or what they were. Note, The Israel of God, though children of light, sometimes walk in darkness.

ii. 9. This verse seems clearly enough to show that when it was written the king and the princes of Judah were among the captives at Babylon. On this point see 2 Kings xxiv. 14, 15, and xxv. 7. The words, "the law (torah) is no more" plainly refer to the law of Moses, not as lost, nor as annulled, but as unobserved. Indeed, how was it possible in such circumstances to carry out the provisions of the law?

ii. 10. The throwing of dust upon the head in token of lamentation seems to have been common in ancient times, as it was known among the Jews and Egyptians, while Virgil makes one of his characters "sprinkle his hoary head with dust" on the death of his son. The Greeks were acquainted with the practice, and it is mentioned by Euripides, and at a much earlier date by Homer, in the "Iliad" (Book xviii.).

ii. 11. This language is said to be physiologically correct. It refers to the bile which is formed in a receptacle or vessel on the lower surface of the liver, and is more freely discharged during Thirdly. That God appears against him as an enemy, as a professed enemy. God had been for him, but now "sorely against me is he turned," ver. 3, as far as I can discern, for "his hand is turned against me all the day, I am chastened every morning," Ps. lxxiii. 14. And when God's hand is continually turned against us we are tempted to think that his heart is turned against us too. God had said once, Hos. v. 14, "I will be as a lion to the house of Judah," and now he has made his word good; ver. 10, "He was unto me as a bear lying in wait," surprising me with his judgments, "and as a lion in secret places," so that which way soever I went, I was in continual fear of being set upon, and could never think myself safe. Do men shoot at those they are enemies to? "He hath bent his bow," the bow that was ordained against the church's persecutors, that is bent against her sons; ver. 12, "He hath set me as a mark for his arrow," which he aims at, and will be sure to hit, and then "the arrows of his quiver enter into my reins," give me a mortal wound, an inward wound, ver. 13. Note, God has many arrows in his quiver, and they fly swift, and pierce deep.

Fourthly. That he is as one sorely afflicted both in body and mind. The Jewish state may now be fitly compared to a man wrinkled with age, for which there is no remedy; ver. 4, "My flesh and my skin has he made old," they are wasted and withered, and I look like one that is ready to drop into the grave. Nay, he has broken my bones, and so disabled me to help myself; ver. 15, "He has filled me with bitterness," a bitter sense of these calamities. God has access to the spirit, and can so embitter that, as thereby to embitter all the enjoyments, as, when the stomach is foul, whatever is eaten sours in it. "He hath made me drunk with wormwood;" that is, so intoxicated me with the sense of my afflictions, that I know not what to say or do. He hath mingled gravel with my bread, so that my teeth are broken with it, ver. 16, and what I eat is neither pleasant nor nourishing. "He hath covered me with ashes," as mourners used to be: or, as some read it, He hath fed me with ashes; "I have eaten ashes like bread," Ps. cii. 9.

Fifthly. That he is not able to discern any way of escape or deliverance; ver. 5, "He hath builded against me," as forts and batteries are built against a besieged city,—where there was a way open it is now quite made up; "he hath compassed me" on every side "with gall and travel;" that is, I vex, and fret, and tire myself, to find a way of escape, but can find none; ver. 7, "He hath hedged me about that I cannot get out." When Jerusalem was besieged, it is said to be compassed in on every side, Lu. xix. 43. I am chained, and, as some notorious malefactors are double fettered and loaded with irons, so "he hath made my chain heavy." And so, ver. 9, "He hath inclosed my ways with hewn stone;" not only hedged up my way with thorns, Hos. ii. 6, but stopped it up with a stone wall, which cannot be broken through, so that "my paths are made crooked;" that is, I traverse to and fro, to the right hand, to the left, to try to get forward, but am still turned back. Those that walk in the crooked paths of sin, crossing God's laws, it is just with God to make them walk in the crooked paths of affliction, crossing their designs, and breaking their measures. So ver. 11, "He hath turned aside my ways:" that is, hath blasted all my counsels, ruined my projects, so that I am necessitated to yield to my own ruin; he hath "pulled me in pieces," he hath torn and gone away, Hos. v. 14, "and hath made me desolate," has deprived me of all society and all comfort in my own soul.

Sixthly. That God turns a deaf ear to his prayers; ver. 8, "When I cry and shout," as one in earnest, as one that would make him hear, yet "he shuts out my prayer," and will not suffer it to have access to him. God's ear useth to be open to the prayers of his people, and his door of mercy to them that knock at it; but now both are shut, even to one that cries and shouts. Thus sometimes God seems to be angry, even against the prayers of his people, Ps. lxxx. 4, and their case is deplorable indeed, when they are denied not only the benefit of an answer, but the comfort of acceptance.

Seventhly. That his neighbours make a laughing matter of his troubles; ver. 14, "I was a derision to all my people," to all the wicked among them, that made themselves and one another merry with the public judgments; and particularly the prophet Jeremiah's griefs. "I am their song," their neginoth, or hand instrument of music, their tabret, Job xvii. 6, that they play upon, as Nero on his harp when Rome was on fire.

Eighthly. That he was ready to despair of relief and deliverance. Thou hast not only taken peace from me, but hast "removed my soul far off from peace," ver. 17, so that it is not only not within reach, but not within ken. "I forgat prosperity;" it is so long since I had it, and so unlikely that I should ever recover it, that I have lost the idea of it; have been so inured to sorrow and servitude, that I know not what joy and liberty mean. I have even given up all for gone, concluding, "My strength and my hope is perished from the Lord," ver. 18; that is, I can no longer stay myself upon God as my support, for I do not find he gives me encouragement to do so; nor can I look for his appearing in my behalf, so as to put an end to my troubles, for the case seems remediless, and even my God inexorable. Without doubt it was his infirmity to say thus, Ps. lxxvii. 10; for with God there is everlasting strength, and he is his people's never-failing hope, whatever they may think.

Ninthly. That grief returned upon every remembrance of his troubles; and his reflections were as melancholy as his prospects, ver. 19, 20. Did he endeavour, as Job did, to forget his complaint, Job ix. 27, alas, it was to no purpose; he remembers upon all occasions "the affliction and the misery, the wormwood and the gall." Thus emphatically doth he speak of his affliction, for thus did he think of it, thus heavy did it lie when he reviewed it. It was an affliction that was misery itself; 'My affliction and my transgression,' so some read it, my trouble, and my sin that brought it upon me; that was the wormwood and the gall in the affliction and the misery; it is sin that makes the cup of affliction a bitter cup. "My soul hath them still in remembrance." The captives in Babylon had all the miseries of the siege in their mind continually, and the flames and ruins of Jerusalem still before their eyes, and wept when they remembered Zion; nay, they could never forget Jerusalem, Ps. cxxxvii. 1, 5. My soul having them in remembrance, is humbled in me; not only oppressed with a sense of the trouble, but in bitterness for sin. Note, It becomes us to have humble hearts under humbling providences, and to renew our penitent humiliations for sin upon every remembrance of our afflictions and miseries. Thus we may get good by former corrections, and prevent farther.

21 This I recall to my mind, therefore have I hope.
22 It is of the LORD's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not.
23 They are new every morning: great is thy faithfulness.
24 The LORD is my portion, saith my soul; therefore will I hope in him.
25 The LORD is good unto them that wait for him, to the soul that seeketh him.
26 It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the LORD.
27 It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth.
28 He sitteth alone and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him. [hope.
29 He putteth his mouth in the dust; if so be there may be 30 He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth him; he is filled full with reproach.
31 For the Lord will not cast off for ever:
32 But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies. [men.
33 For he doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of 34 To crush under his feet all the prisoners of the earth, 35 To turn aside the right of a man before the face of the most High,
36 To subvert a man in his cause, the Lord approveth not.

Here the clouds begin to scatter, and the sky to clear up. The complaint was very melancholy in the former part of the chapter, and yet here the tune is altered, and the mourners in Zion begin to look a little pleasant. But for hope the heart would break. To save the heart from being quite broken, here is something called to mind, which gives ground for hope, ver. 21, which refers to what comes after, not to what goes before,—this that follows, 'I make to return to my heart,' so the margin words it. What we have had in our hearts, and have laid to our hearts, is sometimes as if it were quite lost and forgotten, till God by his grace make it return to our hearts, that it may be ready to us when we have occasion to use it. "I recall it to mind, therefore have I hope," and am kept from downright despair. Let us see what these things are which he calls to mind.

First. That, as bad as things are, it is owing to the mercy of God that they are not worse. We are afflicted by the rod of his wrath, but "it is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed," ver. 22. When we are in distress, we should, for the encouragement of our faith and hope, observe what makes for us, as well as what makes against us. Things are bad, but they might have been worse, and therefore there is hope they may be better. Observe here, 1. The streams of mercy acknowledged: "We are not consumed." Note, The church of God is like Moses' bush, burning, yet not consumed; whatever hardships it has met with, or may meet with, it shall have a being in the world to the end of time. It is persecuted of men, but not forsaken of God; and therefore, though it is cast down, it is not destroyed, 2 Cor. iv. 9; corrected, yet not consumed; refined in the furnace as silver, yet not consumed as dross. 2. These streams followed up to the fountain: "It is of the Lord's mercies." Here are mercies in the plural number, noting the abundance and variety of those mercies God is an inexhaustible fountain of mercy, the Father of mercies. Note, We all owe it to the sparing mercy of God that we are not consumed. Others have been consumed round about us, and we ourselves have been in the consuming, and yet we are not consumed; we are out of the grave, we are out of hell. Had we been dealt with according to our sin, we had been consumed long ago; but we have been dealt with according to God's mercies, and we are bound to acknowledge it to his praise.

Secondly. That even in the depth of their affliction they still have experience of the tenderness of the Divine pity, and the truth of the Divine promise. They had several times complained that God had not pitied, ch. ii. 17, 21; but here they correct themselves, and own, 1. That God's "compassions fail not." They do not really fail, no, not then when in anger he seems to have shut up his tender mercies. These rivers of mercy run fully and constantly, but never run dry. No, "they are new every morning;" that is, every morning we have fresh instances of God's compassion towards us; he visits us with them every morning, Job vii. 18; "Every morning doth he bring his judgment to light, Zeph. iii. 5. When our comforts fail, yet God's compassions do not. 2. That great is his faithfulness. Though the covenant seemed to be broken, they own that it still continues in full force; and though Jerusalem be in ruins, "the truth of the Lord endures for ever." Note, Whatever hard things we suffer, we must never entertain any hard thoughts of God, but must still be ready to own that he is both kind and faithful.

Thirdly. That God is and ever will be the all-sufficient happiness of his people, and they have chosen him, and depend upon him to be so; ver. 24, "The Lord is my portion, saith my soul." That is, 1. When I have lost all I have in the world, liberty, and livelihood, and almost life itself, yet I have not lost my interest in God. Portions on earth are perishing things, but God is a portion for ever. 2. While I have an interest in God, therein I have enough. I have that which is sufficient to balance all my troubles, and make up all my losses. Whatever we are robbed of, our portion is safe. 3. This is that which I depend upon, and rest satisfied with; "therefore will I hope in him." I will stay myself upon him, and encourage myself in him, when all other supports and encouragements fail me. Note, It is our duty to make God the portion of our souls, and then to make use of him as our portion, and to take the comfort of it in the midst of our lamentations.

Fourthly. That those who deal with God will find it is not in vain to trust in him; for, 1. He is good to those that do so, ver. 25. He is good to all, his tender mercies are over all his works, all his creatures taste of his goodness; but he is in a particular manner "good to them that wait for him, to the soul that seeketh him." Note, While trouble is prolonged, and deliverance is deferred, we must patiently wait for God and his gracious returns to us; while we wait for him by faith we must seek him by prayer; our souls must seek him, else we do not seek so as to find. Our seeking will help to keep up our waiting; and to those who thus wait and seek God will be gracious; he will shew them his marvellous lovingkindness. 2. They that do so will find it good for them; ver. 26, "It is good," it is our duty, and will be our unspeakable comfort and satisfaction "to hope and quietly to wait for the salvation of the Lord." To hope that it will come, though the difficulties that lie in the way of it seem insupportable; to wait till it doth come, though it be long delayed; and while we wait to be quiet and silent, not quarrelling with God, or making ourselves uneasy, but acquiescing in the Divine disposals; "Father, thy will be done." If we call this to mind, we may have hope that all will end well at last.

Fifthly. That afflictions are really good for us; and if we bear them aright will work very much for our good. It is not only good to hope and wait for the salvation, but it is good to be under the trouble in the mean time; ver. 27, "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth." Many of the young men were carried into captivity, and, to make them easy in it, he tells them it excitement caused by vehement grief and other passions. The words point therefore to violent emotion.

ii. 14. The Hebrew term for "foolish things" is peculiar, and may be explained of what we familiarly call rubbish or nonsense, but such nonsense as the people believed in to their undoing.

ii. 16, 17. The order of these two verses is inverted in most manuscripts and versions, but is regular in the Syriac and a few Hebrew copies.

ii. 18. The apple of the eye is called the daughter of the eye in Hebrew, and should be translated "pupil of the eye," which has an analogous meaning.

ii. 20. The frightful results of famine, indicated by women eating their little children, have been often paralleled in history.

ii. 22. Scott observes, "The enemies of their nation, at the call of Providence, flocked from all around, to profane the Temple, and to terrify the worshippers, even as the people had been used to flock was good for them to bear the yoke of that captivity; and they would find it so if they would but accommodate themselves to their condition, and labour to answer God's ends in laying that heavy yoke upon them. It is very applicable to the yoke of God's commands; it is good for young people to take that yoke upon them in their youth. We cannot begin too soon to be religious; it will make our duty the more acceptable to God, and easy to ourselves, if we engage in it when we are young. But here it seems to be meant of the yoke of affliction; many have found it good to bear this in youth; it has made them humble and serious, and hath weaned them from this world, who otherwise would have been proud and unruly, and as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke. But when do we bear the yoke so as that it is really good for us to bear it in youth? He answers in the following verses:

1. When we are sedate and quiet under our afflictions; when we sit alone, and keep silence, do not run to and fro into all companies with our complaints, aggravating our calamities, and quarrelling with the disposals of Providence concerning us, but retire into privacy that we may in a day of adversity consider; sit alone that we may converse with God, and commune with our own hearts, silencing all discontented, distrustful thoughts, and laying our hand upon our mouth, as Aaron, who under a very severe trial held his peace. We must keep silence under the yoke, as those that have borne it upon us; not wilfully pulled it upon our own necks, but patiently submitted to it when God laid it upon us. When those that are afflicted in their youth accommodate themselves to their afflictions, fit their necks to the yoke, and study to answer God's end in afflicting them, then they will find it good for them to bear it, for "it yields the peaceable fruit of righteousness to those who are" thus "exercised thereby."

2. When we are humble and patient under our affliction. He gets good by the yoke that puts his mouth in the dust; not only lays his hand upon his mouth, in token of submission to the will of God in the affliction, but puts it in the dust, in token of sorrow, and shame, and self-loathing, at the remembrance of sin, and as one perfectly reduced and reclaimed, and brought as those that are vanquished to lick the dust, Ps. lxxii. 9. And we must thus humble ourselves, "if so be there may be hope," or, as it is in the original, 'peradventure there is hope.' If there be any way to acquire and secure a good hope under our afflictions, it is this way, and yet we must be very modest in our expectation of it, must look for it with an 'it may be,' as those that own ourselves utterly unworthy of it. Note, Those that are truly humbled for sin will be glad to obtain a good hope through grace upon any terms, though they put their mouth in the dust for it; and those that would have hope must do so, and ascribe it to free grace if they have any encouragements which may keep their hearts from sinking into the dust when they put their mouth there.

3. When we are meek and mild towards those that are the instruments of our trouble, and are of a forgiving spirit, ver. 30. He gets good by the yoke that giveth his cheek to him that smiteth him, and rather turns the other cheek (Mat. v. 39) than returns the second blow. Our Lord Jesus has left us an example of this, for "he gave his back to the smiters," Isa. l. 6. He that can bear contempt and reproach, and not render railing for railing, and bitterness for bitterness, that when he is filled full with reproach keeps it to himself, and doth not retort it, and empty it again upon those that filled him with it, but pours it out before the Lord, (as those did, Ps. cxxiii. 4, whose souls were exceedingly filled with the contempt of the proud,) he shall find it good to bear the yoke, and that it shall turn to his spiritual advantage. The sum is, If tribulation work patience, that patience will work experience, and that experience a hope that maketh not ashamed.

Sixthly. That God will graciously return to his people with seasonable comforts according to the time that he has afflicted them, ver. 31, 32. Therefore the sufferer is thus penitent, thus patient, because he believes that God is gracious and merciful, which is the great inducement both to evangelical repentance and to Christian patience. We may bear up ourselves with this, 1. That when we are cast down, yet we are not cast off. The father's correcting his son is not a disinheriting of him. 2. That though we may seem to be cast off for a time, while sensible comforts are suspended, and desired salvations deferred, yet we are not really cast off, because not cast off for ever; the controversy with us shall not be perpetual. 3. That, whatever sorrow we are in, it is what God has allotted us, and his hand is in it. It is he that causeth grief, and therefore we may be sure it is ordered wisely and graciously; and it is but for a season and when need is, that we are in heaviness, 1 Pet. i. 6. 4. That God hath compassions and comforts in store, even for those whom he hath himself grieved. We must be far from thinking that, though God cause grief, the world will relieve and help us; no, the very same that caused the grief must bring in the favour, or we are undone; una eademque manus vulnus opemque tulit,—'the same hand inflicts the wound that heals it.' He hath torn, and he will heal us, Hos. vi. 1. 5. That when God returns to deal graciously with us it will not be according to our merits, but according to his mercies, according to the multitude, the abundance of his mercies. So unworthy we are, that nothing but an abundant mercy will relieve us, and from that what may we not expect? And God's causing our grief ought to be no discouragement at all to those expectations.

Seventhly. That when God doth cause grief it is for wise and holy ends; and he takes not delight in our calamities, ver. 33. He doth indeed afflict and grieve the children of men, all their grievances and afflictions are from him; but he doth not do it willingly, not from the heart, so the word is; that is, 1. He never afflicts us but when we give him cause to do it. He doth not dispense his frowns as he doth his favours, ex mero motu,—'from his mere good pleasure;' if he shew us kindness it is because so it seemeth good unto him; but if he write bitter things against us, it is because we both deserve it and need it. 2. He doth not afflict with pleasure. He delights not in the death of sinners, or the disquiet of saints, but punisheth with a kind of reluctancy; he comes out of his place to punish, for his place is the mercy seat. He delights not in the misery of any of his creatures; but for his own people he is so far from it, that in all their afflictions he is afflicted, and his soul is grieved for the misery of Israel. 3. He retains his kindness for his people even when he afflicts them. If he doth not willingly grieve the children of men, much less his own children. However it be, yet God is good to them, Ps. lxxiii. 1; and they may by faith see love in his heart, even then when they see frowns in his face, and a rod in his hand.

Eighthly. That though he makes use of men as his hand, or rather instruments in his hand, for the correcting of his people, yet he is far from being pleased with the injustice of their proceedings and the wrong they do them, ver. 34—36. Though God serve his own purposes by the violence of wicked and unreasonable men, yet it doth not therefore follow that he countenanceth that violence, as his oppressed people are sometimes tempted to think; Hab. i. 13, "Wherefore lookest thou upon them that deal treacherously?" Two ways the people of God are injured and oppressed by their enemies, and the prophet here assures us that God doth not approve of either of them. 1. If men injure them by force of arms, God doth not approve of that. He doth not himself crush under his feet the prisoners of the earth, but he regards the cry of the prisoners; nor doth he approve of men's doing it, nay, he is much displeased with it. It is barbarous to trample on them that are down, and to crush those that are bound, and cannot help themselves. 2. If men injure them under colour of law, and in the pretended administration of justice, if they turn aside the right of a man so that he cannot discover what his rights are, or cannot come at them, they are out of his reach—if they subvert a man in his cause, and bring in a wrong verdict, or give a false judgment—let them know, 1st. That God sees them. It is before the face of the Most High, ver. 53, it is in his sight, under his eye, and is very displeasing to him; they cannot but know it is so, and therefore it is in defiance of him that they do it. He is the Most High, whose authority over them they contemn, by abusing their authority over their subjects; not considering that He that is higher than the highest regardeth, Eccl. v. 8. 2nd. That God doth not approve of them. More is implied than is expressed. The perverting of justice, and the subverting of the just, is a great affront to God; and though he may make use of this for the correction of his people, yet he will sooner or later severely reckon with those that do thus. Note, However God may for a time suffer evil doers to prosper, and serve his own purposes by them, yet he doth not therefore approve of their evil doings. Far be it from God that he should do iniquity, or countenance those that do it.

41 Let us lift up our heart with our hands unto God in the heavens.

That we may be entitled to the comforts administered to the afflicted in the foregoing verses, and may taste the sweetness of them, we have here the duties of an afflicted state prescribed to us, in the performance of which we may expect those comforts.

First. We must see and acknowledge the hand of God in all the calamities that befall us at any time, whether personal or public, ver. 37, 38. This is here laid down as a great truth, which will help to quiet our spirits under our afflictions, and to sanctify them to us. 1. That, whatever men's actions are, it is God that overrules them; "Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass," that is, that designs a thing, and brings his designs to effect, "if the Lord commandeth it not?" Men can do nothing but according to the counsel of God, nor have any power or success but what is given them from above. "A man's heart deviseth his way," he projects and purposeth, he saith he will do so and so, Jas. iv. 13; but the Lord directeth his steps far otherwise than he designed them, and what he contrived and expected doth not come to pass unless it be what God's hand and his counsel had determined before to be done, Pr. xvi. 9; Jer. x. 23. The Chaldeans said they would destroy Jerusalem, and it came to pass, not because they said it, but because God commanded it, and commissioned them to do it. Note, Men are but tools which the great God makes use of, and manageth as he pleaseth in the government of this lower world, and they cannot accomplish any of their designs without him. 2. That, whatever men's lot is, it is God that orders it; "Out of the mouth of the Most High doth not evil and good proceed?" Yes, certainly it doth; and it is more emphatically expressed in the original: 'Doth not this evil, and this good, proceed out of the mouth of the Most High?' Is it not what he has ordained and appointed for us? Yes, certainly it is; and for the reconciling of us to our own afflictions, whatever they be, this general truth must thus be particularly applied. This comfort I receive from the hand of God, and shall I not receive that evil also? as Job argues, ch. ii. 10. Are we healthful or sickly, rich or poor? do we succeed in our designs or are we crossed in them? It is all what God ordereth; "every man's judgment proceedeth from him." "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away;" he forms "the light and creates the darkness," as he did at first. Note, All the events of Divine providence are the products of a Divine counsel; whatever is done God has the directing of it, and the works of his hands agree with the words of his mouth,—he speaks and it is done; so easily, so effectually, are all his purposes fulfilled.

Secondly. We must not quarrel with God for any affliction that he lays upon us at any time; ver. 29, "Wherefore doth a living man complain?" The prophet here seems to check himself for the complaints he had made in the former part of the chapter, wherein he seemed to reflect upon God as unkind and severe. Do I well to be angry? Why do I fret thus? Those who in their haste have chidden with God must in the reflection chide themselves for it. From the doctrine of God's sovereign and universal providence which he had asserted in the verses before, he draws this inference, "Wherefore doth a living man complain?" What God doth we must not open our mouths against, Ps. xxxix. 9. They that blame their lot reproach him that allotted it to them. The sufferers in the captivity must submit to the will of God in all their sufferings. Note, Though we may pour out our complaints before God, we must never exhibit any complaints against God. What, "shall a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins!" The reasons here urged are very cogent. 1. We are men; let us herein shew ourselves men. Shall "a mar complain?" and again, "a man!" We are men, and not brutes, reasonable creatures, that should act with reason, that should look upwards, and look forwards, and both ways may fetch considerations enough to silence our complaints. We are men, and not children that cry for every thing that hurts them; we are men, and not gods, subjects, not lords, are not our own masters, nor our own carvers, we are bound and must obey, must submit. We are men, and not angels, and therefore cannot expect to be free from troubles as they are; we are not inhabitants of that world where there is no sorrow, but this, where there is nothing but sorrow. We are men, and not devils, are not in that deplorable, helpless, hopeless state that they are in, but have something to comfort ourselves with which they have not. 2. We are living men; through the good hand of our God upon us we are alive yet, though dying daily; and shall "a living man complain?" No, he has more reason to be thankful for life than to complain of any of the burthens and calamities of life. Our lives are frail, and forfeited, and yet we are alive; now the living, the living they should praise, and not complain, Isa. xxxviii. 19. While there is life there is hope, and therefore, instead of complaining that things are bad, we should encourage ourselves with hopes that they will be better. 3. We are sinful men, and that which we complain of is the just punishment of our sins, nay, it is far less than our iniquities have deserved. We have little reason to complain of our trouble, for it is our own doing, we may thank ourselves, our own wickedness corrects us, Pr. xix. 3; no reason to quarrel with God, for he is righteous in it: he is the governor of the world, and it is necessary he should maintain the honour of his government by chastising the disobedient. Are we suffering for our sins, then let us not complain, for we have other work to do,—instead of repining, we must be repenting; and, as an evidence that God is reconciled to us, we must be endeavouring to reconcile ourselves to his holy will. Are we punished for our sins? It is our wisdom together to keep their solemn festivals." This is substantially correct.

iii. 1. This chapter is arranged somewhat differently from the preceding. In the others the alphabetical order only affected the first of each three lines, but here the first, second, and third begin with a, the fourth, fifth, and sixth with b, and so on. There is also this difference, that in the former the prophet bewailed the calamities of others, but here dwells much upon his own.

iii. 5. To build against means to besiege by erecting mounds and forts like an enemy round a city. The last clause is obscure. Instead of "compassed me with gall and travel," Dr. Henderson has "struck me on the head, and it is distressed," while Fürst renders it conjecturally "he has surrounded me with fortifications and a trench." The Greek version has "encompassed my head;" but the Syriac comes very near that of our translators: "he has surrounded me with bitterness and trouble." The Chaldee is periphrastic.

then to submit, and to kiss the rod; for, if we still walk contrary to God, he will punish us yet seven times more, for when he judgeth he will overcome; but if we accommodate ourselves to him, though we be chastened of the Lord, we shall not be condemned with the world.

Thirdly. We must set ourselves to answer God's intention in afflicting us, which is to bring sin to our remembrance, and to bring us home to himself, ver. 40. These are the two things which our afflictions should put us upon: 1. A serious consideration of ourselves, and a reflection upon our lives past. "Let us search and try our ways," search what they have been, and then try whether they have been right and good, or no. Search as for a malefactor in disguise that flies and hides himself, and then try whether guilty or not guilty. Let conscience be employed both to search and to try, and let it have leave to deal faithfully, to accomplish a diligent search, and to make an impartial trial. Let us try our ways, that by them we may try ourselves; for we are to judge of our state, not by our faint wishes, but by our steps; not by one particular step, but by our ways; the ends we aim at, the rules we go by, and the agreeableness of the temper of our minds, and the tenor of our lives to those ends and those rules. When we are in affliction it is seasonable to consider our ways, Hag. i. 5, that what is amiss may be repented of and amended for the future, and so we may answer the intention of the affliction. We are apt in times of public calamity to reflect upon other people's ways, and lay blame upon them, whereas our business is to search and try our own ways. We have work enough to do at home; we must each of us say, What have I done? What have I contributed to the public flames? that we may each of us mend one, and then we should all be mended. 2. A sincere conversion to God. Let us turn again to the Lord, to him who is turned against us, and whom we have turned from; to him let us turn by repentance and reformation, as to our owner and ruler. We have been with him, and it has never been well with us since we forsook him; let us therefore now turn again to him. This must accompany the former, and be the fruit of it; therefore we must search and try our ways, that we may turn from the evil of them to God. This was the method David took, Ps. cxix. 59, "I thought on my ways, and turned my feet unto thy testimonies."

Fourthly. We must offer up ourselves to God, and our best affections and services in the flames of devotion, ver. 41. When we are in affliction, 1. We must look up to God as a God in the heavens, infinitely above us, and that has an incontestable dominion over us, for the heavens do rule, and are therefore not to be quarrelled with, but submitted to. 2. We must pray to him with a believing expectation to receive mercy from him; for that is implied in our lifting up our hands to him,—a gesture commonly used in prayer, and sometimes put for it, as Ps. cxli. 2, "Let the lifting up of my hands be acceptable in thy sight;" it signifies our requesting mercy from him, and our readiness to receive that mercy. 3. Our hearts must go along with our prayers. We must "lift up our hearts with our hands," as we must pour out our souls with our words. It is the heart that God looks at in that and every other service; for what will a sacrifice without a heart avail? If inward impressions be not in some measure answerable to outward expressions, we do but mock God and deceive ourselves. Praying is lifting up the soul to God, Ps. xxv. 1, as to our Father in heaven; and the soul that hopes to be with God in heaven for ever will thus, by frequent acts of devotion, be still learning the way thither, and pressing forward in that way.

42 We have transgressed and have rebelled: thou hast not pardoned.
43 Thou hast covered with anger, and persecuted us: thou hast slain, thou hast not pitied.
44 Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, that our prayer should not pass through.
45 Thou hast made us as the offscouring and refuse in the midst of the people.
46 All our enemies have opened their mouths against us.
47 Fear and a snare is come upon us, desolation and destruction.
48 Mine eye runneth down with rivers of water for the destruction of the daughter of my people.
49 Mine eye trickleth down, and ceaseth not, without any intermission, 50 Till the LORD look down, and behold from heaven.
51 Mine eye affecteth mine heart because of all the daughters of my city.
52 Mine enemies chased me sore, like a bird, without cause
53 They have cut off my life in the dungeon, and cast a stone upon me.
54 Waters flowed over mine head; then I said, I am cut off.

It is easier to chide ourselves for complaining than to chide ourselves out of it. The prophet had owned that a living man should not complain, as if he checked himself for his complaints in the former part of the chapter; and yet here "the clouds return after the rain," and the wound bleeds afresh; for great pains must be taken with a troubled spirit to bring it into temper.

First. They confess the righteousness of God in afflicting them; ver. 42, "We have transgressed and have rebelled." Note, It becomes us when we are in trouble, to justify God by owning our sins, and laying the load upon ourselves for them. Call sin a transgression, call it a rebellion, and we do not miscall it. This is the result of their searching and trying their ways; the more they inquired into them, the worse they found them.

Secondly. Yet they complain of the afflictions they are under, not without some reflections upon God, which we are not to imitate, but under the sharpest trials must always think and speak highly and kindly of him.

1. They complain of his frowns, and the tokens of his displeasure against them. Their sins were repented of, and yet, ver. 42, "Thou hast not pardoned;" they had not the assurance and comfort of the pardon. The judgments brought upon them for their sins were not removed, and therefore they thought they could not say the sin was pardoned, which was a mistake; but a common mistake with the people of God, when their souls are cast down and disquieted within them. Their case was really piteous, yet they complain, "Thou hast not pitied," ver. 43. Their enemies persecuted and slew them, but that was not the worst of it, they were but the instruments in God's hand; "Thou hast persecuted us, and thou hast slain us," though we expected thou shouldest have protected and delivered us. They complain, that there was a wall of partition between them and God, and, 1st. This hindered God's favours from coming down upon them. The reflected beams of God's kindness to them used to be the beauty of Israel, but now thou hast covered us with anger, so that our glory is concealed and gone; now God is angry with us, and we do not appear that illustrious people that we have formerly been thought to be. Or, thou hast covered us up as men that are buried, are covered up and forgotten. 2nd. It hindered their prayers from coming up unto God; ver. 44. "Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud," not like that bright cloud in which he took possession of the temple, which enabled the worshippers to draw near to him, but like that in which he came down upon mount Sinai, which obliged the people to stand at a distance. This cloud is so thick that our prayers seem as if they were lost in it; they cannot pass through, we cannot obtain an audience. Note, The prolonging of troubles is sometimes a temptation, even to praying people, to question whether God be what they have always believed him to be, a prayer-hearing God.

2. They complain of the contempt of their neighbours, and the reproach and ignominy they were under; ver. 45, "Thou hast made us as the offscouring," or scrapings of the first floor, which are thrown to the dunghill. This St. Paul refers to in his account of the sufferings of the apostles; 1 Cor. iv. 13, "We are made as the filth of the world, and are the offscouring of all things." We are the refuse or dross in the midst of the people, trodden upon by everybody, and looked upon as the vilest of the nations, and good for nothing but to be cast out as salt which has lost its savour. And, ver. 46, "Our enemies have opened their mouths against us," have gaped upon us as roaring lions to swallow us up, or made mouths at us, or have taken liberty to say what they please of us. These complaints we had before, ch. ii. 15, 16. Note, It is common for base and ill-natured men to run upon, and run down, those that are fallen into the depths of distress, from the height of honour. But this they brought upon themselves by sin; if they had not made themselves vile, their enemies could not have made them so; but therefore "men call them reprobate silver because the Lord has rejected them," for rejecting him.

3. They complain of the lamentable destruction that their enemies made of them; ver. 47, "Fear and a snare is come upon us;" the enemies have not only terrified us with those alarms, but prevailed against us by their stratagems, and surprised us with the ambushes they laid for us. And then follows nothing but desolation and destruction; "the destruction of the daughter of my people," ver. 48, of all the daughters of my city, ver. 51. The enemies have taken some of them, like a bird in a snare; chased others, as a harmless bird is chased by a bird of prey; ver. 52, "Mine enemies chased me sore like a bird," which is chased from bush to bush, as Saul hunted David, like a partridge. Thus restless was the enmity of their persecutors, and yet causeless; they have done it without cause, without any provocation given them. Though God was righteous, they were unrighteous. David often complains of those that hated him without cause, and such are the enemies of Christ and his church, Jno. xv. 25. Their enemies chased them till they had quite prevailed over them; ver. 53, "They have cut off my life in the dungeon;" they have shut up their captives in close and dark prisons, where they are as it were cut off from the land of the living, ver. 6; or the state and kingdom is sunk and ruined, the life and being of it is gone, and it is as it were thrown into the dungeon or grave, and a stone cast upon it, such as used to be rolled to the door of the sepulchres. They look upon the Jewish nation as dead and buried, and that there is no possibility of its resurrection. Thus Ezekiel saw it in vision, a valley full of dead and dry bones. Their destruction is compared, not only to the burying of a dead man, but to the sinking of a living man into the water, who cannot long be a living man there; ver. 54, "Waters" of affliction "flowed over mine head;" the deluge prevailed, and quite overwhelmed them; the Chaldean forces broke in upon them, as the breaking forth of waters, which rose so high as to flow over their heads. They could not wade, they could not swim, and therefore must unavoidably sink. Note, The distresses of God's people sometimes prevail to that degree, that they cannot find any footing for their faith, nor keep their head above water, with any comfortable expectation.

4. They complain of their own excessive grief and fear upon this account. 1st. The afflicted church is drowned in tears, and the prophet for her; ver. 48, 49, "Mine eye runs down with rivers of water," so abundant was their weeping; "it trickleth down, and ceaseth not," so constant was their weeping; "without any intermission," there being no relaxation of their miseries. The distemper was in continual extremity, and they had no better day. It is added, ver. 51, "Mine eye affecteth mine heart," my seeing eye affects my heart; the more I look upon the desolations of the city and country, the more I am grieved; which way soever I cast mine eye I see that which renews my sorrow, even "because of all the daughters of my city;" that is, all the neighbouring towns which were as daughters to Jerusalem, the mother city. Or, my weeping eye affects my heart; the venting of the grief, instead of easing it, did but increase and exasperate it. Or, mine eye melteth my soul, that is, I have quite wept away my spirit; not only mine eye is consumed with grief, but my soul and my life is spent with it, Ps. xxxi. 9, 10. Great and long grief exhausts the spirits, and brings not only many a gray head, but many a green head too, to the grave. I weep, saith the prophet, 'more than all the daughters of my city,' so the margin reads it; he outdid even those of the tender sex in the expressions of grief. And it is no diminution to any to be much in tears for the sins of sinners, and the sufferings of saints. Our Lord Jesus was so; for when he came near he beheld this same city, and wept over it, which the daughters of Jerusalem did not. 2nd. She is overwhelmed with fears; not only grieves for what is, but tears worse, and gives up all for gone, ver. 54. Then I said, I am cut off, ruined, and see no hope of recovery; I am as one dead. Note, Those that are cast down are commonly tempted to think themselves cast off, Ps. xxxi. 22; Jonah ii. 4.

5. In the midst of these sad complaints here is one word of comfort, by which it appears that their case was not altogether so bad as they made it, ver. 50. We continue thus weeping "till the Lord look down and behold from heaven." This intimates, 1st. That they were satisfied God's gracious regard to them in their miseries would be an effectual redress of all their grievances. If God, who now covers himself with a cloud, as if he took no notice of our troubles, (Job xxii. 13,) would but shine forth, all would be well. If he look upon us we shall be saved, Ps. lxxx. 19; Dan. ix. 17. As bad as the case is, one favourable look from heaven will set all to rights. 2nd. That they had hopes he would at length look graciously upon them, and relieve them; nay, they take it for granted that he will. Though he contend long, he will not contend for ever, though we deserve he should. 3rd. That while they continued weeping, they continued waiting; and neither did nor would expect relief and succour from any hand but his. Nothing shall comfort them but his gracious returns, nor shall any thing wipe tears from their eyes till he look down. Their eyes, which now run down with water, shall still wait upon the Lord their God until that he have mercy upon them, Ps. cxxiii. 2.

iii. 6. There is thought to be here a reference to the ancient custom of placing the dead in caves and catacombs. But it is not likely that there is any allusion to the mode of burial in a sitting posture, because the word "sit" continually refers to dwelling or abiding in a place. Here, in the sense of setting or placing, it denotes causing to dwell or abide, and points to the dark and helpless condition of the speaker.

iii. 18. In all that precedes the prophet has passed his afflictions in review, and now he reaches the very borders of despair. This is the turning-point, and in what follows he rises, by way of prayer and hope, to a feeling of confidence in God and submission to his will.

iii. 38. It is perhaps scarcely needful to observe that by evil and good here the prophet refers not to moral qualities, but to adversity and prosperity.

iii. 46—48. These three verses begin with the Hebrew letter Pe, and the three next with Ain, whereas in the alphabet Ain comes 55 I called upon thy name, O LORD, out of the low dungeon.

56 Thou hast heard my voice: hide not thine ear at my breathing, at my cry.
57 Thou drewest near in the day that I called upon thee: thou saidst, Fear not.
58 O Lord, thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul; thou hast redeemed my life.
59 O LORD, thou hast seen my wrong: judge thou my cause.
60 Thou hast seen all their vengeance and all their imaginations against me.
61 Thou hast heard their reproach, O LORD, and all their imaginations against me;
62 The lips of those that rose up against me, and their device against me all the day. [their musick.
63 Behold their sitting down, and their rising up; I am
64 Render unto them a recompence, O LORD, according to the work of their hands.
65 Give them sorrow of heart, thy curse unto them.
66 Persecute and destroy them in anger from under the heavens of the LORD.

We may observe throughout this chapter a struggle in the prophet's breast between sense and faith, fear and hope. He complains, and then comforts himself, yet drops his comforts, and returns again to his complaints, as Ps. xlii. But as there, so here, faith gets the last word, and comes off a conqueror, for in these verses he concludes with some comfort; and here are two things with which he comforts himself:

First. His experience of God's goodness, even in his affliction. This may refer to the prophet's personal experience, with which he encourageth himself in reference to the public troubles. He that has seasonably succoured particular saints will not fail the church in general. Or, it may include the remnant of good people that were among the Jews, who had found it was not in vain to wait upon God. In three things the prophet and his pious friends had found God good to them: 1. He had heard their prayers. Though they had been ready to fear that the cloud of wrath was such as their prayers could not pass through, ver. 44; yet upon second thoughts, or at least upon farther trial, they find it otherwise, and that God had not said unto them, Seek ye me in vain. When they were in the low dungeon, as free among the dead, they called upon God's name, ver. 55; their weeping did not hinder praying. Note, Though we are cast into never so low a dungeon, we may from thence find a way of access to God in the highest heavens; "Out of the depths have I cried unto thee," Ps. cxxx. 1; as Jonah out of the whale's belly. And could God hear them out of the low dungeon, and would he? Yes, he did. "Thou hast heard my voice;" and some read the following words as carrying on the same thankful acknowledgment, "Thou didst not hide thine ear at my breathing, at my cry;" and the original will bear that reading. We read it as a petition for farther audience; "Hide not thine ear." God's having heard our voice when we cried unto him, even out of the low dungeon, is an encouragement to us to hope that he will not at any time hide his ear. Observe how he calls prayer his breathing; for in prayer we breathe towards God,—we breathe after him. Though we be but weak in prayer, cannot cry aloud, but only breathe in "groanings that cannot be uttered," yet we shall not be neglected, if we be sincere. Prayer is the breath of the new man, sucking in the air of mercy in petitions, and returning it in praises; it is both the evidence and the maintenance of the spiritual life. Some read it, at my gasping; when I lay gasping for life, and ready to expire, and thought I was breathing my last, then thou tookest cognizance of my distressed case. 2nd. He had silenced their fears, and quieted their spirits; ver. 57, "Thou drewest near in the day that I called upon thee;" that is, thou didst graciously assure me of thy presence with me, and give me to see thee nigh unto me, whereas I had thought thee to be at a distance from me. Note, When we draw nigh to God in a way of duty, we may by faith see him drawing nigh to us in a way of mercy. But this was not all, "Thou saidst, Fear not." This was the language of God's prophets, preaching to them not to fear, Isa. xli. 10, 13. Of his providence preventing those things which they were afraid of, and of his grace quieting their minds, and making them easy, by the witness of his Spirit with their spirits, that they were his people still, though in distress, and therefore ought not to fear. 3rd. He had already begun to appear for them; ver. 58, "O Lord, thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul;" that is, as it follows, "Thou hast redeemed my life," hast rescued that out of the hands of those which would have taken it away, hast saved that when it was ready to be swallowed up, hast given me that for a prey. And this is an encouragement to them to hope that he would yet farther appear for them; "Thou hast delivered my soul from death," and therefore wilt deliver my feet from falling; hast pleaded the causes of my life, and therefore wilt plead my other causes.

Secondly. He comforts himself with an appeal to God's justice, and, in order to the sentence of that, to his omniscience.

1. He appeals to God's knowledge of the matter of fact, how very spiteful and malicious his enemies were; ver. 59, "O Lord, thou hast seen my wrong," that I have done no wrong at all, but suffer a great deal. He that knows all things knew, 1st. The malice they had against him; "Thou hast seen all their vengeance;" how they desire to do me a mischief, as if it were by way of reprisal for some great injury I had done them. Note, We should consider to our terror and caution, that God knows all the revengeful thoughts we have in our minds against others, and therefore not allow of those thoughts, nor harbour them. And that he knows all the revengeful thoughts others have causelessly in their minds against us, and therefore not be afraid of them, but leave it to him to protect us from them. 2nd. The designs and projects they had laid to do him a mischief; "Thou hast seen all their imagination against me," ver. 60; and again, ver. 61, "Thou hast heard all their imaginations against me," both the desire and the device they have to ruin me: whether it shew itself in word or deed it is known to thee; nay, though the products of it are not to be seen or heard, yet their device against me all the day is perceived and understood by him to whom all things are naked and open. Note, The most secret contrivances of the church's enemies are perfectly known to the church's God, from whom they can hide nothing. 3rd. The contempt and calumny wherewith they loaded him; all that they spoke slightly of him, and all that they spoke reproachfully. "Thou hast heard their reproach," ver. 61; all the ill characters they give me, laying to my charge things that I know not, all the methods they use to make me odious and contemptible, even "the lips of those that rose up against me," ver. 62, the contumelious language they use whenever they speak of me; and that at "their sitting down and rising up," when they lie down at night and get up in the morning, when they sit down to their meat, and with their company, and when they rise from both, still "I am their music;" they make themselves and one another merry with my miseries, as the Philistines made sport with Samson; Jerusalem was the tabret they played upon. Perhaps they had some tune, or play, some opera or interlude, that was called, The destruction of Jerusalem, which, though in the nature of a tragedy, was very entertaining to those who wished ill to the holy city. Note, God will one day call sinners to an account for all the hard speeches which they have spoken against him and his people, Jude 15.

2. He appeals to God's judgment upon this fact; "Lord, thou hast seen my wrong;" there is no need of any evidence to prove it, or any prosecutor to enforce or aggravate it, thou seest it in its true colours, and now I leave it with thee, "Judge thou my cause," ver. 59. Let them be dealt with, 1st. As they deserve; ver. 64, "Render to them a recompence according to the work of their hands," that is, let them be dealt with as they have dealt with others; let thy hand be against them as their hand hath been against us. They have created us a great deal of vexation; now, Lord, "give them sorrow of heart," ver. 65. 'Perplexity of heart,' so some read it; let them be surrounded with threatening mischiefs on all sides, and not able to see their way out. 'Despondency of heart,' so others read it; let them be driven to despair, and give themselves up for gone. God can entangle the head that thinks itself clearest, and sink the heart that thinks itself stoutest. 2nd. Let them be dealt with according to the threatenings; "Thy curse unto them," that is, let thy curse come upon them, all the evils that are pronounced in thy word against the enemies of thy people, ver. 65. They have loaded us with curses; "As they loved cursing, so let it come unto them," thy curse, which will make them truly miserable. Theirs is causeless, and therefore fruitless, it shall not come; but thine is just, and shall take effect. Those whom thou cursest are cursed indeed. Let the curse be executed; ver. 66, "Persecute and destroy them in anger," as they persecute and destroy us in their anger. "Destroy them from under the heavens of the Lord;" let them have no benefit of the light and influence of the heavens. Destroy them in such a manner as that all that see it may say, It is a destruction from the Almighty, who sits in the heavens and laughs at them, Ps. ii. 4, and may own that the heavens do rule, Dan. iv. 26. What is said of the idols is here said of their worshippers, who in this also shall be like unto them; "They shall perish from under these heavens," Jer. x. 11. They shall not only be excluded from the happiness of the invisible heavens, but cut off from the comfort even of these visible ones, which are the heavens of the Lord, Ps. cxv. 16, and which they therefore are unworthy to be taken under the protection of that rebel against him.

CHAPTER IV.

This chapter is another single alphabet of lamentations for the destruction of Jerusalem, like those in the first two chapters. I. The prophet here laments the injuries and indignities done to those that respect used to be shewed to, ver. 1, 2. II. He laments the direful effects of the famine, which they were reduced to by the siege, ver. 8—10. III. He laments the taking and sacking of Jerusalem, and its amazing desolations, ver. 11, 12. IV. He acknowledgeth that the sins of their leaders were the cause of all these calamities, ver. 14—16. V. He gives up all as doomed to utter ruin, for their enemies were quite too hard for them, ver. 17—20. VI. He foretells the destruction of the Edomites, who triumphed in Jerusalem's fall, ver. 21. V. He foretells the return of the captivity of Zion at last, ver. 22.

HOW is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed!
The stones of the sanctuary are poured out in the top of every street.
2 The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold,
How are they esteemed as earthen pitchers, the work of the hands of the potter!
3 Even the sea monsters draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones:
The daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness.
4 The tongue of the sucking child cleaveth to the roof of his mouth for thirst:
The young children ask bread, and no man breaketh it unto them.
5 They that did feed delicately are desolate in the streets:
They that were brought up in scarlet embrace dunghills.
6 For the punishment of the iniquity of the daughter of my people is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom,
That was overthrown as in a moment, and no hands stayed on her. [than milk,
7 Her Nazarites were purer than snow, they were whiter
They were more ruddy in body than rubies, their polishing was of sapphire:
8 Their visage is blacker than a coal; they are not known in the streets:
Their skin cleaveth to their bones; it is withered, it is become like a stick.

before Ps. The same inversion occurs in chapter ii. and chapter iv., but it is impossible to account for it. Some copies and the Syriac follow the true order.

iii. 52—54. Although Jeremiah describes in these verses his personal troubles, it is not probably with any allusion to his imprisonment. The figures employed by him are drawn from the actual or possible experience of men, and must be explained accordingly.

iii. 64—66. Some critics observe that the verbs in the Hebrew here are not imperative but future, and interpret them as such: "Thou wilt render unto them a recompense, O Lord,—thou wilt give them hardness of heart,—thou wilt pursue and destroy them," &c. But it is true that future forms of the verb are often employed in the language of prayer; and hence some defend the common version.

iv. 1. This chapter is also alphabetically arranged, each verse of our version commencing with a different letter in Hebrew.

iv. 7, 8. It may be fairly doubted whether Nazarites are meant by 9 They that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger:

For these pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field. [children:
10 The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own
They were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my people.
11 The LORD hath accomplished his fury; he hath poured out his fierce anger,
And hath kindled a fire in Zion, and it hath devoured the foundations thereof.
12 The kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed That the adversary and the enemy should have entered into the gates of Jerusalem.

THE OSTRICH (from the Egyptian Monuments)—ver. 3.

The elegy of this chapter begins with a lamentation of the very sad and doleful change which the judgments of God had made in Jerusalem. The city that had been as gold, as the most fine gold, so rich and splendid, the perfection of beauty, and joy of the whole earth, is become dim, and is changed; has lost its lustre, lost its value, is not what it was, it is become dross. Alas, what an alteration is here!

First. The temple is laid waste, which was the glory of Jerusalem, and its protection, that is given up into the hands of the enemy. And some understand that gold spoken of, ver. 1, to be the gold of the temple, the fine gold with which it was overlaid, 1 Kin. vi. 22. When the temple was burnt, the gold of it was smoked and sullied, as if it had been of little value; it was thrown among the rubbish, it was changed, that is, converted to common uses, and made nothing of. The stones of the sanctuary, which were curiously wrought, were thrown down by the Chaldeans when they demolished it, or were brought down by the force of the fire, and were poured out, and thrown about in the top of every street; they lay mingled, without distinction, among the common ruins. When the God of the sanctuary was by sin provoked to withdraw, no wonder that the stones of the sanctuary were thus profaned.

Secondly. The princes and priests, that were in a special manner "the precious sons of Zion," were trampled upon and abused, ver. 2. Both the house of God and the house of David were in Zion; the sons of both those houses were upon that account precious, that they were heirs to the privileges of those two covenants, of priesthood and royalty. They were "comparable to fine gold." Israel was more rich in them than in treasures of gold and silver; but now they are "esteemed as earthen pitchers," they are broken as earthen pitchers, thrown by as vessels in which there is no pleasure. They are grown poor, and brought into captivity, and thereby are rendered mean and despicable, and every one treads upon them, and insults over them. Note, The contempt put upon God's people ought to be matter of lamentation to us.

Thirdly. Little children were starved for want of bread and water, ver. 3, 4. The nursing mothers, having no meat for themselves, had no milk for the babes at their breast; so that, though in disposition they were really compassionate, yet in fact they seemed to be cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness, that leave their eggs in the dust, Job xxxix. 14, 15. Having no food for their children they were forced to neglect them, and do what they could to forget them, because it was a pain to them to think of them when they had nothing for them. In this they were worse than the seals or sea monsters, or whales, as some render it, for they "draw out the breast, and give suck to their young," which the daughter of my people will not do. Children cannot shift for themselves as grown people can, and therefore it was the more piteous to see "the tongue of the sucking child cleave to the roof of his mouth for thirst," because there was not a drop of water to moisten it, and to hear the young children, that could but just speak, ask bread of their parents who had none to give them, no, nor any friend that could supply them. As doleful as our thoughts are of this case, so thankful should our thoughts be of the great plenty we enjoy, and the food convenient we have for ourselves, and for our children, and for those of our own house.

Fourthly. Persons of good rank were reduced to extreme poverty, ver. 5. They that were well born, and well bred, and had been accustomed to the best, both for food and clothing, that had fed delicately, had every thing that was curious and nice, (they call it eating well, whereas those only eat well that eat to the glory of God,) and fared sumptuously every day; they had not only been advanced to the scarlet, but from their beginning were brought up in scarlet, and were never acquainted with anything mean or ordinary. They were 'brought up upon scarlet,' so the word is,—their foot-cloths and the carpets they walked on were scarlet; yet these, being stripped of all by the war, "are desolate in the street," have not a house to put their head in, not a bed to lie on, nor clothes to cover them, nor fire to warm them. They embrace dunghills, on them they are glad to lie to get a little rest, and, perhaps, raked in the dunghill for something to eat, as the prodigal son that would have filled his belly with the husks. Note, Those who live in the greatest pomp and plenty know not what straits they may be reduced to before they die; as sometimes the needy are raised out of the dunghill, Ps. cxiii. 7, so there are instances of the wealthy being brought to the dunghill. "They that were full have hired out themselves for bread," 1 Sam. ii. 5. It is therefore the wisdom of those that have abundance not to use themselves too nicely, for then hardships, when they come, will be doubly hard, Deu. xxviii. 56.

Fifthly. Persons that were eminent for dignity, nay, perhaps, for sanctity, shared with others in the common calamity, ver. 7, 8. "Her Nazarites" are extremely changed. Some understand it only of her honourable ones, the young gentlemen, that were very clean, and neat, and well dressed, washed and perfumed; but I see not why we may not understand it of those devout people among them that separated themselves to the Lord by the Nazarites' vow, Num. vi. 2. That there were such among them in the most degenerate times, appears, Am. ii. 11, "I raised up of your young men for Nazarites." These Nazarites, though they were not to cut their hair, yet by reason of their temperate diet, their frequent washings, and especially the pleasure they had in devoting themselves to God, and conversing with him, which made their faces to shine as Moses', "were purer than snow, and whiter than milk." Drinking no wine, nor strong drink, they had a more healthful complexion and cheerful countenance than those that regaled themselves daily with the blood of the grape, as Daniel and his fellows with pulse and water. Or, it may note the great respect and veneration which all good people had for them; though, perhaps, to the eye they had no form or comeliness, yet being separated to the Lord, they were valued as if they had been "more ruddy than rubies, and their polishing had been of sapphire." But now "their visage is" marred, (as is said of Christ, Isa. lii. 14,) it is "blacker than a coal;" they look miserably, partly through hunger, and partly through grief and perplexity. "They are not known in the streets;" they that respected them now take no notice of them, and they that had been intimately acquainted with them now scarce knew them, their countenance was so altered by the miseries that attended the long siege. "Their skin cleaves to their bones," their flesh being quite consumed and wasted away; "it is withered, it is become like a stick," as dry and hard as a piece of wood. Note, It is a thing to be much lamented, that even those who are separated to God, yet, when desolating judgments are abroad, are many times involved with others in the common calamity.

Sixthly. Jerusalem comes down slowly, and dies a lingering death, for the famine contributes more to her destruction than any other judgment whatsoever. Upon this account the destruction of Jerusalem was greater than that of Sodom, ver. 6, for that was overthrown in a moment; one shower of fire and brimstone despatched it, "no hand stayed on her," she did not endure any long siege as Jerusalem has done; she fell immediately into the hands of the Lord, who strikes home at a blow, and did not fall into the hands of man, who, being weak, is long in doing execution, Jud. viii. 21. Jerusalem is kept many months upon the rack in pain and misery, and dies by inches, dies so as to feel herself die. And when the iniquity of Jerusalem is more aggravated than that of Sodom, no wonder that the punishment of it is so. Sodom never had the means of grace that Jerusalem had, the oracles of God and his prophets, and therefore the condemnation of Jerusalem will be more intolerable than that of Sodom, Mat. xi. 23, 24.

The extremity of the famine is here set forth by two frightful instances of it. 1. The tedious death that it was the cause of, ver. 9. Many were slain with hunger, were famished to death, their stores being spent, and the public stores so near spent that they could not have any relief out of them. They were "stricken through for want of the fruits of the field;" they that were starved were as sure to die as if they had been stabbed and stricken through, only their case was much more miserable. "They that are slain with the sword" are soon rid out of their pain, "in a moment they go down to the grave," Job xxi. 13; they have not the terror of seeing death make its advances towards them, and scarce feel it when the blow is given, it is but one sharp struggle and the work is done; and if we be ready for another world we need not be afraid of a short passage to it, the quicker the better. But they that die by famine pine away; hunger preys upon their spirits, and wastes them gradually; nay, and it frets their spirits, and fills them with vexation, and is as great a torture to the mind as to the body. There are bands in their death, Ps. lxxiii. 4. 2. The barbarous murders that it was the occasion of, ver. 10, "The hands of the pitiful women have" first slain, and then "sodden their own children." This was lamented before, ch. ii. 20; and it was a thing to be greatly lamented, that any should be so wicked as to do it, and that they should be brought to such extremities as to be tempted to it. But this horrid effect of long sieges had been threatened in general, Lev. xxv. 24; Deu. xxviii. 13; and particularly against Jerusalem in the siege by the Chaldeans, Jer. xix. 9; Eze. v. 10. The case was sad enough, that they had not wherewithal to feed their children and make meat for them, ver. 4, but much worse, that they could find in their hearts to feed upon their children and make meat of them. I know not whether to make it an instance of the power of necessity, or of the power of iniquity; but, as the Gentile idolaters were justly given up to vile affections, Rom. i. 26, so these Jewish idolaters, and the women particularly, who had made cakes to the queen of heaven, and taught their children to do so too, were stript of natural affection, and that to their own children. Being thus left to dishonour their own nature was a righteous judgment upon them for the dishonour they had done to God.

Seventhly. Jerusalem comes down utterly and wonderfully. 1. The destruction of Jerusalem is a complete destruction; ver. 11, "The Lord has accomplished his fury," that is, he has made thorough work of it, has executed all that he purposed in wrath against Jerusalem, and hath remitted no part of the sentence. "He hath poured out" the full vials of "his fierce anger," poured them out to the bottom, even the dregs of them. He "hath kindled a fire in Zion," which has not only consumed the houses, and levelled them with the ground, but, beyond what other fires do, "hath devoured the foundations thereof," as if they were to be no more built upon. 2. It is an amazing destruction, ver. 12. It was a "surprise to the kings of the earth" who are acquainted with, and inquisitive about, the state of their neighbours; nay, it was so to "all the inhabitants of the world" that knew Jerusalem, or had the word so rendered here. Nazir signifies one separated or set apart, and is used even of a tree. In Gen. xlix. 26 it is rendered "separate," and in Deut. xxxiii. 16 "separated." Here it may denote princes or chief men.

iv. 9. The sense of the first clause is necessarily that such as are killed by the sword are better off than such as die of famine, because, as the second clause explains, death by hunger is a slow and miserable one. The next verse reveals still more of the horrors of famine.

iv. 10. "Pitiful women" are compassionate women. "Sodden" is from "seethe," which means to boil, or cook with water in a pot.

iv. 12. The meaning here is not obscure, although not well expressed by our translators: "The kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, disbelieved that the foe and the enemy would enter the gates of Jerusalem." The reasons for their opinion that it was impregnable may have been these: it was in a naturally strong position, it was fortified by art, it was the seat of the sanc-ever heard or read of it. They could "not have believed that the adversary and enemy should ever have entered into the gates of Jerusalem;" for, 1st. They knew Jerusalem was strongly fortified, not only by walls and bulwarks, but by the numbers and strength of its inhabitants. "The stronghold of Zion" was thought to be impregnable. 2nd. They knew it was "the city of the great King," where the Lord of the whole earth had in a more peculiar manner his residence; it was the holy city, and therefore they thought it was so much under the Divine protection that it would be in vain for any of its enemies to make an attack upon it. 3rd. They knew that many an attempt made upon it had been baffled,—witness that of Sennacherib,—they were therefore amazed when they heard of the Chaldeans making themselves masters of it, and concluded it was certainly by an immediate hand of God that Jerusalem was given up to them; it was by a commission from him that the enemy broke through and entered the gates of Jerusalem.

13 For the sins of her prophets, and the iniquities of her priests,
That have shed the blood of the just in the midst of her,
14 They have wandered as blind men in the streets, they have polluted themselves with blood,
So that men could not touch their garments.
15 They cried unto them, Depart ye; it is unclean; depart, depart, touch not:
When they fled away and wandered, they said among the heathen, They shall no more sojourn there.
16 The anger of the LORD hath divided them; he will no more regard them:
They respected not the persons of the priests, they favoured not the elders.
17 As for us, our eyes as yet failed for our vain help:
In our watching we have watched for a nation that could not save us.
18 They hunt our steps, that we cannot go in our streets:
Our end is near, our days are fulfilled; for our end is come.
19 Our persecutors are swifter than the eagles of the heaven:
They pursued us upon the mountains, they laid wait for us in the wilderness.
20 The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the LORD, was taken in their pits,
Of whom we said, Under his shadow we shall live among the heathen.

Here is, First. The sins they are charged with, for which God brought this destruction upon them, and which serve to justify God in it, ver. 13, 14. It is for "the sins of her prophets, and the iniquities of her priests;" not that the people were innocent, no, they loved to have it so, Jer. v. 31, and it was to please them that the prophets and priests did as they did; but the fault is chiefly laid upon them, who should have taught them better, should have reproved and admonished them, and told them what would be in the end hereof; of the hands of those watchmen who did not give them warning will their blood be required. Note, Nothing ripens a people more for ruin, nor fills the measure faster, than the sins of their priests and prophets. The particular sin charged upon them is persecution. The false prophets and corrupt priests joined their power and interest to "shed the blood of the just in the midst of her," that is, the blood of God's prophets, and of those that adhered to them. They not only shed the blood of their innocent children, whom they sacrificed to Moloch, but the blood of the righteous men that were among them, whom they sacrificed to that more cruel idol of enmity to the truth and true religion. This was that sin which "the Lord would not pardon," 2 Kin. xxiv. 4, and which brought the last destruction upon Jerusalem, Jas. v. 6, "Ye have condemned and killed the just." And the priests and prophets were the ringleaders in persecution, as, in Christ's time, the chief priests and scribes were the men that incensed the people against him, who otherwise would have persisted in their Hosannas. Now, these are they that "wandered as blind men in the streets," ver. 14; they strayed from the paths of justice, were blind to every thing that is good, but to do evil they were quicksighted. God saith of corrupt judges, that "they know not, neither do they understand, they walk in darkness," Ps. lxxxii. 5; and Christ saith of the corrupt teachers, that they are blind leaders of the blind, Mat. xv. 14. They have so polluted themselves with innocent blood, the blood of the saints, that men could not touch their garments; that is, they made themselves odious to all about them, so that good men were as shy of touching them as of touching a dead body, which contracted a ceremonial pollution, or of touching the bloody clothes of one slain, which tender spirits care not to do. There is nothing that will make prophets and priests to be abhorred so much as a spirit of persecution.

Secondly. The testimony of their neighbours produced in evidence against them, both to convict them of sin and to shew the equity of God's proceedings against them. Some that are grown very impudent in sin boast that they care not what people say of them, but God by the prophet would have the Jews to take notice what the people said of them, and what was the opinion of the standers by concerning them, ver. 15, 16; what they said, nay, what they cried unto them, especially to the corrupt priests and prophets, among the heathen. 1. They upbraided them with their pretended purity, while they lived in all manner of real iniquity. They cried to them, "Depart ye, it is unclean." You were so precise you would not touch a Gentile, but cried, "Depart, depart, stand by thyself, I am holier than thou," Isa. lxv. 5, (thus the prosecutors of Christ would not go "into the judgment hall lest they should be defiled,") but can you now keep the Gentiles from touching you, when God has delivered you into their hands? When you fly away and wander, you will bid them stand off, and not touch you, because you are unclean, but in vain; these serpents will not be charmed or enchanted thus, no, they will not respect the person of the priests, nor favour the elders; the most venerable persons will to them be despicable. 2. They upbraided them with their sins, and the anger of God against them for their sins, and the direful effects of that anger. "They cried to them, Depart ye, it is unclean;" they all cried out shame on them, and could easily foresee that God would not long suffer such a provoking people to continue in so good a land. They knew their statutes and judgments were righteous, and expected they should be a wise and understanding people, Deu. iv. 6; but when they saw them quite otherwise, they cried, Depart, depart. They soon read their doom, that the land would spew them out as it had done their predecessors, and when they saw the dispersed of Jacob fleeing and wandering, they told them of it. They said, Now "the anger of the Lord hath divided them," has dispersed them into all countries, because "they respected not the persons of the priests," the pious priests that were among them, such as Zechariah the son of Jehoiada, Jeremiah, and others; neither did they favour the elders, but despised them and their authority, when they went about to check them for their vicious courses. The very heathen foresaw this would ruin them. 3. They triumphed in their ruin as irrecoverable. They said, when they saw them expelled out of their own land, Now "they shall no more sojourn there;" they have bidden it a final farewell, never more to return to it, for "God will no more regard them," and how then can they help themselves? Herein they were mistaken, God had not cast them off for all this; yet thus much is intimated, that all about them observed them to be so very provoking to their God, that there was no reason to expect any other but that they should be quite abandoned.

Thirdly. The despair which they themselves were almost brought to under their calamities. Having heard what they said concerning them among the heathen, let us now hear what they say concerning themselves; ver. 17, "As for us," we look upon our case to be in a manner helpless. "Our end is near," ver. 18; the end both of our church and of our state, we are just at the brink of the ruin of both; nay, "our end is come;" we are utterly undone; a fatal, final period is put to all our comforts; the days of our prosperity are fulfilled, they are numbered and finished. Thus their fears concurred with the hopes of their enemies, that the Lord would no more regard them. For, 1. The refuges they fled to disappointed them. They looked for help from this and the other powerful ally, but to no purpose; it proved vain help. The succours they expected did not come in, or at least they had not the success they expected; and their eyes failed with looking for that which never came, ver. 17. They watched in watching; they watched long and with a great deal of earnestness and impatience for a nation that promised them assistance, but failed them, and frustrated their expectations. They could not save them; they were too weak to contend with the Chaldean army, and therefore retired. Help from creatures is vain help, Ps. lx. 11; and we may look for it till our eyes fail, till our hearts fail, and come short of it at last. 2. The persecutors they fled from overtook them, and overcame them; ver. 18, "They hunt our steps, that we cannot go in our streets." When the Chaldeans besieged the city, they raised the batteries so high above the walls that they could command the town, and shoot at people as they went along the streets; they hunted them with arrows from place to place. When the city was broken up, and all the men of war fled, their "persecutors were swifter than the eagles of heaven," when they fly upon their prey, ver. 19. There was no escaping them; they "pursued them upon the mountains," and when they thought they had got clear of them they fell into the hands of those that "laid wait for them in the wilderness," to cut off our retreat, and to pick up stragglers. Nay, the king himself, though he may be supposed to have had all the advantages the exigence of the case would admit to favour his flight, yet he cannot escape, for Divine vengeance pursues him with them, and then, ver. 20, "The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord, was taken in their pits." Some apply it to Josiah, who was killed in battle by the king of Egypt; but it is rather to be understood of Zedekiah, who was the last king of the house of David, and who was pursued by the Chaldeans, and seized in the plains of Jericho, Jer. xxxix. 5. He was the anointed of the Lord, heir of that family which God had appointed to the government; he was very much confided in by the Jewish state; "they said, Under his shadow we shall live among the heathen." They promised themselves that the remnant which were left after Jeconiah's captivity should, under the protection of his government, "yet again take root downward, and bear fruit upward." They thought, though they were so reduced that they could not think of reigning over the heathen as they had done, yet they might make a shift to live among them, and not be insulted and pulled in pieces by them. Thus apt are sinking interests not only to catch at every twig, but to think it will recover them. Jerusalem died of a consumption, a flattering distemper. Even when she was ready to expire, she formed some hopeful symptoms to herself, and on them grounded a hope that she should recover: but what came of it? The shadow under which they thought they should live proved like that of Jonah's gourd, which withered in a night. He that was "the anointed of the Lord, was taken in their pits," as if he had been but a beast of prey, so little account did they make of a person deemed sacred, and not to be violated. Note, When we make any creature the breath of our nostrils, and promise ourselves that we shall live by it, it is just with God to stop that breath, and deprive us of the life we expected by it; for God will have the honour of being himself alone our life, and the length of our days.

21 Rejoice and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the land of Uz;
The cup also shall pass through unto thee: thou shalt be drunken, and shalt make thyself naked 22 The punishment of thine iniquity is accomplished, O daughter of Zion; he will no more carry thee away into captivity:
He will visit thine iniquity, O daughter of Edom; he will discover thy sins.

David's psalms of lamentation commonly conclude with some word of comfort, which is as life from the dead, and light shining out of darkness; so doth this lamentation here in this chapter. The people of God are now in great distress, their aspects all doleful, their prospects all frightful, and their ill-natured neighbours, the Edomites, insult over them, and do all they can to exasperate destroyers against them. Such was their violence against their brother Jacob, (Obad. 10,) such their spleen at Jerusalem, of which they cried, "Rase it, rase it," Ps. cxxxvii. 7. Now it is foretold, for the encouragement of God's people,

First. That an end shall be put to Zion's troubles; ver. 22, "The punishment of thine iniquity is accomplished, O daughter of Zion;" not the full of that punishment that it deserves, but of that which God has designed and determined to inflict, and which was necessary to answer the end, the glorifying of tuary of the whole nation, it was viewed as under the protection of the supreme God. Jewish history would also deepen the conviction.

iv. 13—16. This passage is capable of two explanations. According to one, the people in general wander, &c., because of the sins of prophets and priests; but according to another view it is the prophets and priests who wander, &c., because of their own sins. The second opinion requires some change of translation: "Through sins her prophets, and (through) iniquities her priests, who shed the blood of the just in the midst of her, wander blind in the streets, are polluted with blood, so that men cannot touch their garments. Depart, unclean, they cry to them; depart, depart, touch not: when they flee, yea, wander, they say among the nations, They shall sojourn no more. The anger of the Lord hath divided them; he will no more regard them: they no more accept the person of the priests, nor do they favour the elders." The closing words of verse 15 may signify that men of heathen nations say of these outcast prophets and priests, God's justice, and the taking away of their sin. The captivity, which is the punishment of thine iniquity, is accomplished, Isa. xl. 2. And he will 'no longer keep thee in captivity,' so it may be read, as well as "he will no more carry thee into captivity;" he will turn again thy captivity, and work a glorious release for thee. Note, The troubles of God's people shall be continued no longer than till they have done their work for which they were sent.

Secondly. That an end shall be put to Edom's triumphs. It is spoken ironically, ver. 21, "Rejoice and be glad, O daughter of Edom." Go on to insult over Zion in distress, till thou hast filled up the measure of thine iniquity. Do so; rejoice in thy own present exemption from the common fate of thy neighbours. This is like Solomon's upbraiding the young man with his ungoverned mirth, Eccl. xi. 9, "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth." Rejoice, if thou canst, when God comes to reckon with thee, and that he will do ere long. "The cup" of trembling which it is now Jerusalem's turn to drink deep of, "shall pass through unto thee;" it shall go round till it comes to be thy lot to pledge it. Note, This is a good reason why we should not insult over any that are in misery, because we ourselves also are in the body, and we know not how soon their case may be ours. But those who please themselves in the calamities of God's church must expect to have their doom, as aiders and abetters, with them that are instrumental in those calamities. The destruction of the Edomites was foretold by this prophet, Jer. xlix. 7, &c., and the people of God must encourage themselves against their present rudeness and insolence with the prospect of it. 1. It will be a shameful destruction. "The cup" that "shall pass unto thee" shall intoxicate thee, and that is shame enough to any man; "thou shalt be drunken," quite infatuated, and at thy wit's end; shalt stagger in all thy counsels, and stumble in all thy enterprises; and then, as Noah, when he was drunk, "thou shalt make thyself naked," and expose thyself to contempt. Note, Those who ridicule God's people will justly be left to themselves to do that some time or other by which they will be made ridiculous. 2. It will be a righteous destruction. God will herein "visit thine iniquity, and discover thy sins." He will punish them; and, to justify himself therein, he will discover them, and make it to appear he has just cause thus to proceed against them. Nay, the punishment of the sin shall so exactly answer the sin, that it shall itself plainly discover it. Sometimes God doth so visit the iniquity, as that he that runs may read the sin in the punishment. But sooner or later sin will be visited and discovered, and all the hidden works of darkness brought to light.

CHAPTER V.

This chapter, though it has the same number of verses with the first, second and fourth, yet is not alphabetical as they were; but the scope of it is the same with that of all the foregoing elegies. We have in it, I. A remonstrance of the present calamitous state of God's people in their captivity, ver. 1—16. II. A protestation of their concern for God's sanctuary, as that which lay nearer their heart than any secular interest of their own, ver. 17, 18. III. An humble supplication to God, and expostulation with him for the returns of mercy, ver. 19—22; for they that lament, and do not pray, sin in their lamentations. Some ancient versions call this chapter, 'The prayer of Jeremiah.'

REMEMBER, O LORD, what is come upon us:
Consider, and behold our reproach.
2 Our inheritance is turned to strangers,
Our houses to aliens.
3 We are orphans and fatherless,
Our mothers are as widows.
4 We have drunken our water for money,
Our wood is sold unto us.

EASTERN WATER CARRIERS.

5 Our necks are under persecution:
We labour, and have no rest.
6 We have given the hand to the Egyptians,
And to the Assyrians, to be satisfied with bread.
7 Our fathers have sinned, and are not;
And we have borne their iniquities.
8 Servants have ruled over us:
There is none that doth deliver us out of their hand.
9 We gat our bread with the peril of our lives
Because of the sword of the wilderness
10 Our skin was black like an oven
Because of the terrible famine.
11 They ravished the women in Zion,
And the maids in the cities of Judah
12 Princes are hanged up by their hand:
The faces of elders were not honoured
13 They took the young men to grind.
And the children fell under the wood.
14 The elders have ceased from the gate,
The young men from their musick
15 The joy of our heart is ceased;
Our dance is turned into mourning
16 The crown is fallen from our head:
Woe unto us, that we have sinned!

"Is any afflicted? let him pray;" and let him in prayer pour out his complaint to God, and make known before him his trouble. The people of God do so here. Being overwhelmed with grief, they give vent to their sorrows at the footstool of the throne of grace, and so give themselves ease. They complain not of evils feared, but of evils felt. "Remember what is come upon us," ver. 1. What was of old threatened against us, and was long in the coming, is now at length come upon us, and we are ready to sink under it. Remember what is past, consider and behold what is present, and let not all the trouble we are in seem little to thee, and not worth taking notice of, Neh. ix. 32. Note, As it is a great comfort to us, so it ought to be a sufficient one in our troubles, that God sees, and considers, and remembers all that is come upon us; and in our prayers we need only to recommend our case to his gracious and compassionate consideration. The one word in which all their grievances are summed up is reproach. "Consider, and behold our reproach." The troubles they were in, compared with their former dignity and plenty, were a greater reproach to them than they would have been to any other people, especially considering their relation to God, and dependence upon him, and his former appearances for them; and therefore this they complain of very sensibly, because as it was a reproach, it reflected upon the name and honour of that God who had owned them for his people; "And what wilt thou do unto thy great name?"

First. They acknowledge the reproach of sin which they bear, the reproach of their youth, which Ephraim bemoans himself for, Jer. xxxi. 19, of the early days of their nation. This comes in in the midst of their complaints, ver. 7, but may well be put in the front of them, "Our fathers have sinned, and are not;" they are dead and gone, but "we have borne their iniquities." This is not here a peevish complaint, or an imputation of unrighteousness to God, like that which we have, Jer. xxxi. 29; Eze. xviii. 2, "The fathers did eat sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge," and therefore, "the ways of the Lord are not equal;" but it is a penitent confession of the sin of their ancestors, which they themselves also had persisted in, for which they now justly suffered; that is, the judgments God brought upon them were so very great, that it appeared God had in them an eye to the sins of their ancestors (because they had not been remarkably punished in this world) as well as to their own sins; and thus God was justified both in his connivance at their ancestors, (he "laid up their iniquity for their children,") and in his severity with them, on whom he visited that iniquity, Mat. xxiii. 35, 36. Thus they do here, 1. Submit themselves to the Divine justice; Lord, thou art just in all that is brought upon us, for we are a seed of evildoers, children of wrath, and heirs to the curse; we are sinful, and we have it by kind. Note, The sins which God looks back upon in punishing we must look back upon in repenting, and must take notice of all that which will help to justify God in correcting us. 2. They refer themselves to the Divine pity. Lord, our fathers have sinned, and we justly smart for their sins; but they are not; they were taken away from the evil to come, they lived not to see and share in these miseries that are come upon us, and we are left to bear their iniquities; now, though herein God is righteous, yet it must be owned our case is piteous, and worthy of compassion. Note, If we be penitent and patient under what we suffer for the sins of our fathers, we may expect that he that punisheth will pity, and will soon return in mercy to us.

Secondly. They represent the reproach of trouble which they bear in divers particulars, which tend much to their disgrace.

1. They are disseized of that good land which God gave them, and their enemies have got possession of it, ver. 2. Canaan was their inheritance; it was theirs by promise; God gave it to them and their seed, and they held it by grant from his crown, Ps. cxxxvi. 21, 22. But now it is turned to strangers; they possess it that have no right to it, who are "strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and aliens to the covenants of promise," they dwell in the houses that we built; and this is our reproach. It is the happiness of all God's spiritual Israel, that the heavenly Canaan is an inheritance that they cannot be disseized of, that shall never be turned to strangers.

2. Their state and nation is brought into a condition like that of widows and orphans; ver. 3, "We are fatherless," that is, helpless; we have none to protect us, to provide for us, to take any care of us. Our king, who is the father of the country, is cut off; nay, God our Father seems to have forsaken us, and cast us off. "Our mothers," our cities that were as fruitful mothers in Israel, "are now as widows," are as wives whose husbands are dead, destitute of comfort, and exposed to wrong and injury, and this is our reproach; for we who made a figure are now looked on with contempt.

3. They are put hard to it to provide necessaries for themselves and their families, whereas when time was they lived in abundance, and had plenty of every thing. Water used to be free and easily come by, but now, ver. 4, "We have drunk our water for money," and the saying is no longer true, Usus communis aquarum,—'Water is free to all.' So hardly did their oppressors use them, that they could not have a draught of fair water but they must purchase it either with money or work. Formerly they had fuel too for the fetching, but now "our wood is sold to us," and we pay dear for every faggot. Now were they punished for employing their children to gather wood for fire with which to bake cakes for the queen of heaven, Jer. vii. 18. They were perfectly proscribed by their oppressors, were forbidden the use both of fire and water, according to the ancient form, Interdico tibi aqua et igni,—'I forbid thee the use of water and fire.' But what must they do for bread? Truly that was as hard to come by as any thing, for, 1st. Some of them sold their liberty for it; ver. 6, "We have given the hand to the Egyptians, and to the Assyrians," have made the best bargain we could with them to serve them, that we might "be

"They shall no more sojourn with us." To the same speakers also the first half of verse 16 may be referred. If so, the second half of the verse will generally describe the want of respect with which the Jewish priests and elders were received by the heathen.

iv. 17. Here the prophet certainly speaks in the person of the people at large—their eyes failed while they watched upon their watch-towers, in the vain hope that the Egyptian armies would come and compel the Chaldeans to raise the siege.

iv. 18—20. The resources of the enemy are here suggested, and the advantages gained by him. "Persecutors," in verse 19, is not a well-chosen word; "pursuers" would be better—the Chaldeans hunted them. "The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the Lord," is Zedekiah, though some expositors have thought Josiah is meant. Zedekiah was captured and blinded.

iv. 21, 22. The unfriendly feeling between the Hebrews and the Edomites continued, with brief intermissions, for many centuries.

satisfied with bread." We were glad to submit to the meanest employment upon the hardest terms to get a sorry livelihood; we have yielded ourselves to be their vassals, have parted with all to them, as the Egyptians did to Pharaoh in the years of famine, that we might have something for ourselves and families to subsist on. The neighbour nations used to trade with Judah for wheat, Eze. xxvii. 17, for it was a fruitful land, but now it eats up the inhabitants, and they are glad to make court to the Egyptians and Assyrians. 2nd. Others of them ventured their lives for it; ver. 9, "We got our bread with the peril of our lives." When being straitened by the siege, and all provisions cut off, they either sallied or stole out of the city to fetch in some supply, they were in danger of falling into the hands of the besiegers, and being put to the sword; the sword of the wilderness it is called, or of the plain, for so the word signifies, the besiegers lying dispersed everywhere in the plains that were about the city. Let us take occasion from hence to bless God for the plenty we enjoy, that we get our bread so easily, scarce with the sweat of our face, much less with the peril of our lives; and for the peace we enjoy, that we can go out and enjoy, not only the necessary products, but the pleasures of the country, without any fear of the sword of the wilderness.

4. They are brought into slavery who were a free people, and not only their own masters, but masters of all about them, and this is, as much as any thing, their reproach; ver. 5, "Our necks are under" the grievous and intolerable yoke of "persecution," the iron yoke which Jeremiah foretold should be laid upon them, Jer. xxviii. 14; we are used like beasts in the yoke that wholly serve their owners, and are at the command of their drivers. That which aggravated the servitude was, 1st. That their labours were incessant, like those of Israel in Egypt, that were daily tasked, nay, overtasked; "We labour and have no rest," neither leave nor leisure to rest. The oxen in the yoke are unyoked at night and have rest, so they have by a particular provision on the sabbath day; but the poor captives in Babylon that were compelled to work for their living laboured and had no rest, no nights, no sabbath rest; they were quite tired out with continual toil. 2nd. That their masters were insufferable; ver. 8, "Servants have ruled over us," and nothing more vexatious than a servant when he reigneth, Pr. xxx. 22. They were not only the great men of the Chaldeans that commanded them, but even the meanest of their servants abused them at pleasure, and insulted over them; and they must be at their beck too. The curse of Canaan is now become the doom of Judah, a servant of servants shall he be. They would not be ruled by their God, and by his servants the prophets, whose rule was gentle and gracious, and therefore justly are they ruled with rigour by their enemies and their servants. 3rd. That they saw no probable way for the redress of their grievances. "There is none that doth deliver us out of their hand," not only none to rescue us out of our captivity, but none to check and restrain the insolence of the servants that abuse us and trample upon us, which one would think their masters should have done, because it was an usurpation of their authority; but it should seem they connived at it, and encouraged it: and, as if they were not worthy of the correction of gentlemen, they are turned over to the footmen to be kicked. Well might they pray, Lord, "consider, and behold our reproach."

5. They that used to be feasted are now famished; ver. 10, "Our skin was black like an oven," dried and parched too, "because of the terrible famine;" the 'storms of famine,' so the word is; for though famine comes gradually upon a people, yet it comes violently, and bears down all before it, and there is no resisting it. And this also is their disgrace; hence we read of the reproach of famine, which in captivity they received among the heathen, Eze. xxvi. 30.

6. All sorts of people, even they whose persons and characters were most inviolable, were abused and dishonoured. 1st. The women were ravished, even the women in Zion, that holy mountain, ver. 11. The committing of such abominable wickedness there is very sadly and justly complained of. 2nd. The great men were not only put to death, but put to ignominious deaths. "Princes were hanged," as if they had been slaves, "by the hands" of the Chaldeans, ver. 12; they took a pride in doing this barbarous execution with their own hands. Some think the dead bodies of the princes, after they were slain with the sword, were hung up, as the bodies of Saul's sons, in disgrace to them, and as it were to expiate the nation's guilt. 3rd. No respect was shewed to magistrates and those in authority. "The faces of elders," elders in age, elders in office, "were not honoured." This will be particularly remembered against the Chaldeans another day; Isa. xlvii. 6, "Upon the ancient hast thou very heavily laid thy yoke." 4th. The tenderness of youth was no more considered than the gravity of old age; ver. 13, they "took the young men to grind" at the handmills, nay perhaps at the horsemills. 'The young men have carried the grist,' so some; have 'carried the mill, or millstones,' so others; they loaded them as if they had been beasts of burthen, and so broke their backs when they were young, and made the rest of their lives the more miserable. Nay, they made the little children carry their wood home for fuel, and laid such burthens upon them that they fell down under them. So very inhuman were these cruel taskmasters.

7. An end was put to all their gladness, and their joy quite extinguished; ver. 14, "The young men," that used to be disposed to mirth, have "ceased from their music," have hung their harps upon the willow-trees. It doth indeed well become old men to cease from their music, it is time to lay it by with a gracious contempt, when "all the daughters of music are brought low;" but it speaks some great calamity upon a people when their young men are made to cease from it. It was so with the body of the people; ver. 15, "The joy of their heart was ceased;" they never knew what joy was since the enemy came upon them like a flood, for ever since deep has called unto deep, and one wave has flowed in upon the neck of another, so that we are quite overwhelmed, "our dance is turned into mourning;" instead of leaping for joy as formerly, we sink and lie down in sorrow. This may refer especially to the joy of their solemn feasts, and the dancing used in them, Jud. xxi. 21, which was not only modest but sacred dancing; this was turned into mourning, which was doubled on their festival days, in remembrance of their former pleasant things.

8. An end was put to all their glory. 1st. The public administration of justice was their glory, but that was gone; "The elders have ceased from the gate," ver. 14. The course of justice, which used to run down like a river, is now stopped; the courts of justice that used to be kept with so much solemnity are put down, for the judges are slain or carried captives. 2nd. The royal dignity was their glory, but that also was gone; "The crown is fallen from our head." Not only the king himself fallen into disgrace, but the crown; he has no successor; the regalia are all lost. Note, Earthly crowns are fading, falling things; but, blessed be God, there is a crown of glory that fades not away, that never falls, a kingdom that cannot be moved. Upon this complaint, but with reference to all the foregoing complaints, they make that penitent acknowledgment, "Woe unto us that we have sinned." Alas for us, our cause is very deplorable, and it is all long of ourselves; we are undone, and, which aggravates the matter, we are undone by our own hands. God is righteous, for we have sinned. Note, All our woes are owing to our own sin and folly. If "the crown of our head be fallen," for so the words run, if we lose our excellency, and become mean, we may thank ourselves; we have by our own iniquity profaned our crown and laid our honour in the dust.

17 For this our heart is faint;
For these things our eyes are dim.
18 Because of the mountain of Zion, which is desolate,
The foxes walk upon it.
19 Thou, O LORD, remainest for ever;
Thy throne from generation to generation
20 Wherefore dost thou forget us for ever,
And forsake us so long time?
21 Turn thou us unto thee, O LORD,
And we shall be turned; renew our days as of old.
22 But thou hast utterly rejected us;
Thou art very wroth against us.

Here, First. The people of God express the deep concern they had for the ruins of the temple more than for any other of their calamities; the interests of God's house lay nearer their hearts than those of their own; ver. 17, 18, "For this our heart is faint," and sinks under the load of its own heaviness "for these things our eyes are dim," and our sight is gone, as is usual in a deliquium, or fainting fit. It is "because of the mountain of Zion, which is desolate," the mountains, and the temple built upon that mountain. For other desolations our hearts grieve, and our eyes weep, but for this our hearts faint, and our eyes are dim. Note, Nothing lies so heavy upon the spirits of good people as that which threatens the ruin of religion, or weakens the interest of that; and it is a comfort if we can appeal to God that that afflicts us more than any temporal affliction to ourselves. The people had polluted the mountain of Zion with their sins, and therefore God has justly made it desolate to that degree that the foxes walk upon it as freely and commonly as they do in the woods. It is sad indeed when the mountain of Zion is become a portion for foxes, Ps. lxiii. 10; but sin had first made it so, Eze. xiii. 4.

Secondly. They comfort themselves with the doctrine of God's eternity, and the perpetuity of his government; ver. 19, But "thou, O Lord, remainest for ever." This they are taught to do by that Psalm which is entitled, "A prayer of the afflicted," Ps. cii. 27, 28. When all our creature comforts are removed from us, and our hearts fail us, we may then encourage ourselves with the belief, 1. Of God's eternity; "Thou remainest for ever." What shakes the world gives no disturbance to him that made it; whatever revolutions there are on earth there is no change in the eternal mind; God is still the same, and remains for ever infinitely wise and holy, just and good; "with him there is no variableness nor shadow of turning." 2. Of the never failing continuance of his dominion; "Thy throne is from generation to generation." The throne of glory, the throne of grace, and the throne of government, are all unchangeable, immovable, and this is matter of comfort to us when "the crown is fallen from our heads." When the thrones of princes, that should be our protectors, are brought to the dust, and buried in it, God's throne continues still; he still rules the world, and rules it for the good of his church. The Lord reigns, reigns for ever, even thy God, O Zion.

Thirdly. They humbly expostulate with God concerning the low condition they were now in, and the frowns of Heaven they were now under; ver. 20, "Wherefore dost thou forget us for ever," as if we were quite cast out of mind? "Wherefore dost thou forsake us so long time," as if we were quite deprived of the tokens of thy presence? Wherefore dost thou defer our deliverance, as if thou hadst utterly abandoned us? Thou art the same, and though the throne of thy sanctuary is demolished thy throne in heaven is unshaken. But wilt thou not be the same to us? Not as if they thought God had forgotten and forsaken them, much less feared his forgetting and forsaking them for ever; but thus they express the value they had for his favour and presence, which they thought it long that they were deprived of the evidence and comfort of. The last verse may be read as such an expostulation, and so the margin reads it, 'For wilt thou utterly reject us? wilt thou be perpetually wroth with us?' Not only not smile upon us, and remember us in mercy, but frown upon us, and lay us under the tokens of thy wrath; not only not draw nigh to us, but cast us out of thy presence, and forbid us to draw nigh to thee. How will this be reconciled with thy goodness and faithfulness, and the stability of thy covenant? We read it, "But thou hast rejected us;" that is, thou hast given us cause to fear that thou hast. Lord, how long shall we be in this temptation? Note, Though we may not quarrel with God, yet we may plead with him; and though we may not conclude that he has cast us off, yet we may with the prophet, Jer. xii. 1, humbly reason with him concerning his judgments, especially the continuance of the desolations of his sanctuary.

Fourthly. They earnestly pray to God for mercy and grace; Lord, do not reject us for ever, but "Turn thou us unto thee, renew our days," ver. 21. These words, though they be not put last, yet the rabbins, because they would not have the book to conclude with those melancholy words, ver. 22, repeat this prayer again, that the sun may not set under a cloud, and so make these the last words both in writing and reading this chapter. They here pray, 1. For converting grace, to prepare and qualify them for mercy; "Turn us to thee, O Lord." They had complained that God had forsaken and forgotten them, and then their prayer is not 'Turn thou to us,' but "Turn us to thee;" which implies an acknowledgment that the cause of the distance was in themselves. God never leaves any till they first leave him, nor stands afar off from them any longer than while they stand afar off from him; if, therefore, he turn them to him, in a way of duty, no doubt but he would presently return to them in a way of mercy. This agrees with that repeated prayer, Ps. lxxx. 3, 7, 19, "Turn us again, and then cause thy face to shine. "Turn us from our idols to thyself by a sincere repentance and reformation, "and then we shall be turned." This implies a farther acknowledgment of their own weakness and inability to turn themselves. There is in our nature a bent to backslide from God, but no disposition to return to him till his grace works in us both to will and to do. So necessary is that grace that we may truly say, 'Turn us, or we shall not be turned,' but shall wander endlessly; and so powerful and effectual is that grace that we may as truly say, "Turn us and we shall be turned," for it is a day of power, almighty power, in which God's people are made a willing people, Ps. cx. 3. 2. For restoring mercy. "Turn us to thee," and then "renew our days as of old;" that is, put us into the same happy state that our ancestors were in long ago, and that they continued long in; let it be with us as it was at the first, and at the beginning, Isa. i. 26. Note, If God by his grace renew our hearts, he will by his favour renew our days, so that we shall renew our youth as the eagle, Ps. ciii. 5. They that repent, and do their first works, shall rejoice, and recover their first comforts. God's mercies to his people have been ever of old, Ps. xxv. 6; and therefore they may hope, even then when he seems to have forsaken and forgotten them, that the mercy which was from everlasting will be to everlasting.

The expression, "daughter of Edom," means the Edomite nation. If the land of Uz here is the same as that of Job, it decides the question as to the region where the patriarch dwelt. The language of verse 21 is ironical: "You may rejoice over our fall, but you will through your own stupidity expose yourself to the enemy; and while Zion shall be restored, your bondage shall be perpetual, and your fall final."

v. 4. That water and fire-wood should be paid for was a novel thing, though it might be common to pay for their conveyance.

v. 6. The Jews had been compelled to give pledges of fidelity to the Egyptians, as well as to the Assyrians. Such as escaped to Egypt obtained permission to remain only on condition of allegiance to the Pharaohs. As for the rest, whether they remained in Palestine or were removed to Assyria, they were bound to render obedience to their conquerors. The nation had lost its independence.

v. 8. This is literally true, because the Jews were subject to the domination of the servants or slaves of the Assyrian king.

SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES

TO THE LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH.

This poem affords the most elegant variety of affecting images that ever probably were collected into so small a compass. The scenes of affliction, the circumstances of distress, are painted with such beautiful combination, that we contemplate everywhere the most affecting picture of desolation and misery. The prophet reiterates his complaints in the most pathetic style; and aggravates his sorrow with a boldness and force of description that correspond with the magnitude and religious importance of the calamities displayed to view. In the instructive strains of an inspired writer he reminds his countrymen of the grievous rebellions which had provoked the Lord to "abhor his sanctuary;" confesses that "it was of God's mercies that they were not utterly consumed;" and points out the sources of evil in the iniquities of their false prophets and priests. He then, with indignant irony, threatens Edom with destruction for rejoicing over the miseries of Judæa; opens a consolatory prospect to Zion; and concludes with an affecting address to God, to consider the reproach of his people, and to renew their prosperity.—Gray's Key. Never was there a more rich and elegant variety of beautiful images and adjuncts arranged within so small a compass, nor more elegantly chosen and applied.—Bp. Lowth.

Chap. I.—1. How doth the city sit solitary! There are extant numerous medals of Judæa vanquished, struck by order of the Roman general Titus, (who was afterwards emperor,) in order to commemorate the conquest of Judæa, and the subversion of the Jewish state and polity. On the representation of the reverse of one of these, (preserved in the cabinet of the British Museum,) the conquered country appears as a desolate female sitting under a tree; on another, as having her arms chained. They afford an extraordinary fulfilment of Isaiah's prediction, delivered at least eight hundred years before, "She being desolate shall SIT upon the ground," Isa. iii. 26; as well as a striking illustration of the Lamentations of Jeremiah. "How doth the city SIT solitary that was full of people! how is she become as a widow! she that was great among the nations, and princess among the provinces, how is she become tributary!"—Horne's Introduction, vol. i. 199. See representation of these medals in Lu. xix. See also Supplementary Note on Deu. xxviii. 6. All her beauty is departed. No "streets of palaces, and walks of state;" no high raised order of triumph; no fountains to cool the air, or porticoes; not a single vestige meets the traveller to announce its former military greatness, or commercial opulence; but in the place of these he finds himself encompassed by walls of rude masonry, the dull uniformity of which is only broken by the occasional protrusion of a small grated window; all the streets are wretchedness, and the homes of the Jews more especially are as dunghills.—Horne's Introduction, vol. iii. 29. The beauty of its situation is all that we can hope to discern, and that beauty of situation—in the eminence and slopes of the platform on which it stands, and in its natural defences on two of its sides—still remains.—Lands of the Bible, vol. i. 402.

Chap. II.—1. How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger. We then ascended to the wall of the city, and, entering by the Zion gate, once more passed through the Jewish quarters, and looked upon the miseries of Israel in the city where David dwelt. They are by far the most miserable and squalid of all the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and, if we could have looked upon their precious souls, their temporal misery would have appeared but a faint emblem of the spiritual death that reigns within. "Ah sinful nation! a people laden with iniquity! The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint," Isa. i. 4. May we never lose the feelings of intense compassion toward Israel which these few days spent in Jerusalem awakened; and never rest till all the faithful of the church of our fathers have the same flame kindled in their hearts! 9. Her gates are sunk into the ground. In seeking a solid foundation, (for the site of a proposed Hebrew church,) the builders had already dug down about forty feet, and had not yet come to the rock. They laid bare heap after heap of rubbish and ancient stones. It is a remarkable fact, which cannot but strike the traveller, that not only on mount Zion but in many parts of the city, the modern town is really built on the rubbish of the old. The heaps of ancient Jerusalem are still remaining; indurated masses of stones and rubbish forty and fifty feet deep in many places. Truly the prophets spoke with a Divine accuracy when they said, "Jerusalem shall become heaps," Mic. iii. 12; "I will make Jerusalem heaps," Jer. ix. 11. The fact that these heaps of ruins are of so great depth suggested to us a literal interpretation of the words of Jeremiah, "Her gates are sunk into the ground," ch. ii. 9. The ancient gates mentioned by Nehemiah, Neh. iii., are no longer to be found, and it is quite possible that several of them may be literally buried below the feet of the inquiring traveller.—Bonar & M'Cheyne's Narrative. It is added in a note: They have since reached the old foundations, (Isa. lviii. 12,) after digging fifty feet. See Mr. Nicolayson's letter in the Jewish Intelligencer for April, 1840. It is a striking fact that the foundations of Jerusalem should be thus hid in the ground, when you contrast it with the case of Samaria, of which it was foretold, "I will discover the foundations thereof," Mic. i. 6. Here is the accurate minuteness and distinguishing definiteness of the God of truth, who can point his finger to one spot and say, "It shall be thus with thee;" and turn to another spot and say in equal sovereignty, "It shall be otherwise with thee."

Chap. III.—1. I am the man that hath seen affliction. It is worthy to be observed that Jeremiah, in endeavouring to promote resignation in his countrymen, represents his own deportment under afflictions in terms which have a prophetic cast; so strikingly are they descriptive of the patience and conduct of our Saviour under his sufferings. The prophet, indeed, in the meek endurance of unmerited persecution was an illustrious type of Christ.—Gray's Key. 56. hide not thine ear at my breathing. Our own troubles, and those of the church and world around us, continually suggest causes of sorrow; and wherever we look 'our eyes may affect our hearts,' and cause our tears to flow afresh. Yet we may still hope and rejoice in the Lord; no dark dungeon or deep pit can exclude us from his throne of grace. If we cannot speak, he will hear our breathings and our sighs. He will draw near to encourage, to defend, and to plead the cause of his afflicted servants, and to redeem their souls. But what are all our sorrows compared with those of the Redeemer? 'He,' indeed, 'was the man who saw affliction, by the rod of the Lord's wrath against our sins, and exclaimed, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' He gave his cheek to the smiters, and was filled with reproach;' he was cut off, and laid in the grave, and the stone covered him; yet his prayer was answered, his cause was pleaded, he rose triumphant, and his enemies have, many of them, perished miserably from 'under the heavens of the Lord.' Thus he will deliver his people out of every trouble, and revive his church from every overwhelming persecution; thus will he raise our bodies from the grave, and save us with an everlasting salvation; whilst all his enemies will perish with an "everlasting destruction from his presence."—T. Scott.

Chap. IV.—12. The kings of the earth—would not have believed that the adversary—should have entered into the gates of Jerusalem. Observing from the mount of Olives the various undulations and slopes of ground, it is not difficult to conceive that when mount Zion, Acra, and mount Moriah constituted the bulk of the city, with a deep and steep valley surrounding the greater part of it, it must have been considered, by the people of that age, as nearly impregnable. These words were said nearly two thousand five hundred years ago. And when, six hundred and fifty years after, Titus besieged and took this devoted city, he exclaimed, on viewing the vast strength of the place, "It was no other than God who ejected the Jews out of these fortifications; for what could the hands of men or any machines do towards overthrowing these towns?"—Jowett's Christian Researches.

Chap. V.—5. Our necks are under persecution. 'In Media, on the perpendicular surface of a smooth mountain, on the road between Babylon and Hamadan, which is supposed to be the same as Ecbatana, the ancient capital of Media, there appears a remarkable sculpture, a copy of which, after Sir R. Ker Porter, is given below. Having visited the spot a few years since, we can vouch,' continues Dr. Kitto, (Pictorial Bible, 2 Kin. xvii.,) 'for the minute accuracy with which the sculpture is represented;' the principal figure in which, distinguished as a king by his regal dress and colossal stature, Sir Robert conceives to be Shalmaneser, attended by the generals of his Assyrian and Median forces; and the captives to be representations of the ten tribes, subdued and removed into this very country by himself and his father. 'Those who hesitate to accept this very beautiful sculpture as an illustration of that history will nevertheless value it as a most authentic representation of the mode frequently alluded to in the Scriptures, in which captive enemies were wont to be presented to, and treated by, the ancient Oriental conquerors.' 12. Hanged up by the hand. Suspending by the hand is a punishment very common in the East, especially for slaves and refractory children.—Roberts's Oriental Illustrations. Though we have cause to mourn, over the low estate of the church, yet the true Zion, to which believers are come, cannot be desolated, but remaineth for ever. Nor can our relation, as adopted into God's family, be abrogated, nor the freeness of our salvation disannulled, nor our joy and glorying in Christ be made void. Tribulations may cause our hearts to be faint, and our eyes dim, but our way to the mercy-seat of our reconciled God is open. We may beseech him not to forsake or forget us, and that he would turn and renew us more and more by his grace, that our hopes may revive, and our consolations abound, as in the days of old. Let us, in all our troubles, put our whole trust and confidence in his mercy; let us confess our sins, and pour out our hearts before him. Let us watch against repinings and despondency, whatever we suffer, or witness of the troubles of our brethren; for we surely know that it shall be well in the end with all that trust in, fear, love, and serve the Lord. Are not, as in Jeremiah's days, the Lord's judgments in the earth? And may we not trace the cause of the Lord's jealousy for his Zion? Did Christ purchase the church with his blood, and can he be indifferent to its best interests? Let Zion then be remembered by us in our warmest prayers, and her welfare be preferred above our chief joy. O that every heart's affection was on the stretch, under the influence of the Holy Ghost, to plead with our God for Zion! Spare, Lord, spare thy people, and give not thine heritage to reproach, that the heathen should rule over them.—R. T. Society's Bible.

v. 11—15. All ages, ranks, and conditions were involved by the general disasters. The foundations of law and order were uprooted, and the relations of society inverted. Cruelty and oppression were prevalent. It has been said that hanging men up by the hand was not a form of punishment adopted by the ancients, but this is not certainly correct. Roberts says that hanging up refractory children and slaves is a common mode of punishment in the East. The culprit is tied by the hands, and so hoisted up, and kept till forgiveness is granted. Expositors who object to this explanation understand the words to mean that princes were hanged by the hands of their oppressors. For young men to grind at the mill, as in verse 13, was to be degraded, because it was usually the work of female servants. The employment of boys in carrying wood may not have been uncommon, but here the carriers of wood are over-burdened. The gate where the elders used to meet for counsel and judgment was deserted, and the mirth in which youth indulged was passed away.

THE JEWS MOURNING

IN THEIR CAPTIVITY.

AN EXPOSITION

OF THE BOOK OF

HE PROPHET EZEKIEL,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we entered upon the writings of the prophets which speak of "the things that should be hereafter," methought we had the same call given us that St. John had, Rev. iv. 1, to "Come up hither;" but when we enter upon the prophecy of this book methinks we are called to "come up higher." As we go forward in time (for Ezekiel prophesied in the captivity, as Jeremiah prophesied just before it) so we soar upward in discoveries yet more sublime of the Divine glory. These waters of the sanctuary still grow deeper, so far from being fordable, that in some places they are scarce fathomable; yet, as deep as they are, out of them flow streams which "make glad the city of our God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High." As to this prophecy now before us, we may inquire,

I. Concerning the penman of it. It was Ezekiel: his name signifies, 'the strength of God;' or, 'one girt or strengthened of God.' He girded up the loins of his mind to the service, and God put strength into him. Whom God calls to any service, he will himself enable for it; if he gives commission, he will give power to execute it. Ezekiel's name was answered when God said, (and no doubt he said it,) "I have made thy face strong against their faces."—The learned Selden in his book De Diis Syris, saith, it was the opinion of some of the ancients, that the prophet Ezekiel was the same with that Nazaratus Assyrius whom Pythagoras, as himself relates, had for his tutor for some time, and whose lectures he attended; and it is agreed that they lived much about the same time. And we have reason to think, that many of the Greek philosophers were acquainted with the sacred writings, and borrowed some of the best of their notions from them. If we may credit the tradition of the Jews, he was put to death by the captives in Babylon, for his faithfulness and boldness in reproving them; that they dragged him upon the stones till his brains were dashed out. An Arabic historian saith, he was put to death, and was buried in the sepulchre of Shem, the son of Noah: so Hottinger relates, Thesaur. Philol. lib. ii. cap. 1.

II. Concerning the date of it; the place whence it is dated, and the time when. The scene is laid in Babylon, when it was a house of bondage to the Israel of God; there the prophecies of this book were preached, there they were written, when the prophet himself and the people to whom he prophesied were captives there. Ezekiel and Daniel are the only writing prophets of the Old Testament, that lived and prophesied any where but in the land of Israel, except we add Jonah, who was sent to Nineveh to prophesy. Ezekiel prophesied in the beginning of the captivity, Daniel in the latter end of it. It was an indication of God's good will to them, and his gracious designs concerning them in their affliction, that he raised up prophets among them, both to convince them, when in the beginning of their troubles they were secure and unhumbled, which was Ezekiel's business, and to comfort them, when in the latter end of their troubles they were dejected and discouraged. If the Lord had been pleased to kill them, he would not have used such apt and proper means to cure them.

III. Concerning the matter and scope of it. 1. There is much in it that is very mysterious, dark, and hard to be understood, especially in the beginning and latter end of it; which, therefore, the Jewish rabbins forbade the reading of to their young men till they came to be thirty years of age, lest, by the difficulties they met with there, they should be prejudiced against the Scriptures. But if we read these difficult parts of Scripture with humility and reverence, and search them diligently, though we may not be able to untie all the knots we meet with, no more than we can solve all the phenomena in the book of nature, yet we may from them, as from the book of nature, gather a great deal for the confirming of our faith, and the encouraging of our hope in the God we worship. 2. Though the visions here be intricate, such as an elephant may swim in, yet the sermons are most plain, such as a lamb may wade in; and the chief design of them is, to shew God's people their transgressions, that in their captivity they may be repenting, and not repining. It should seem he was constantly attended; for we read of their sitting before him, as God's people sat, to hear his words, ch. xxxiii. 31, and that he was occasionally consulted; for we read of the elders of Israel that came to inquire of the Lord by him, ch. xiv. 1—3. And as it was of great use to the oppressed captives themselves to have a prophet with them, so it was a testimony to their holy religion against their oppressors, that ridiculed it and them. 3. Though the reproofs here, and the threatenings, be very sharp and bold, yet towards the close of the book very comfortable assurances are given of great mercy God had in store for them; and there, at length, we shall meet with something that has reference to gospel times, and which was to have its accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah, of whom, indeed, this Prophet speaks less than almost any of the prophets. But by opening the terrors of the Lord he prepares Christ's way. By the law is the knowledge of sin, and so it becomes our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. The visions, which were the Prophet's credentials, we have ch. i.—iii.; the reproofs and threatenings, ch. iv.—xxiv. Betwixt which and the comforts we have in the latter part of the book, we have messages sent to the nations that bordered upon the land of Israel, whose destruction is foretold, ch. xxv.—xxxv., to make way for the restoration of God's Israel, and the re-establishment of their city and temple, which are foretold, ch. xxxvi.—xlviii. And those who would apply the comforts to themselves must apply the convictions to themselves.

CHAPTER I.

In this chapter we have, I. The common circumstances of the prophecy now to be delivered: the time when it was delivered, ver. 1; the place where, ver. 2; and the person by whom, ver. 3. II. The uncommon introduction to it by a vision of the glory of God; 1. In his attendance and retinue in the upper world, where his throne is surrounded with angels, here called living creatures, ver. 4—14; 2. In his providences concerning the lower world, represented by the wheels, and their motions, ver. 15—26; 3. In the face of Jesus Christ sitting upon the throne, ver. 26—28. And the more we are acquainted, and the more intimately we converse with the glory of God in these three branches of it, the more commanding influence will Divine revelation have upon us, and the more ready shall we be to submit to it, which is the thing aimed at in prefacing the prophecies of this book with these visions. When such a God of glory speaks, it concerns us to hear with attention and reverence; it is at our peril if we do not.

NOW it came to pass in the thirtieth year, in the fourth month, in the fifth day of the month, as I was among the captives by the river of Chebar, that the heavens were opened, and I saw visions of God. 2 In the fifth day of the month, which was the fifth year of king Jehoiachin's captivity, 3 The word of the Lord came expressly unto Ezekiel the priest, the son of Buzi, in the land of the Chaldeans by the river Chebar; and the hand of the Lord was there upon him.

The circumstances of the vision which Ezekiel saw, and in which he received his commission and instructions, are here very particularly set down, that the narrative may appear to be authentic, and not romantic. It may be of use to keep an account when and where God has been pleased to manifest himself to our souls in a peculiar manner, that the return of the day, and our return to the place of the altar, (Gen. xiii. 4,) may receive the pleasing, grateful remembrance of God's favour to us. Remember, O my soul, and never forget what communications of Divine love thou didst receive at such a time, at such a place. Tell others what God did for thee.

First. The time when Ezekiel had this vision is here recorded. It was "in the thirtieth year," ver. 1. Some make it the thirtieth year of the prophet's age. Being a priest, he was at that age to enter upon the full execution of the priestly office; but being debarred from that, by the iniquity and calamity of the times, now they had neither temple nor altar, God at that age called him to the dignity of a prophet. Others make it to be the thirtieth year from the beginning of the reign of Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, from which the Chaldeans began a new computation of times, as they had done from Nabonassar, one hundred and twenty-three years before. Nabopolassar reigned eighty-nine years, and this was the eleventh of his son, which makes the thirty; and it was proper enough for Ezekiel, when he was in Babylon, to use the computation they there used; as we in foreign countries date by the new style.

Title. Dr. Davidson makes of this book three divisions, viz., from chap. i. to xxiv.; from chap. xxv. to xxxii.; and from chap. xxxiii. to xlviii. Others, with Bleek, make four divisions, viz., chaps. i. to xxiv.; chaps. xxv. to xxxii.; chaps. xxxiii. to xxxix.; and chaps. xl. to xlviii. Jones has eight principal divisions, and sundry sub-divisions. We think Bleek's arrangement as good as any.

i. 1. The common opinion is that the river Chebar is the Khabour, which joins the Euphrates at Circesium; but some suppose the Euphrates itself is meant, because Chebar means "great," and we may translate the words "the great river." The dogmatic identification of the Chebar with the Habor of 2 Kings and 1 Chronicles is to be avoided, as the Hebrew names are different. Nor is it "universally agreed" that the Chebar is the river now called the Khabour. High recent authorities favour the opinion that the river of Chebar was the royal canal, or Nahr Malcha, constructed by Nebuchadnezzar. As the place is disputed, so is the time, for while by some the thirtieth year

And he afterwards useth the melancholy computation of his own country; observe, ver. 2, that it was the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity. But the Chaldee paraphrase fixes upon another era, and saith, this was 'the thirtieth year after Hilkiah the priest found the book of the law in the house of the sanctuary, at midnight, after the setting of the moon, in the days of Josiah the king.' And it is true that this was just thirty years from thence; and that was an event so remarkable, as it put the Jewish state upon a new trial, that it was proper enough to date from it; and perhaps therefore the prophet speaks indefinitely of thirty years, as having an eye both to that event and to the Chaldean computation, which were coincident. It was in the fourth month, answering to our June, and in the fifth day of the month, that Ezekiel had this vision, ver. 2. It is probable it was on the sabbath day; because we read, ch. iii. 19, that "at the end of seven days," which we may well suppose to be the next sabbath, the word of the Lord came to him again. Thus John "was in the Spirit on the Lord's day," when he saw the visions of the Almighty. Rev. i. 10. God would hereby put an honour upon his sabbaths, then when "the enemies mocked at them," Lam. i. 7; and would thus encourage his people to keep up their attendance on the ministry of his prophets every sabbath day, by the extraordinary manifestations of himself on some sabbath days.

Secondly. The melancholy circumstances he was in when God honoured him, and thereby favoured his people with his vision. He was "in the land of the Chaldeans, among the captives, by the river of Chebar, and it was in the fifth year of king Jehoiachin's captivity." Observe,

1. The people of God were now, some of them, "captives in the land of the Chaldeans." The body of the Jewish nation yet remained in their own land, but these were the firstfruits of the captivity, and they were some of the best; for in Jeremiah's vision these were the good figs whom God had sent into the land of the Chaldeans for their good, Jer. xxiv. 5; and that it might be for their good, God raised up a prophet among them, to teach them out of the law then when he chastened them, Ps. xciv. 12. Note, It is a great mercy to have the word of God brought us, and a great duty to attend to it diligently when we are in affliction. The word of instruction, and the rod of correction, may be of great service to us in concert and concurrence with each other; the word to explain the rod, and the rod to enforce the word; both together give wisdom. It is happy for a man when he is sick, and in pain, to have "a messenger with him, an interpreter, one among a thousand," if he had but his ear open to discipline, Job xxxiii. 23. One of the quarrels God had with the Jews when he sent them into captivity was, for mocking his messengers, and misusing his prophets; and yet, when they were suffering for this sin, he favoured them with this forfeited mercy. It were ill with us if God did not sometimes graciously thrust upon us those means of grace and salvation which we have foolishly thrust from us. In their captivity they wanted ordinary helps for their souls, and therefore God raised them up these extraordinary ones. For God's children, if they be baulked in their education one way, shall have it made up another way. But observe, "It was in the fifth year of the captivity" that Ezekiel was raised up among them, and not before; so long God left them without any prophet, till they began to lament after the Lord, and to complain, that they saw not their signs, and there was none to tell them how long, Ps. lxxiv. 9, and then they would know how to value a prophet, and God's discoveries of himself to them by him, would be the more acceptable and comfortable. The Jews that remained in their own land had Jeremiah with them, those that were gone into captivity had Ezekiel with them; for, wherever the children of God are scattered abroad, he will find out tutors for them.

2. The prophet was himself among the captives, those of them that were posted by the river Chebar; for it "was by the rivers of Babylon" that they sat down, and on the willow-trees, by the river side, they hung their harps, Ps. cxxxvii. 2. The planters in America keep along by the sides of the rivers, and perhaps those captives were employed by their masters in improving some parts of the country, by the river sides, that were uncultivated, the natives being generally employed in war; or they employed them in manufactures, and therefore chose to fix them by the sides of rivers, that the goods they made might the more easily be conveyed by water-carriage. Interpreters agree not what river this of Chebar was, but among the captives by that river Ezekiel was, and himself a captive.

Observe here, 1st. That the best men, and those that are dearest to God, often share, not only in the common calamities of this life, but in the public and national judgments that are inflicted for sin. They feel the smart who contributed nothing to the guilt; by which it appears that the difference between good and bad ariseth not from the events that are concerning them, but from the temper and disposition of their spirits under them. And since not only righteous men but prophets share with the worst in present punishments, we may infer from thence, with the greatest assurance, that there are rewards reserved for them in the future state. 2nd. Words of conviction, counsel, and comfort, come best to those that are in affliction from their fellow-sufferers. The captives will be best instructed by one that is a captive among them, and experimentally knows their sorrows. 3rd. The spirit of prophecy was not confined to the land of Israel, but some of the brightest of Divine revelations were revealed "in the land of the Chaldeans," which was a happy presage of the carrying of the church, with that Divine revelation upon which it is built, into the Gentile world; and as now, so afterwards, when the gospel kingdom was to be set up, the dispersion of the Jews contributed to the spreading of the knowledge of God. 4th. Wherever we are, we may keep up our communion with God; for 'from the remotest corners of the earth we may find a way open heavenward,'—undique ad cœlos tantundem est viæ. 5th. When God's ministers are bound, yet the word of the Lord is not bound, 2 Tim. ii. 9. When St. Paul was a prisoner, yet the Gospel had a free course. When St. John was banished into the isle of Patmos, Christ visited him there. Nay, God's suffering servants have generally been treated as favourites, and their consolations have much more abounded, then when affliction has abounded, 2 Cor. i. 5.

Thirdly. The discovery which God was pleased to make of himself to the prophet then when he was in these circumstances, to be by him communicated to his people. He here tells us what he saw, what he heard, and what he felt.

1. He saw visions of God, ver. 1. "No man can see God and live;" but many have seen visions of God, such displays of the Divine glory as have both instructed and affected them. And commonly, when God first revealed himself to any prophet, he did it by an extraordinary vision, as to Isaiah, ch. vi., to Jeremiah, ch. i., to Abraham, Acts vii. 2, to settle a correspondence, and a satisfactory way of intercourse, so as that there needed not afterwards a vision upon every revelation. Ezekiel was employed in turning the hearts of the people to the Lord their God, and therefore he must himself see the visions of God. Note, It concerns those to be well acquainted with God themselves, and much affected with what they know of him, whose business it is to bring others to the knowledge and love of him. That he might see the visions of God, the heavens were opened; the darkness and distance which hindered his visions were conquered, and he was let into the light of the glories of the upper world as near and clear as if heaven had been opened to him.

2. He heard the voice of God; ver. 3, "The word of the Lord came expressly" to him; and what he saw was designed to prepare him for what he was to hear. The expression is emphatical; Essendo fuit verbum Dei,—'The word of the Lord was as really it was to him.' There was no mistake in it; it came to him in the fulness of its light and power, in the evidence and demonstration of the Spirit; it came close to him; nay, it came into him, took possession of him, and dwelt in him richly. It came expressly or accurately to him; he did himself clearly understand what he said, and was abundantly satisfied of the truth of it. The essential Word, (so we may take it,) the Word, who is, who is what he is, came to Ezekiel, to send him on his errand.

3. He felt the power of God opening his eyes to see the visions, opening his ear to hear the voice, and opening his heart to receive both. "The hand of the Lord was there upon him." Note, The hand of the Lord goes along with the word of the Lord; and so it becomes effectual. Those only understand and believe the report to whom the arm of the Lord is revealed. The hand of God was upon him, as upon Moses, to cover him, that he should not be overcome by the dazzling light and lustre of the visions he saw, Ex. xxxiii. 22. It was upon him as upon St. John, Rev. i. 17, to revive and support him, that he might bear up and not faint under these discoveries; that he might neither be lifted up nor cast down with the abundance of the revelations. God's grace is sufficient for him, and in token of that his hand is upon him.

4 And I looked, and, behold, a whirlwind came out of the north, a great cloud, and a fire infolding itself, and a brightness was about it, and out of the midst thereof as the colour of amber, out of the midst of the fire. 5 Also out of the midst thereof came the likeness of four living creatures. And this was their appearance; they had the likeness of a man. 6 And every one had four faces, and every one had four wings. 7 And their feet were straight feet; and the sole of their feet was like the sole of a calf's foot: and they sparkled like the colour of burnished brass. 8 And they had the hands of a man under their wings on their four sides; and they four had their faces and their wings. 9 Their wings were joined one to another; they turned not when they went; they went every one straight forward. 10 As for the likeness of their faces, they four had the face of a man, and the face of a lion, on the right side: and they four had the face of an ox on the left side; they four also had the face of an eagle. 11 Thus were their faces: and their wings were stretched upward; two wings of every one were joined one to another, and two covered their bodies. 12 And they went every one straight forward: whither the spirit was to go, they went; and they turned not when they went. 13 As for the likeness of the living creatures, their appearance was like burning coals of fire, and like the appearance of lamps: it went up and down among the living creatures; and the fire was bright, and out of the fire went forth lightning. 14 And the living creatures ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning.

The visions of God, which Ezekiel here saw, were very glorious, and had more particulars than those which other prophets saw. The scope and intention of these visions is, 1. To possess the prophet's mind with very great, and high, and honourable thoughts of that God by whom he was commissioned, and for whom he was employed. It is the likeness of the glory of the Lord that he sees, ver. 28, and from hence we may infer, it is his honour to serve him, for he is one whom angels serve. He may serve him with safety, for he hath power sufficient to bear him out in his work. It is at his peril to draw back from his service, for he hath power to pursue him, as he did Jonah. So great a God as this must be served with reverence and godly fear; and with assurance may Ezekiel foretell what this God will do, for he is able to make his words good. 2. To strike a terror upon the sinners that remained in Zion, and those that were already come to Babylon, who were secure, and bid defiance to the threatenings of Jerusalem's ruin, as we have found in Jeremiah's prophecy, and shall find in this, many did. Let those who said, "We shall have peace, though we go on," know, that our God is a consuming fire, whom they cannot stand before. That this vision had a reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, seems plain from ch. xliii. 3, where he saith, it was "the vision which he saw when he came to destroy the city," that is, to prophesy the destruction of it. 3 To speak comfort to those that feared God and trembled at his word, and humbled themselves under his mighty hand. Let them know, that though they are captives in Babylon yet they have God nigh unto them; though they have not the place of the sanctuary to be their glorious high throne, they have the God of the sanctuary. Dr. Lightfoot observes, 'That now the church is to be planted for a long time in another country, the Lord shews a glory in the midst of them, as he had done at their is computed from the reformation under Josiah, by others it is reckoned from the accession of Nabopolassar as king of Babylon; and by others again it is taken to mean the age of the prophet. Whatever thirtieth year is meant, it must agree with the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, mentioned in verse 2. Dr. Fairbairn favours the opinion that the prophet says he was thirty years of age, or a little over, when he commenced his prophetic work. On the other hand, the Rev. F. W. Farrar, in "Smith's Dictionary of the Bible," says it is now generally agreed that it was in the thirtieth year of the era of Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar. By "visions of God" we may understand divine visions, i.e., visions of divine things, and divinely given. Ezekiel was favoured with visions of symbolical representations rather than of objective realities.

i. 4. With regard to the imagery introduced at this verse it may be observed at once that composite animal forms were known among first constituting into a church in the wilderness; and out of a cloud and fire, as he had done there, he shewed himself, and from between living creatures, as from between the cherubims, he gives his oracles.' This put an honour upon them, by which they might value themselves when the Chaldeans insulted over them; and this might encourage their hopes of deliverance in due time.

Now, to answer these ends, we have in these verses the first part of the vision, which represents God as attended and served by an innumerable company of angels, who are all his messengers, his ministers, doing his commandments, and hearkening to the voice of his word, which speaks him great, as it magnifies an earthly prince to have a splendid retinue, and numerous armies at his command, which engageth his allies to trust him, and his enemies to fear him.

First. The introduction to this vision of the angels is very magnificent and awakening, ver. 4. The prophet, observing the heavens to open, looked, looked up, as it was time, to see what discoveries God would make to him. Note, When the heavens are opened it concerns us to have our eyes open. And to clear the way, "Behold a whirlwind came out of the north," which would drive away the interposing mists of this lower region. Fair weather uses to come out of the north, and thence the wind comes that drive away rain. God can by a whirlwind clear the sky and air, and produce that serenity of mind which is necessary to our communion with heaven. Yet this whirlwind was attended with a great cloud. When we think the clouds that arise from this earth are dispelled, and we can see beyond them, yet still there is a cloud which heavenly things are wrapped in, a cloud from above, so that we cannot order our speech concerning them by reason of darkness. Christ here descended as he ascended, in a cloud. Some by this whirlwind and cloud understand the Chaldean army coming out of the north against the land of Judah, bearing down all before them, as a tempest; and so it agrees with that which was signified by one of the first of Jeremiah's visions; Jer. i. 14, "Out of the north an evil shall break forth;" but I take it here as an introduction rather to the vision than to the sermons. This whirlwind came to Ezekiel, as that to Elijah, 1 Kin. xix. 11, to prepare the way of the Lord, and to demand attention. He that has eyes, that has ears, let him see, let him hear.

Secondly. The vision itself. "A great cloud" was the vehicle of this vision, in which it was conveyed to the prophet; for God's pavilion in which he rests, his chariot in which he rides, is darkness and thick clouds, Ps. xviii. 11; civ. 3. Thus he holds back the face of his throne, lest its dazzling light and lustre should overpower us, by spreading a cloud upon it. Now,

1. The cloud is accompanied with a fire, as upon mount Sinai, where God resided in a thick cloud; but "the sight of his glory was like devouring fire," Ex. xxiv. 16, 17; and his first appearance to Moses was in a flame of fire in the bush; "for our God is a consuming fire." This was "a fire infolding itself," a globe, or orb, or wheel of fire. God being his own cause, his own rule, and his own end, if he be as a fire, he is as a fire infolding itself, or as some read it, 'kindled by itself.' The fire of God's glory shines forth, but it presently catcheth itself, for he lets us know but part of his ways. The fire of God's wrath breaks forth, but presently catcheth itself; and the Divine patience suffers not all his wrath to be stirred up. If it were not a fire thus infolding itself, "O Lord, who shall stand?"

2. The fire is surrounded with a glory; "a brightness was about it," in which it infolded itself, yet it made some discovery of itself. Though we cannot see into the fire, cannot by searching find out God to perfection, yet we see the brightness that is round about it, the reflection of this fire from the thick cloud. Moses might see God's back parts, but not his face; we have some light concerning the nature of God from the brightness which encompasseth it, though we have not an insight into it, by reason of the cloud spread upon it. Nothing more easy than to determine that God is; nothing more difficult than to describe what he is. When God displays his wrath as fire, yet there is a brightness about it; for his holiness and justice appear very illustrious in the punishment of sin and sinners. Even about the devouring fire there is a brightness, which glorified saints will for ever admire.

3. Out of this fire shines the colour of amber. We are not told who or what it was that had this colour of amber, and therefore I take it to be the whole frame of the following vision, which came into Ezekiel's view out of the midst of the fire and brightness, and the first thing he took notice of, before he viewed the particulars, was, that it was of the colour of amber, or the eye of amber, that is, it looked as amber doth to the eye, of a bright flaming fiery colour; the colour of a burning coal, so some think it should be read. The living creatures which he saw coming out of the midst of the fire were seraphims, 'burners;' for "he maketh his angels spirits, his ministers a flaming fire."

4. That which comes out of the fire, of a fiery amber colour, when it comes to be distinctly viewed, is "the likeness of four living creatures," not the living creatures themselves. Angels are spirits, and cannot be seen, but the likeness of them, such a hieroglyphic or representation as God saw fit to make use of, for the leading of the prophet, and us with him, into some acquaintance with the world of angels, (a matter purely of Divine revelation,) so far as is requisite to possess us with an awful sense of the greatness of that God who hath angels for his attendants, and the goodness of that God who hath appointed them to be attendants on his people. The "likeness of these living creatures came out of the midst of the fire;" for angels derive their being and power from God. They are in themselves, and are to us, what he is pleased to make them; their glory is a ray of his. The prophet himself explains this vision; ch. x. 20, "I know that the living creatures were the cherubims," which is one of the names by which the angels are known in Scripture. To Daniel was made known their numbers; "ten thousand times ten thousand," Dan. vii. 10. But though they are many, yet they are one; and that is made known to Ezekiel here. They are one in nature and operation, as an army consisting of thousands is yet called a body of men. We have here an account of,

1st. Their nature. They are living creatures, they are the creatures of God, the work of his hands; their being is derived, they have not life in and of themselves, but receive it from him, who is the fountain of life. As much as the living creatures of this lower world excel the vegetables that are the ornaments of the earth, so much do the angels, the living creatures of the upper world, excel the sun, moon, and stars, the ornaments of the heavens. The sun, say some, is a flame of fire infolding itself, but it is not a living creature, as angels, those flames of fire, are. Angels are living lights, living beings, emphatically so; men on earth are dying creatures, dying daily; "In the midst of life we are in death;" but angels in heaven are living creatures, they live indeed, live to good purpose; and when saints come to be equal unto the angels they shall not die any more, Lu. xx. 36.

2nd. Their number. They are four, so they appear here, though they are innumerable. Not as if these were four particular angels, set up above the rest, as some have fondly imagined, Michael and Gabriel, Raphael and Uriel; but for the sake of the four faces they put on, and to insinuate their being sent forth towards the four winds of heaven, Mat. xxiv. 31; and Zechariah sees them as four chariots going forth, east, west, north and south, Zec. vi. 1. God has messengers to send each way, for his kingdom is universal, and reacheth to all parts of the world.

3rd. Their qualifications, by which they are fitted for the service of their Maker and Master. These are set forth figuratively, and by similitude, as is proper in visions, which are parables to the eye. Their description here is such, and so expressed, as that I think it is not possible by it to form an exact idea of them in our fancies, or with the pencil, for that would be a temptation to worship them; but the several instances of their fitness for the work they are employed in are intended in the several parts of this description. Note, It is the greatest honour of God's creatures to be in a capacity of answering the end of their creation; and the more ready we are to every good work the nearer we approach to the dignity of angels.

These living creatures are described here,

First. By their general appearance: "They had the likeness of a man," they appeared for the main in a human shape. 1*st.* To signify that these living creatures are reasonable creatures, intelligent beings, who have that spirit of a man, which is the candle of the Lord. 2*nd.* To put an honour upon the nature of man, who is made lower, yet but a little lower than the angels, in the very next rank of beings below them; when the invisible intelligences of the upper world would make themselves visible, it is in the likeness of man. 3*rd.* To intimate, that their delights are with the sons of men, as their Master's are, Pr. viii. 31, that they do service to men, and men may have a spiritual communion with them by faith, hope, and holy love. 4*th.* The angels of God appear in the likeness of man, because, in the fulness of time, the Son of God was not only to appear in that likeness, but to assume that nature; they therefore shew this love to it.

Secondly. By their faces: "Every one had four faces," looking four several ways. In St. John's vision, which has a near affinity with this, each of the four living creatures has one of these faces here mentioned, Rev. iv. 7. Here each of them has all four, to intimate that they have all the same qualifications for service; though perhaps, among the angels of heaven, as among the angels of the churches, some excel in one gift and others in another, but all for the common service. Let us contemplate their faces till we be, in some measure, changed into the same image, that we may do the will of God, as the angels do it in heaven. They all four had the face of a man, for in that likeness they appeared, ver. 5; but, besides that, they had the face of a lion, an ox, and an eagle, each masterly in their kind: the lion among wild beasts, the ox among tame ones, and the eagle among fowls, ver. 10. Doth God make use of them for the executing of judgments upon his enemies? they are fierce and strong as the lion and the eagle, in tearing their prey. Doth he make use of them for the good of his people? they are as oxen, strong for labour, and inclined to serve. And in both they have the understanding of a man. The scattered perfections of the living creatures on earth meet in the angels of heaven. They have the likeness of a man, but because there are some things in which man is excelled, even by the inferior creatures, they are therefore compared to some of them. They have the understanding of a man, and such as far exceeds it. They also resemble man in tenderness and humanity. But, 1*st.* A lion excels a man in strength and boldness, and is much more formidable; therefore, the angels, who do so too, put on the face of a lion. 2*nd.* An ox excels man in diligence and patience, and painstaking, and an unwearied discharge of the work he has to do; therefore, the angels, who are constantly employed in the service of God and the church, put on the face of an ox. 3*rd.* An eagle excels man in quickness and piercingness of sight, and in soaring high; and therefore, the angels, who seek things above, and see far into Divine mysteries, put on the face of a flying eagle.

Thirdly. By their wings: "Every one had four wings," ver. 6. In the vision Isaiah had of them they appeared with six, now with four; for they appeared above the throne, and had occasion for two to cover their faces with. The angels are fitted with wings to fly swiftly on God's errands; whatever business God sends them upon they lose no time. Faith and hope are the soul's wings, upon which it soars upwards; pious and devout affections are its wings, on which it is carried forward with vigour and alacrity. The prophet observes here concerning their wings, 1*st.* That they were joined one to another, ver. 9; and again, ver. 11. They did not make use of their wings for fighting, as some birds do; there is no contest among the angels; God maketh peace, perfect peace, in his high places. But their wings were joined in token of their perfect unity and unanimity, and the universal agreement there is among them. 2*nd.* That they were stretched upward, extended, and ready for use, not folded up, or flagging. Let an angel receive the least intimation of the Divine will, and he has nothing to seek, but is upon the wing presently; while our poor dull souls are like the ostrich, that with much difficulty litteth up herself on high. 3*rd.* That two of their wings were made use of in covering their bodies, the spiritual bodies they assumed. The clothes that cover us are our hindrance in work; angels need no other covering but their own wings, which are their furtherance. They cover their bodies from us, so forbidding us needless inquiries concerning them; ask not after them, for they are wonderful, Jud. xiii. 18. They cover them before God, so directing us, when we approach to God, to see that we be so clothed with Christ's righteousness as that the shame of our nakedness may not appear.

Fourthly. By their feet, including their legs and thighs: They "were straight feet," ver. 7; they stood straight, and firm, and steady, no burthen of service could make their legs to bend under them. The spouse makes this part of the description of her Beloved, that his legs were "as pillars of marble set upon sockets of fine gold," Cant. v. 15; such are the angels' legs. 'The sole of their feet was like that of a calf's foot,' which divideth the hoof, and is therefore clean; 'as it were the sole of a round foot,' as the Chaldee words it; they were ready for motion any way. Their feet were winged, so the Seventy; they went so swiftly that it was as if they flew; and their very feet "sparkled like the colour of burnished brass." Not only the faces, but the very feet of those are beautiful whom God sends on his errands, Isa. lii. 7; every step the angels take is glorious. In the vision John had of Christ it is said, "his feet were like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace," Rev. i. 15.

Fifthly. By their hands: ver. 8, "They had the hands of a man under their wings on their four sides;" an arm and hand under every wing. They had not only wings for motion, but hands for action. Many are quick that are not active; they hurry about a great deal, but do nothing to purpose, bring nothing to pass; they have wings, but no hands: whereas God's servants, the angels, not only go when he sends them, and come when he calls them, but do what he bids them. They are the hands of a man, which are wonderfully made, and fitted for service, which are guided by reason and understanding; for what angels do they do intelligently, and with judgment. They have calves' feet, which speaks the swiftness of their motion; the cedars of Lebanon are said to skip like a calf, Ps. xxix. 6. But they have a man's hand, which speaks the niceness and exactness of their performances, as the heavens are said to be the work of God's fingers. Their hands were under their wings, which concealed them, as they did the rest of their bodies. Note, The agency of angels is a secret thing, and their work is carried on in an invisible way. In working for God, though we must not with the sluggard hide our hand in our bosom, yet we must with the humble not let our left hand know what our right hand doth. We may observe, that where these wings were their hands were under their wings; wherever their wings carried them they carried hands along with them, to be still doing something suitable, something that the duty of the place requires.

different nations, but were particularly common in connection with Assyrian and Babylonian worship. The only approach to such creations among the Jews was in the cherubic symbols which were introduced into the tabernacle and into the Temple. In prophetic vision these curious combinations occur especially in three places—in Isa. vi., in Rev. iv., and in Ezekiel. That cherubim is the proper name for at we find in the earlier parts of Ezekiel is shown by chap. x. 1—22; 22. Cherubim with two faces appear in chap. xli. 18—20 of this book. [See article "Cherub" in "Cassell's Bible Dictionary."] The prophet here represents himself as looking and seeing come from the north a whirlwind or storm-wind, bearing a vast cloud, with lightning flashes, brightness around the cloud, a gold-coloured centre more conspicuous than the fire, and forms instinct with life proceeding out of all this glory. To the description of these forms and of other details he at once passes. The Hebrew word rendered "amber" is chashmal, which may mean a metal of a pale gold-colour compounded

4th. Their motions: The living creatures are moving. Angels are active beings; it is not their happiness to sit still and do nothing, but to be always well employed; and we must reckon ourselves then best when we are doing good, doing it as the angels do it, of whom it is here observed,

First. That whatever service they went about, "they went every one straight forward," ver. 9; and again, ver. 12, which intimates, 1*st.* That they sincerely aimed at the glory of God and had a single eye to that in all they did. Their going straight forward supposeth that they looked straight forward, and never had any sinister intentions in what they did. And if thus our eye be single, our whole body will be full of light; the singleness of the eye is the sincerity of the heart. 2*nd.* That they were intent upon the service they were employed in, and did it with a close application of mind. They went forward with their work, for what their hand found to do they did it with all their might, and did not loiter in it. 3*rd.* That they were unanimous in it. They went straight forward, every one about his own work, and did not thwart or jostle one another; did not stand in one another's light, in one another's way. 4*th.* That they perfectly understood their business, and were thoroughly apprised of it; so that they needed not to stand still, to pause, or hesitate, but work their work before them with readiness, as those that knew what they had to do, and how to do it. 5*th.* They were steady and constant in their work. They did not fluctuate, did not tire, did not vary, but were of a piece with themselves; they moved in a direct line, and so went the next way to work in all they did, and lost no time. When we go straight, we go forward; when we serve God with one heart, we rid ground, we rid work.

Secondly. They turned not when they went, ver. 9; and again, ver. 12. 1*st.* They made no blunders or mistakes, which would give them occasion to turn back to rectify them. Their work needed no correction, and therefore needed not to be gone over again. 2*nd.* They minded no diversions. As they turned not back, so they turned not aside, to trifle with any thing that was foreign to their business.

Thirdly. "Whither the Spirit was to go" they went, ver. 12; either, 1*st.* Whither their own spirit was disposed to go, thither they went, having no bodies, as we have, to clog or hinder them. It is our infelicity and daily burthen, that when the spirit is willing yet the flesh is weak, and cannot keep pace with it, so that the good which we would do we do it not; but angels and glorified saints labour under no such impotency, but whatever they incline or intend to do they do it, and never come short of it. Or, rather, 2*nd.* Wheresoever the Spirit of God would have them go, thither they went. Though they had so much wisdom of their own, yet in all their motions and actions they subjected themselves to the conduct and government of the Divine will; whithersoever the Divine providence was to go they went to serve its purposes, and to execute its orders. The Spirit of God, saith Mr. Greenhill, is the great agent that sets angels to work, and it is their honour that they are led, they are easily led by the Spirit. See how tractable and obsequious these noble creatures are; whithersoever the Spirit is to go, they go immediately, with all possible alacrity. Note, Those that walk after the Spirit do the will of God as the angels do it.

Fourthly. They ran and returned like a flash of lightning, ver. 14. This intimates, 1*st.* That they made haste. They were quick in their motions, as quick as lightning; whatever business they went about, they despatched it presently, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye. Happy they that have no bodies to retard their motion in holy exercises, and happy shall we be when we come to have spiritual bodies for spiritual work. Satan falls like lightning into his own ruin, Lu. x. 18; angels fly like lightning in their Master's work; the angel Gabriel flew swiftly. 2*nd.* That they made haste back. They ran and returned, ran to do their work and execute their orders, and then returned to give an account of what they had done, and receive new instructions, that they may be always doing. They ran into the lower world, to do what was to be done there; but when they had done it they returned like a flash of lightning to the upper world again, to the beatific vision of their God, which they could not with any patience be longer from than their service did require. Thus we should be in the affairs of this world as out of our element; though we run into them we must not repose in them, but our souls must presently return like lightning to God, their rest and centre.

5. We have an account of the light by which the prophet saw these living creatures, or the looking-glass in which he saw them, ver. 13. 1st. He saw them by their own light, for "their appearance was like burning coals of fire." They are seraphims, 'burners,' noting the ardour of their love to God, their fervent zeal in his service, their splendour and brightness, and their terror against God's enemies. When God employs them to fight his battles, they are as coals of fire, Ps. xviii. 12, to devour the adversaries, as lightnings shot out to discomfit them. 2nd. He saw them by the light of some lamps which "went up and down among" them, the shining whereof was very bright. Satan's works are works of darkness, he is "the ruler of the darkness of this world;" but the angels of light are in the light, and, though they conceal their working, they shew their work, for it will bear the light. But we see them and their works only by candle-light, by the dim light of lamps that go up and down among them; when the day breaks and the shadows flee away, we shall see them clearly. Some make the appearance of these burning coals, and of the lightning that issues out of the fire, to signify the wrath of God and his judgments that were now to be executed upon Judah and Jerusalem for their sins, in which angels were to be employed. And accordingly we find afterwards "coals of fire scattered upon the city," to consume it, which were "fetched from between the cherubims," ch. x. 2. But by the appearance of the lamps then, we may understand the light of comfort which shone forth to the people of God in the darkness of this present trouble. If the ministry of the angels is as a consuming fire to God's enemies, it is a rejoicing light to his own children. To the one this fire is bright, it is very reviving and refreshing; to the other, out of the fire comes forth lightning to destroy them. Note, Good angels are our friends or enemies according as God is.

15 Now as I beheld the living creatures, behold one wheel upon the earth by the living creatures, with his four faces. 16 The appearance of the wheels and their work was like unto the colour of a beryl: and they four had one likeness: and their appearance and their work was as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel. 17 When they went, they went upon their four sides; and they turned not when they went. 18 As for their rings, they were so high that they were dreadful; and their rings were full of eyes round about them four. 19 And when the living creatures went, the wheels went by them: and when the living creatures were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up. 20 Whithersoever the spirit was to go, they went, thither was their spirit to go; and the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels. 21 When those went, these went; and when those stood, these stood; and when those were lifted up from the earth, the wheels were lifted up over against them: for the spirit of the living creature was in the wheels. 22 And the likeness of the firmament upon the heads of the living creature was as the colour of the terrible crystal, stretched forth over their heads above. 23 And under the firmament were their wings straight, the one toward the other: every one had two, which covered on this side, and every one had two, which covered on that side, their bodies. 24 And when they went, I heard the noise of their wings, like the noise of great waters, as the voice of the Almighty, the voice of speech, as the noise of an host: when they stood, they let down their wings. 25 And there was a voice from the firmament that was over their heads, when they stood, and had let down their wings.

The prophet is very exact in making and recording his observations concerning this vision. And here we have,

First. The notice he took of the wheels, ver. 15—21. The glory of God appears not only in the splendour of his retinue in the upper world, but in the steadiness of his government here in this lower world. Having seen how "God doth according to his will in the armies of heaven," let us now see how he doth, according to it, "among the inhabitants of the earth;" for there, on the earth, the prophet saw the wheels, ver. 15. As he "beheld the living creatures," and was contemplating the glory of that vision, and receiving instruction from it, this other vision presented itself to his view. Note, Those who make a good use of the discoveries God has favoured them with may expect farther discoveries, for to him that hath shall be given. We are sometimes tempted to think there is nothing glorious but what is in the upper world, whereas, could we with an eye of faith discern the beauty of providence, and the wisdom, power, and goodness which shine in the administration of that kingdom, we would see and say, "Verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth," and acts like himself. There are many things in this vision which give us some light concerning the Divine providence.

1. The dispensations of providence are compared to wheels, either the wheels of a chariot, in which the conqueror rides in triumph; or, rather, the wheels of a clock or watch, which all contribute to the regular motion of the machine. We read of the course or wheel of nature, Jas. iii. 6, which is here set before us as under the direction of the God of nature. Wheels, though they move not of themselves, as the living creatures do, yet they are made movable, and are almost continually kept in action. Providence, represented by these wheels, orders changes; sometimes one spoke of the wheel is uppermost, and sometimes another; but the motion of the wheel on its own axletree, like that of the orbs above, is very regular and steady. The motion of the wheels is circular. By the revolutions of providence things are brought to the same posture and pass which they were in formerly; for "the thing that is is that which has been, and there is no new thing under the sun," Eccl. i. 9, 10.

2. The wheel is said to be "by the living creatures" who attended it to direct its motion; for the angels are employed as the ministers of God's providence, and have a greater hand in directing the motions of second causes to serve the Divine purpose than we think they have. Such a close connexion is there between the living creatures and the wheels, that they moved and rested together. Were angels busily employed, men were busily employed as instruments in their hand, whether of mercy or judgment, though they themselves were not aware of it; or are men active to compass their designs, angels at the same time are acting to control and overrule them. This is much insisted on here; ver. 19, "When the living creatures went" to bring about any business, "the wheels went by them;" when God has work to do by the ministry of angels, second causes are all found or made ready to concur in it; and, ver. 21, "when those stood these stood;" when the angels had done their work, the second causes had done theirs. If the "living creatures were lifted up from the earth," were elevated to any service above the common course of nature, and out of the ordinary road, as suppose in the working of miracles, the dividing of the water, the standing still of the sun, the wheels, contrary to their own natural tendency, which is towards the earth, move in concert with them, and are lifted up over against them; this is thrice mentioned, ver. 19—21. Note, All inferior creatures are, and move, and act, as the Creator, by the ministration of angels, directs and influences them. Visible effects are managed and governed by invisible causes. The reason given of this is, because "the spirit of the living creatures was in the wheels," that is, the same wisdom, power, and holiness of God, the same will and counsel of his that guides and governs the angels and all their performances, doth by of gold and silver, or it may denote a kind of brass, such as is even now used in some Eastern lands for mirrors. A circular plate of this metal, when highly polished, has a peculiar brilliancy.

i. 5—11. The figures revealed to Ezekiel were, generally speaking, in the human form. They were four in number; each having four faces and four wings. Their feet were like those of a calf, but brilliant as polished brass. Their hands were human in shape, but beneath the wings, which were not spread out. Their faces resembled those of the lion and man on the right side, and the ox and eagle on the other side. The pairs of wings seem to have turned one upwards and the other downwards—the latter covering the body. It is worth observing that in some respects these forms differ from any with which we have been made acquainted by explorers among the relics of Persia, Assyria, and Egypt, though reminding us of them.

i. 15—21. The description in this second part of the vision is somewhat obscure, but Dr. Fairbairn thus explains it: "By the side them order and dispose of all the motions of the creatures in this lower world, and the events and issues of them. God is the soul of the world, and animates the whole, both that above and that beneath; so that they move in perfect harmony, as the upper and lower parts of the natural body do. So that "whithersoever the Spirit is to go," that is, whatever it is God's will and purpose should be done and brought to pass, "thither their spirit is to go," that is, the angels, knowingly and designedly, set themselves to bring it about; and "their spirit is in the wheels," which are therefore "lifted up over against them," that is, both the powers of nature and the wills of men are all made to serve the intention, which they infallibly and irresistibly effect, though perhaps "they mean not so, neither doth their heart think so," Isa. x. 7; Mic. iv. 11, 12. Thus, though the will of God's precept be not done on earth as it is done in heaven, yet the will of his purpose and counsel is and shall be.

3. The wheel is said to have four faces, looking four several ways, ver. 15, noting that the providence of God exerts itself in all parts of the world, east, west, north, and south, and extends itself to the remotest corners of it. Look which way you will upon the wheel of providence, and it has a face towards you, a beautiful one, which you may admire the features and complexion of; it looks upon you as ready to speak to you, if you be but ready to hear the voice of it. Like a well-drawn picture, it has an eye upon all that has an eye upon it. The wheel had so four faces, that it had in it four wheels, which went upon their four sides, ver. 17. At first Ezekiel saw it as one wheel, ver. 15, one sphere; but afterwards he saw it was four, but they four had one likeness, ver. 16, not only that they were like one another, but they were as if they had been one. This intimates, 1st. That one event of providence is like another; what happens to us is that which is common to men, and what we are not to think strange. 2nd. That various events have a tendency to the same issue, and concur to answer the same intention.

4. Their appearance and their work is said to be like the colour of a beryl, ver. 16. 'The colour of Tarshish,' so the word is, that is, of the sea; the beryl is of that colour, sea green, blue Neptune, we call it. The nature of things in this world is like that of the sea, which is in a continual flux, and yet there is a constant coherence and succession of its parts. There is a chain of events which is always in the drawing one way or other. The sea ebbs and flows, so doth providence in its disposals, but always in the stated and appointed times and measures. The sea looks blue, as the air doth, because of the shortness and feebleness of our sight, which can see but a little way of either; to that colour, therefore, is the appearance and work of providence fitly compared, because we cannot find out that which God doth from the beginning to the end, Eccl. iii. 11. We see but part of his ways, Job xxvi. 14; and all beyond looks blue, which gives us to understand no more concerning it but that in truth we ken it not; it is far above out of our sight.

5. Their appearance and their work is likewise said to be "as it were a wheel in the middle of a wheel." Observe, Here again their appearance to the prophet is designed to set forth what their work really is. Men's appearance and their work often differ, but the appearance of God's providence and its work agree; if they seem to differ, it is through our ignorance and mistake. Now both were as a wheel in a wheel, a lesser wheel moved by a greater. We pretend not to give a mathematical description of it; the meaning is, that the disposals of providence seem to us intricate, and perplexed, and unaccountable, and yet they will appear in the issue to have been all wisely ordered for the best, so that, though what God doth we know not now, yet we shall know hereafter, Jno. xiii. 7.

6. The motion of these wheels, like that of the living creatures, was steady, and regular, and constant; "They returned not when they went," ver. 17, because they never went amiss, nor otherwise than they should do. God in his providence takes his work before him, and he will have it go forward; and it is going on even then when it seems to us to be going backward. They went as the Spirit directed them, and therefore returned not. We should not have occasion to return back as we have, and to undo that by repentance which we have done amiss, and to do it over again, if we were but led by the Spirit, and followed his conduct. 'The spirit of life' (so some read it) 'was in the wheels,' which carried them on with ease and evenness, and then they returned not when they went.

7. "The rings" or rims "of the wheels were so high that they were dreadful," ver. 18. They were of a vast circumference, so that when they were reared and put in motion the prophet was even afraid to look upon them. Note, The vast compass of God's thought, and the vast reach of his design, is really astonishing; when we go about to describe the circle of providence, we are struck with amazement, and are even swallowed up. O the height and depth of God's counsels, the consideration whereof should strike an awe upon us!

8. They were "full of eyes round about." This circumstance of the vision is most surprising of all, and yet most significant, plainly speaking that the motions of providence are all directed by infinite wisdom. The issues of things are not determined by a blind fortune, but by those "eyes of the Lord which run to and fro through the earth, and are in every place, beholding the evil and the good." Note, It is a great satisfaction to us, and ought to be so, that, though we cannot account for the springs and tendencies of events, yet they are all under the cognizance and conduct of an all-wise, all-seeing God.

Secondly. The notice he took of the firmament above, over the heads of the living creatures. When he saw the living creatures moving, and the wheels by them, he looked up, as it is proper for us to do when we observe the various motions of providence in this lower world; looking up he saw "the firmament stretched forth over the heads of the living creatures," ver. 22. What is done on earth is done under the heaven, as the Scripture often speaks, under its inspection and influence. Observe,

1. What he saw. "The firmament was as the colour of the terrible crystal," truly glorious, but terribly so; the vastness and brightness of it put the prophet into an amazement, and struck him with an awful reverence. The terrible ice or frost, (so it may be read,) the colour of snow congealed, or as mountains of ice in the northern seas, which are very frightful. Daring sinners ask, "Can God judge through the dark cloud?" Job xxii. 13; but that which we take to be a dark cloud is to him transparent as crystal, through which "from the place of his habitation he looks upon all the inhabitants of the earth," Ps. xxxiii. 14. Under the firmament he saw the wings of the living creatures erect, ver. 23; when they pleased they used them either for flight or for covering, or two for flight and two for covering. God is on high above the firmament, the angels are under the firmament, which notes their subjection to God's dominion, and their readiness to fly on his errands "in the open firmament of heaven," and to serve him unanimously.

2. What he heard. 1st. He heard "the noise of angels' wings," ver. 24. Bees and other insects make a great noise with the vibration of their wings; here the angels do so, to awaken the attention of the prophet to that which God was about to say to him from the firmament, ver. 25. Angels, by the providences they are employed in, sound God's alarms to the children of men, and stir them up to hear his voice; for that is it that cries in the city, and is heard and understood by the men of wisdom. The noise of their wings was loud and terrible, "as the noise of great waters;" like the rout or roaring of the sea, "and as the noise of an host, the noise of war; but it was articulate and intelligible, and did not give an uncertain sound, for it was "the voice of speech;" nay it was "as the voice of the Almighty," for God, by his providences, speaks once, yea twice, if we could but perceive it, Job xxxiii. 14; the Lord's voice cries, Mic. vi. 9. 2nd. He heard "a voice from the firmament," from him that sits upon the throne there, ver. 25. When the angels moved they made a noise with their wings, but when with that they had roused a careless world, they stood still, and "let down their wings," that there might be a profound silence, and so God's voice might be the better heard. The voice of providence is designed to open men's ears to the voice of the word, to do the office of the crier, that with a loud voice charges silence while the judge passeth sentence; "He that has ears to hear let him hear." Note, Noises on earth should awaken our attention to the voice from the firmament; for "how shall we escape if we turn away from him that speaks from heaven?"

26 And above the firmament that was over their heads was the likeness of a throne, as the appearance of a sapphire stone: and upon the likeness of the throne was the likeness as the appearance of a man above upon it. 27 And I saw as the colour of amber, as the appearance of fire round about within it, from the appearance of his loins even upward, and from the appearance of his loins even downward, I saw as it were the appearance of fire, and it had brightness round about. 28 As the appearance of the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain, so was the appearance of the brightness round about. This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD. And when I saw it, I fell upon my face, and I heard a voice of one that spake.

All the other parts of this vision were but a preface and introduction to this. God in them had made himself known as Lord of angels, and supreme director of all the affairs of this lower world; from whence it is easy to infer, that, whatever God by his prophets either promiseth or threateneth to do, he is able to effect it. Angels are his servants, men are his tools. But now a Divine revelation is to be given to a prophet, and by him to the church, we must look higher than the living creatures or the wheels; and must expect that from the eternal Word, of whom we have an account in these verses. Ezekiel hearing a voice from the firmament, looked up, as John did, to see the voice that spake with him, and he saw one like unto the Son of man, Rev. i. 12, 13. The second Person sometimes tried the fashion of a man occasionally, before he clothed himself with it for good and all; and the spirit of prophecy is called the Spirit of Christ, 1 Pet. i. 11; and the testimony of Jesus, Rev. xix. 10.

First. This glory of Christ that the prophet saw was above the firmament, that was over the heads of the living creatures, ver. 26. Note, The heads of angels themselves are under the feet of the Lord Jesus; for the firmament that is over their heads is under his feet. Angels, principalities, and powers are made subject to him, 1 Pet. iii. 22. This dignity and dominion of the Redeemer before his incarnation magnifies his condescension in his incarnation, when he was made a little lower than the angels, Heb. ii. 9.

Secondly. The first thing he observed was a throne, for Divine revelation comes backed and supported with a royal authority; we must have an eye of faith to God and Christ as upon a throne. The first thing John discovered in his visions was a throne set in heaven, Rev. iv. 2; which commands reverence and subjection. It is a throne of glory, a throne of grace, a throne of triumph, a throne of government, a throne of judgment. "The Lord has prepared his throne in the heavens," has prepared it for his Son, whom he hath set King on his holy hill of Zion.

Thirdly. On the throne he saw the appearance of a man. This is good news to the children of men, that the throne above the firmament is filled with one that is not ashamed to appear even there in the likeness of man. Daniel in vision saw the kingdom and dominion given to one like the Son of man, who therefore hath "authority given him to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man," Jno. v. 27; so appearing in these visions.

Fourthly. The prince and judge upon this throne, though he appear in fashion as a man, yet he appears in more than human glory, ver. 27. 1. Is God a shining light? So is he. When the prophet saw him, he saw as the colour of amber; that is, a brightness round about, for God dwells in light, and covers himself with light as with a garment. How low did the Redeemer stoop for us, when, to bring about our salvation, he suffered this glory to be eclipsed by the veil of his humanity! 2. Is God a consuming fire? So is he. From his loins, both upward and downward, there was the appearance of fire. The fire above the loins was round about within the amber, it was inward and involved, that below the loins was more outward and open, and yet that also had brightness round about. Some make the former to signify Christ's Divine nature, the glory and virtue of which is hid within the colour of amber; it is what no man has seen, or can see. The latter, his human nature, the glory of which there were those that saw, "the glory as of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth," Jno. i. 14. He had rays coming out of his hand, and yet there was the hiding of his power, Hab. iii. 4. The fire in which the Son of man appeared here might be intended to signify the judgments that were ready to be executed upon Judah and Jerusalem, coming from that fiery indignation of the Almighty which devours the adversaries. Nothing more dreadful to the most daring sinners, than "the wrath of him that sits upon the throne, and of the Lamb," Rev. vi. 16. The day is coming "when the Lord Jesus shall be revealed in flaming fire," 2 Thes. i. 7, 8. It concerns us, therefore, to "kiss the Son, lest he be angry."

Fifthly. The throne is surrounded with a rainbow, ver. 28; it is so in St. John's vision, Rev. iv. 3. The brightness about it was of divers colours, as "the bow that is in the cloud in the day of rain;" which, as it is a display of majesty, and looks very great, so it is a pledge of mercy, and looks very kind; for it is a confirmation of the gracious promise God has made, that he will not drown the world again; and he hath said, he will look upon the bow, and remember the covenant, Gen. ix. 16. This intimates that he who sits upon the throne is the Mediator of the covenant; that his dominion is for our protection, not our destruction; that he interposeth between us and the judgments our of each cherub (that is, apparently, on the same side and exterior to the cherub), there was a gigantic wheel, or more properly a double wheel—one within another, going through each other transversely; for the wheels, like the cherubim with their four faces, did not need to turn when they moved from one direction to another; and this could only be effected by a sort of double wheel to every cherub, each running transversely through the other, so that to whichever quarter the movement might point, there could be a motion of the wheel towards it. The felloes, or outer rings of these wheels, were set round with eyes, and were each also instinct with the same spirit of life and power that wrought in the cherubim, so that the motions of all were simultaneous." This may possibly be a correct representation.

i. 22—25. The next feature of the description is the so-called firmament above the heads of the cherubim. This firmament corresponds with the floor of a chariot or the platform of a throne. It was sins have deserved; and that all the promises of God are in him Yea and Amen. Now the fire of God's wrath was breaking out against Jerusalem, bounds should be set to it; and he would not make an utter destruction of it, for he would look upon the bow, and remember the covenant, as he promised in such a case, Lev. xxvi. 42.

Sixthly. We have the conclusion of this vision.

1. What notion the prophet himself had of it; "This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord." Here, as all along, he is careful to guard against all gross, corporeal thoughts of God, which might derogate from the transcendent purity of his nature. He doth not say, "This was the Lord," for he is invisible, but this was "the glory of the Lord;" in which he was pleased to manifest himself a glorious Being. Yet it is not the glory of the Lord, but the likeness of that glory, some faint resemblance of it; nor is it any adequate likeness of that glory, but only the appearance of that likeness, a shadow of it, and not the very image of the thing, Heb. x. 1.

2. What impressions it made upon him; "When I saw it I fell upon my face." 1st. He was overpowered by it, the dazzling lustre of it conquered him, and threw him upon his face; for "who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?" Or rather, 2nd. He prostrated himself, in an humble sense of his own unworthiness of the honour now done him, and of the infinite distance which he now more than ever perceived to be between him and God. He fell upon his face, in token of that holy awe and reverence of God, which his mind was possessed and filled with. Note, The more God is pleased to make known of himself to us, the more low we should be before him. He fell upon his face to adore the majesty of God, and to implore his mercy; and to deprecate the wrath he saw ready to break out against the children of his people.

3. What instructions he had from it. All he saw was only to prepare him for that which he was to hear, for "faith comes by hearing;" he, therefore, "heard a voice of one that spake," for we are taught by words, not merely by hieroglyphics. When he fell on his face ready to receive the word, then he heard the voice of one that spake; for God delights to teach the humble.

CHAPTER II.

What our Lord Jesus said to St. Paul, Acts xxvi. 16, may fitly be applied to the prophet Ezekiel, to whom the same Jesus is here speaking, "Rise, and stand on thy feet, for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister." We have here Ezekiel's ordination to his office, which the vision was designed to fit him for; not to entertain his curiosity with uncommon speculations, but to put him into business. Now here, I. He is commissioned to go as a prophet to the house of Israel, now captives in Babylon, and to deliver God's messages to them from time to time, ver. 1—5. II. He is cautioned not to be afraid of them, ver. 6. III. He is instructed what to say to them, and has words put into his mouth, which is signified by the vision of a roll, which he was ordered to eat, ver. 7—10, and which in the next chapter we find he did eat.

AND he said unto me, Son of man, stand upon thy feet, and I will speak unto thee. 2 And the spirit entered into me when he spake unto me, and set me upon my feet, that I heard him that spake unto me. 3 And he said unto me, Son of man, I send thee to the children of Israel, to a rebellious nation that hath rebelled against me: they and their fathers have transgressed against me, even unto this very day. 4 For they are impudent children and stiffhearted. I do send thee unto them; and thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD. 5 And they, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear, (for they are a rebellious house,) yet shall know that there hath been a prophet among them.

The title here given to Ezekiel, as often afterwards, is very observable. God, when he speaks to him, calls him, Son of man, ver. 1, 3; son of Adam, son of the earth. Daniel is once called so, Dan. viii. 17, and but once. The compellation is used to no other of the prophets, but to Ezekiel all along. We may take it, 1. As an humbling, diminishing title. Lest Ezekiel should be lifted up with the abundance of the revelations, he is put in mind of this that still he is a son of man, a mean, weak, mortal creature. Among other things made known to him, it was necessary he should be made to know this, that he was a son of man; and therefore it was wonderful condescension in God that he was pleased thus to manifest himself to him. Now he is among the living creatures the angels, yet he must remember that he is himself a man, a dying creature. What is man, or the son of man, that he should be thus visited, thus dignified? Though God had here a splendid retinue of holy angels about his throne, that were ready to go on his errands, yet he passeth them all by, and pitches upon Ezekiel, a son of man, to be his messenger to the house of Israel; for "we have this treasure in earthen vessels," and God's messages sent us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid, nor their hand be heavy upon us. Ezekiel was a priest, but the priesthood was brought low, and the honour of it laid in the dust; it therefore became him, and all of his order, to humble themselves and to lie low, as sons of men, common men. He was now to be employed as a prophet, God's ambassador, and a ruler over the kingdoms, Jer. i. 10, a post of great honour; but he must remember that he is a son of man, and whatever good he did it was not by any might of his own, for he was a son of man; but in the strength of Divine grace, which therefore must have all the glory. Or, 2. We may take it as an honourable, dignifying title; for it is one of the titles of the Messiah in the Old Testament, Dan. vii. 13, "I saw one like the Son of man come with the clouds of heaven;" from whence Christ borrows the title he often calls himself by, the Son of man. The prophets were types of him, as they had near access to God, and great authority among men; and, therefore, as David the king is called the Lord's anointed, or Christ, so Ezekiel the prophet, is called, Son of man.

First. Ezekiel is here set up, and made to stand, that he might receive his commission, ver. 1, 2. He is set up

1. By a Divine command; "Son of man, stand upon thy feet." His lying prostrate was a posture of greater reverence, but his standing up would be a posture of greater readiness, and fitness for business. Our adorings of God must not hinder, but rather quicken and excite, our actings for God. He fell on his face in a holy fear and awe of God, but he was quickly raised up again; for they that humble themselves shall be exalted. God delights not in the dejections of his servants, but the same that brings them low will raise them up, the same that is a spirit of bondage will be a spirit of adoption. "Stand, and I will speak to thee." Note, We may then expect that God will speak to us, when we stand ready to do what he commands us.

2. By a Divine power going along with that command, ver. 2. God bade him stand up; but, because he had not strength of his own to recover his feet, nor courage to face the vision, the Spirit entered into him, and set him upon his feet. Note, God is graciously pleased to work that in us which he requires of us, and raiseth those whom he bids rise. We must stir up ourselves, and then God will put strength into us; must work out our salvation, and then God will work in us. He observed that the Spirit entered into him then when Christ spake to him; for Christ conveys his Spirit by his word, as the ordinary means, and makes the word effectual by the Spirit. The Spirit set the prophet upon his feet, to raise him up from his dejections, for he is the Comforter. Thus in the like case Daniel was strengthened by a Divine touch, Dan. x. 18; and John was raised by the right hand of Christ laid upon him, Rev. i. 17. The Spirit set him upon his feet, made him willing and forward to do as he was bidden, and then he heard him that spake to him. He heard the voice before, ch. i. 28; but now he heard it more distinctly and clearly, heard it, and submitted to it. The Spirit sets us upon our feet, by inclining our will to our duty, and thereby disposeth the understanding to receive the knowledge of it.

Secondly. Ezekiel is here sent, and made to go with a message to the children of Israel; ver. 3, "I send thee to the children of Israel." God had for many ages been sending to them his servants the prophets, rising up betimes and sending them, but to little purpose. They were now sent into captivity for abusing God's messengers; and yet even there God sends this prophet among them, to try if their ears were open to discipline, now they were held in the cords of affliction. As the supports of life, so the means of grace, are continued to us after they have been a thousand times forfeited. Now observe,

1. The rebellion of the people to whom this ambassador is sent; and he is sent to reduce them to their allegiance, to bring back the children of Israel to the Lord their God. Let the prophet know that there is occasion for his going on this errand, for they are a rebellious nation, ver. 3; a rebellious house, ver. 5. They are called children of Israel; they retain the name of their pious ancestors, but they are wretchedly degenerated, they are become Goim,—'nations,' the word commonly used for the Gentiles; the children of Israel are become as the children of the Ethiopian, (Am. ix. 7,) for they are rebellious; and rebels at home are much more provoking to a prince than enemies abroad. Their idolatries and false worships were the sins which more than any other denominated them a rebellious nation; for thereby they set up another prince in opposition to their rightful sovereign, and did homage, and pay tribute to the usurper, which is the highest degree of rebellion that can be.

1st. They had been all along a rebellious generation, and had persisted in their rebellion; "they and their fathers have transgressed against me." Note, Those are not always in the right that have antiquity and the fathers on their side, for there are errors and corruptions of long standing; and it is so far from being an excuse for walking in an ill way, that our fathers walked in it, that it is really an aggravation, for it is justifying the sin of those that have gone before us. They have continued in their rebellion "even unto this very day," notwithstanding the various means and methods that have been made use of to reclaim them; to this day, when they are under Divine rebukes for their rebellion, yet they continue rebellious, many among them, like Ahaz, even in their distress, trespass yet more. They are not the better for all the changes that have been concerning them, but still remain unchanged.

2nd. They were now hardened in their rebellion. They are impudent children, brazen-faced, and cannot blush; they are stiff-hearted, self-willed, and cannot bend, cannot stoop; neither ashamed nor afraid to sin; that will not be wrought upon by the sense either of honour or duty. We are willing to hope this was not the character of all, but of many, and those perhaps the leading men. Observe, First. God knew this concerning them, how inflexible, how incorrigible they were. Note, God is perfectly acquainted with every man's true character, whatever his pretensions and professions may be. Secondly. He told the prophet this that he might know the better how to deal with them, and what handle to take them by. He must rebuke such men as those sharply cuttingly; must deal plainly with them, though they call it dealing roughly. God tells him this, that it might be no surprise or stumblingblock to him, if he found that his preaching should not make that impression upon them which he had reason to think it would.

2. The dominion of the prince by whom this ambassador is sent. 1st. He has authority to command him whom he sends; "I do send thee unto them," and therefore thou shalt say so and so to them, ver. 4. Note, It is the prerogative of Christ to send prophets and ministers, and to enjoin them their work. St. Paul thanked Christ Jesus, who put him into the ministry, 1 Tim. i. 12; for as he was sent of the Father, ministers are sent by him; and as he received the Spirit without measure, he gives the Spirit by measure, saying, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." They are impudent and rebellious, and yet "I send thee unto them." Note, Christ gives the means of grace to many that he knows will not make a good use of those means; puts many a prize into the hands of fools, that not only have no heart to it, but have their hearts turned against it. Thus he will magnify his own grace, justify his own judgment, leave them inexcusable, and make their condemnation more intolerable. 2nd. He has authority by him to command those to whom he sends him; "Thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God." All he said to them must be spoken in God's name, enforced by his authority, and delivered as from him. Christ delivered his doctrines as a Son, "Verily, verily, I say unto you;" the prophets as servants, "Thus saith the Lord God," our Master and yours. Note, The writings of the prophets are the word of God, and are so to be regarded by every one of us. 3rd. He has authority to call those to an account to whom he sends his ambassadors. "Whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear;" whether they will attend to the word, or turn their back upon it, "they shall know that there has been a prophet among them," shall know by experience. First. If they hear and obey, they will know by comfortable experience that the word which did them good was brought them by one that had a commission from God, and a Divine power going along with him in the execution of it. Thus they who were converted by St. Paul's preaching are said to be the seals of his apostleship, 1 Cor. ix. 2. When men's hearts are made to burn under the word, and their wills to bow to it, then they know and bear the witness in themselves, that it is not the word of man, but of God. Secondly. If they forbear, if they turn a deaf ear to the word, as it is to be feared they will, "for they are a rebellious house," yet they shall be made to know, that he whom they slighted was indeed a prophet, by the reproaches of their own consciences, and the just judgments of God upon them for refusing him. They shall know it to their cost, know it to their confusion, know it by sad experience, what a pernicious, dangerous like a sheet of crystal, brilliant, but awful to look upon. If what is called "the voice of speech" be really such, and it is doubtful, it must mean the indistinguishable clamour of many voices (see Rev. iv. 5).

i. 26—28. The first new object here introduced is the throne of majesty, like resplendent sapphires, surmounting all that has been previously introduced. This throne was occupied by a being of divine dignity, amid splendours too excellent for adequate description. Fire and the rainbow are only hinted at as suggesting feeble images or symbols. With this let the reader compare Ex. xxiv. 10, Rev. i. 13—16; iv. 3. It may be noticed here that there are many things in the Revelation of St. John bearing a resemblance to things in this book of Ezekiel. The prophet calls the last and highest manifestation mentioned by him "the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the Lord," by which we cannot suppose that he saw the Lord himself, but the refulgence of his glory, as Moses and Isaiah did before him.

thing it is to despise God's messengers. They shall know by the accomplishment of the threatenings, that the prophet who denounced them was sent of God; thus the word will take hold of men, Zec. i. 6. Note, 1*st.* Those to whom the word of God is sent are upon their trial, whether they will hear or whether they will forbear, and accordingly will their doom be. 2*nd.* Whether we be edified by the word or no, it is certain God will be glorified, and his word magnified, and made honourable. Whether it be a savour of life unto life, or of death unto death, either way it will appear to be of Divine original.

6 And thou, son of man, be not afraid of them, neither be afraid of their words, though briers and thorns be with thee, and thou dost dwell among scorpions: be not afraid of their words, nor be dismayed at their looks, though they be a rebellious house. 7 And thou shalt speak my words unto them, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear: for they are most rebellious. 8 But thou, son of man, hear what I say unto thee; Be not thou rebellious like that rebellious house: open thy mouth, and eat that I give thee. 9 And when I looked, behold, an hand was sent unto me; and, lo, a roll of a book was therein; 10 And he spread it before me; and it was written within and without: and there was written therein lamentations, and mourning, and woe.

The prophet, having received his commission, here receives a charge with it. It is a post of honour to which he is advanced, but withal it is a post of service and work; and it is here required of him,

First. That he be bold. He must act in the discharge of this trust with an undaunted courage and resolution, and not be either driven off from his work or made to drive on heavily by the difficulties and oppositions that he would be likely to meet with in it: "Son of man, be not afraid of them," ver. 6. Note, Those that will do any thing to purpose in the service of God must not be afraid of the face of man; for the fear of men will bring a snare, which will be very entangling to us in the work of God. 1. God tells the prophet what was the character of those to whom he sent him, as before, ver. 3, 4. They are briars and thorns, scratching and tearing, and vexing a man which way soever he turns. They are continually teasing God's prophets, and entangling them in their talk, Mat. xxii. 15. They are pricking briers, and grieving thorns. The best of them is as a brier, and "the most upright sharper than a thorn hedge," Mic. vii. 4. Thorns and briers are the fruit of sin and the curse, and of equal date with the enmity between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. Note, Wicked men, especially the persecutors of God's prophets and people, are as briers and thorns, which are hurtful to the ground, choke the good seed, hinder God's husbandry, are vexatious to his husbandmen; but they are nigh unto cursing, and their end is to be burned; yet God makes use of them sometimes for the correction and instruction of his people, as Gideon taught the men of Succoth with thorns and briers, Jud. viii. 16. Yet this is not the worst of their character,—they are scorpions, venomous and malignant; the sting of a scorpion is a thousand times more hurtful than the scratch of a brier. Persecutors are a generation of vipers; are of the serpent's seed, and the poison of asps is under their tongue; and they are more subtle than any beast of the field. And, which makes the prophet's case the more grievous, he dwells among these scorpions, they are continually about him, so that he cannot be safe or quiet in his own house. These ill men are his ill neighbours, who thereby have many opportunities, and will let slip none to do him a mischief. God takes notice of this to the prophet, as Christ to the angel of one of the churches, Rev. ii. 13, "I know thy works, and where thou dwellest, even where Satan's seat is." Ezekiel had been, in vision, conversing with angels, but when he comes down from this mount he finds he dwells with scorpions. 2. He tells him what would be their carriage towards him, that they would do what they could to frighten him with their looks and their words; they would hector him and threaten him, would look scornfully and spitefully at him, and do their utmost to face him down, and put him out of countenance, that they might drive him off from being a prophet, or at least from telling them of their faults, and threatening them with the judgments of God; or, if they could not prevail in this, that they might vex and perplex him, and disturb the repose of his mind. They were now themselves in subjection, divested of all power, so that they had no other way of persecuting the prophet but with their looks and their words, and so they did persecute him. "Behold, thou hast spoken, and done evil things as thou couldst," Jer. iii. 5. If they had had more power they would have done more mischief. They were now in captivity, smarting for their rebellion, and particularly their misusing God's prophets, and yet they are as bad as ever. "Though thou bray a fool in a mortar, yet will not his foolishness depart from him." No providences will of themselves humble and reform men, unless the grace of God work with them. But, how malicious soever they were, Ezekiel must not be afraid of them, nor dismayed; he must not be deterred from his work, or any part of it, nor be disheartened or dispirited in it by all their menaces, but go on in it with resolution and cheerfulness, assuring himself of safety under the Divine protection.

Secondly. It is required that he be faithful, ver. 7. 1. He must be faithful to Christ who sent him; "Thou shalt speak my words unto them." Note, As it is the honour of prophets that they are intrusted to speak God's words, so it is their duty to cleave close to them, and to speak nothing but what is agreeable to the words of God; ministers must always speak according to that rule. 2. He must be faithful to the souls of those to whom he was sent; "Whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear," he must deliver his message to them as he received it. He must bring them to comply with the word, and not study to accommodate the word to their humours. It is true, "they are most rebellious," they are rebellion itself; but however, speak my words to them, whether they are pleasing or unpleasing. Note, The untractableness and unprofitableness of people under the word is no good reason why ministers should leave off preaching to them; nor must we decline an opportunity by which good may be done, though we have a great deal of reason to think no good will be done.

Thirdly. It is required that he be observant of his instructions.

1. Here is a general intimation what the instructions were that were given him in the contents of the book which was spread before him, ver. 10. 1st. His instructions were large, for the roll was written within and without, on the inside and on the backside of the roll; it was as a sheet of paper written on all the four sides. One side contained their sins, the other side contained the judgments of God coming upon them for those sins. Note, God hath a great deal to say to his people when they are degenerated and become rebellious. 2nd. His instructions were melancholy, he was sent on a sad errand; the matter contained in the book was "lamentations, and mourning, and woe." The idea of his message is taken from the impression it would make upon the minds of those that carefully attended to it; it would set them a weeping, and crying out, Woe and alas! Both the discoveries of sin, and the denunciations of wrath, would be matter of lamentations. What could be more lamentable, more mournful, more woful, than to see a holy, happy people, sunk into such a state of sin and misery, as it appears by the prophecy of this book the Jews were at this time? Ezekiel echoes to Jeremiah's lamentations. Note, Though God is rich in mercy, yet impenitent sinners will find there are, even among his words, lamentations and woe.

2. Here is an express charge given the prophet to observe his instructions, both in receiving his message and delivering it. He is now to receive it, and is here commanded,

1st. To attend diligently to it; "Son of man, hear what I say unto thee," ver. 8. Note, Those that speak from God to others must be sure to hear from God themselves, and be obedient to his voice. "Be not thou rebellious," that is, Do not refuse to go on this errand, or to deliver it; do not fly off, as Jonah did, for fear of disobliging thy countrymen. They are a rebellious house among whom thou livest; but be not thou like them, do not comply with them in any thing that is evil. If ministers, that are reprovers by office, connive at sin, and indulge sinners, either shew them not their wickedness, or shew them not the fatal consequences of it, for fear of displeasing them, and getting their ill-will, they hereby make themselves partakers of their guilt, and are rebellious like them. If people will not do their duty in reforming, yet let ministers do theirs in reproving; and they will have the comfort of it in the reflection, whatever the success be, as that prophet had, Isa. l. 5, "The Lord God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious." Even the best men, when their lot is cast in bad times and places, have need to be cautioned against the worst crimes.

2nd. To digest it in his own mind by an experience of the savour and power of it. Do not only hear what I say unto thee, but "open thy mouth, and eat that I give thee." Prepare to eat it, and eat it willingly, and with an appetite. All God's children are content to be at their heavenly Father's finding, and to eat whatever he gives them. That which God's hand reached out to Ezekiel was a roll of a book, or, the volume of a book; a book, or scroll of paper or parchment full written, and rolled up. Divine revelation comes to us from the hand of Christ; he gave it to the prophets, Rev. i. 1. When we look at the roll of the book we must have an eye to the hand by which it is sent to us. He that brought it to the prophet spread it before him, that he might not swallow it with an implicit faith, but might fully understand the contents of it, and then receive it and make it his own. "Be not rebellious," saith Christ, "but eat what I give thee." If we receive not what Christ in his ordinances and providences allots for us, if we submit not to his word and rod, and reconcile not ourselves to both, we shall be accounted rebellious.

CHAPTER III.

In this chapter we have the farther preparation of the prophet for the work to which God called him. I. His eating of the roll that was presented to him in the close of the foregoing chapter, ver. 1—3. II. Farther instructions and encouragements given him to the same purpose with those in the foregoing chapter, ver. 4—11. III. The mighty impulse he was under, with which he was carried to those that were to be his hearers, ver. 12—15. IV. A farther explication of his office and business as a prophet, under the similitude of a watchman, ver. 16—21. V. The restraining and restoring of the prophet's liberty of speech, as God pleased, ver. 22—27.

MOREOVER he said unto me, Son of man, eat that thou findest; eat this roll, and go speak unto the house of Israel. 2 So I opened my mouth, and he caused me to eat that roll. 3 And he said unto me, Son of man, cause thy belly to eat, and fill thy bowels with this roll that I give thee. Then did I eat it; and it was in my mouth as honey for sweetness. 4 And he said unto me, Son of man, go, get thee unto the house of Israel, and speak with my words unto them. 5 For thou art not sent to a people of a strange speech and of an hard language, but to the house of Israel; 6 Not to many people of a strange speech and of an hard language, whose words thou canst not understand. Surely, had I sent thee to them, they would have hearkened unto thee. 7 But the house of Israel will not hearken unto thee; for they will not hearken unto me: for all the house of Israel are impudent and hardhearted. 8 Behold, I have made thy face strong against their faces, and thy forehead strong against their foreheads. 9 As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead: fear them not,

With regard to the meaning of the various images introduced into the vision, many opinions have been advocated. Most have admitted that the figures are emblems of something, but of what is greatly disputed. For the present we must not enter upon the discussion.

ii. 4. "Impudent children and stiff-hearted" is not a very close rendering, but the original means that they were brasen-faced and obstinate.

ii. 6. The phrase "son of man," so often found in this book, merely signifies man, in which sense it constantly occurs in Chaldee and Syriac. Ezekiel wrote in a country where the Chaldean language was common, and this accounts for certain peculiarities in his style. The words "briers and thorns" are sufficiently exact, though it is uncertain what thorny plants are meant. For "briers" the margin has "rebels," which cannot be sustained. The diversity of thorny plants in the Holy Land is very considerable, and Dr. Tristram says there are at least eighteen names for them in Scripture. With regard neither be dismayed at their looks, though they be a rebellious house. 10 Moreover he said unto me, Son of man, all my words that I shall speak unto thee receive in thine heart, and hear with thine ears. 11 And go, get thee to them of the captivity, unto the children of thy people, and speak unto them, and tell them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear. 12 Then the spirit took me up, and I heard behind me a voice of a great rushing, saying, Blessed be the glory of the LORD from his place. 13 I heard also the noise of the wings of the living creatures that touched one another, and the noise of the wheels over against them, and a noise of a great rushing. 14 So the spirit lifted me up, and took me away, and I went in bitterness, in the heat of my spirit; but the hand of the LORD was strong upon me. 15 Then I came to the them of the captivity at Tel-abib, that dwelt by the river of Chebar, and I sat where they sat, and remained there astonished among them seven days.

CHEBAR.

These verses are fitly joined by some translators to the foregoing chapter, as being of a piece with it, and a continuation of the same vision. The prophets received the word from God that they might deliver it to the people of God; furnished themselves, that they might furnish them with the knowledge of the mind and will of God. Now here the prophet is taught,

First. How he must receive Divine revelation himself, ver. 1. Christ (whom he saw upon the throne, ch. i. 26,) said to him, "Son of man, eat this roll." Admit this revelation into thine understanding, take it, take the meaning of it, understand it aright; admit it into thy heart, apply it, and be affected with it; imprint it in thy mind, ruminate and chew the cud upon it; take it as it is, entire, and make no difficulty of it; nay, take a pleasure in it, as thou dost in thy meat, and let thy soul be nourished and strengthened by it; let it be meat and drink to thee, and as thy necessary food; be full of it, as thou art of the meat thou hast eaten. Thus ministers should in their studies and meditations take in that word of God which they are to preach to others. "Thy words were found, and I did eat them," Jer. xv. 16. They must be both well acquainted and much affected with the things of God, that they may speak of them both clearly and warmly, with a great deal of Divine light and heat. Now observe,

1. How this command is inculcated upon the prophet. In the chapter before, "Eat what I give thee;" and here, ver. 1, "Eat that thou findest," that is, that which is presented to thee by the hand of Christ. Note, Whatever we find to be the word of God, whatever is brought to us by him who is the Word of God, we must receive it without disputing. What we find set before us in the Scripture, that we must eat. And again, ver. 3, "Cause thy belly to eat, and fill thy bowels with this roll." Do not eat it and bring it up again, as that which is nauseous, but eat it and retain it, as that which is nourishing, and grateful to the stomach. Feast upon this vision till thou be full of matter, as Elihu was, Job xxxii. 17. Let the word have a place in thee, the innermost place. We must take pains with our own hearts, that we may cause them duly to receive and entertain the word of God, that every faculty may do its office in order to the due digesting of the word of God, that it may be turned in succum et sanguinem,—'into blood and spirits.' We must empty ourselves of worldly things, that we may fill our bowels with this roll.

2. How this command is explained; ver. 10, "All my words that I shall speak unto thee," to be spoken unto the people, "thou must receive in thine heart," as well as hear with thine ears; receive them in the love of them. "Let these sayings sink down into your ears." Lu. ix. 44. Christ demands the prophet's attention, not only to what he now saith, but to all that he shall at any time hereafter speak; receive it all in thine heart, meditate on these things and give thyself wholly to them, 1 Tim. iv. 15.

3. How this command was obeyed, in vision. He opened his mouth and Christ caused him to eat the roll, ver. 2. If we be truly willing to receive the word into our hearts, Christ will by his Spirit bring it into them, and cause it to dwell in us richly. If he that opens the roll, and by his Spirit, as a Spirit of revelation, spreads it before us, did not also open our understandings, and by his Spirit, as a Spirit of wisdom, give us the knowledge of it, and cause us to eat it, we should be for ever strangers to it. The prophet had reason to fear that the roll would be an unpleasant morsel, and a sorry dish to make a meal of, but it proved it was in his mouth as honey for sweetness. Note, If we readily obey even the most difficult commands, we shall find that comfort in the reflection which will make us abundant amends for all the hardships we meet with in the way of our duty. Though the roll was filled with lamentations, mournings, and woe, yet it was to the prophet as honey for sweetness. Note, Gracious souls can receive those truths of God with great delight, which speak most terror to wicked people. We find St. John let into some part of the revelation by such a sign as this, Rev. x. 9, 10. He took the book out of the angel's hand, and ate it up, and it was as this here, in his mouth sweet as honey, but it was bitter in the belly; and we shall find that this here was so too, for, ver. 14, the prophet went in bitterness.

Secondly. How he must deliver that Divine revelation to others which he himself had received; ver. 1, "Eat this roll, and" then "go speak to the house of Israel." 1. He must not undertake to preach the things of God to others till he did himself fully understand them. Let him not go without his errand, or take it by the halves. 2. When he doth himself fully understand them, he must be both busy and bold to preach them for the good of others. We must not conceal the words of the Holy One, Job vi. 10, for that is burying a talent which was given us to trade with. He must go and speak to the house of Israel, for it is their privilege to have God's statutes and judgments made known to them; as the giving of the law, the lively oracles, so prophecy, the living oracle, pertains to them. He is not sent to the Chaldeans, to reprove them for their sins, but to the house of Israel, to reprove them for theirs; for the father corrects his own child if he do amiss, not the child of a stranger. The instructions given him in speaking to them are much the same with those in the foregoing chapter.

1. He must speak to them all that, and that only, which God spake to him. He had said before, ch. ii. 7, "Thou shalt speak my words to them;" here he saith, ver. 4, "Thou shalt speak with my words unto them;" or in my words. He must not only say that which for substance is the same that God had said to him, but as near as may be in the same language and expressions. Blessed Paul, though a man of very happy invention, yet speaks of the things of God in the words which the Holy Ghost teacheth, 1 Cor. ii. 13. Scripture truths look best in Scripture language, their native dress; and how can we better speak God's mind than with his words?

2. He must remember that they are the house of Israel whom he is sent to speak to; God's house, and his own, and therefore such as he ought to have a particular concern for, and to deal faithfully and tenderly with. They were such as he had an intimate acquaintance with, being not only their countryman, but their companion in tribulation. They and he were fellow-sufferers, and had lately been fellow-travellers in very melancholy circumstances from Judea to Babylon, and had often mingled their tears, which could not but knit their affections to each other. It was well for the people that they had a prophet who knew experimentally how to symphathize with them, and could not but be touched with the feeling of their infirmities. It was well for the prophet that he had to do with those of his own nation, not with "a people of strange speech and a hard language;" 'deep of lip,' so that thou canst not fathom their meaning; and 'heavy of tongue,' whom it is intolerable and impossible to converse with. Every strange language seems to us to be deep and heavy. Thou art not sent to many such people, whom thou couldest neither speak to nor hear from, neither understand nor be understood among, but by an interpreter. The apostles indeed were sent to many people of a strange speech, but they could not have done any good among them if they had not had the gift of tongues; but Ezekiel was sent only to one people, those but a few, and his own, who having acquaintance with he might hope to find acceptance with.

3. He must remember what God had already told him of the ill character of those to whom he was sent, that if he met with discouragement and disappointment in them, he might not be offended. They are impudent and hard-hearted, ver. 7. No convictions of sin would make them blush, no denunciations of wrath would make them tremble. Two things aggravated their obstinacy: 1st. That they were more obstinate than their neighbours would have been, if the prophet had been sent to them. Had God sent him to any other people, though of a strange speech, surely they would hearkened to him; they would at least have given him a patient hearing, and shewed him that respect which he could not obtain of his own countrymen. The Ninevites were wrought upon by Jonah's preaching, when the house of Israel, that was compassed about with so great a cloud of prophets, was unhumbled and unreformed; but what shall we say to these things? The means of grace are given to those that will not improve them, and withheld from those that would have improved them. We must resolve this into the Divine sovereignty, and say, Lord, "thy judgments are a great deep." 2nd. That they were obstinate against God himself; "They will not hearken unto thee," and no marvel, "for they will not hearken unto me;" they will not regard the word of the prophet, for they will not regard the rod of God, by which the Lord's voice cries in the city. If they believe not God speaking to them by a minister, neither would they believe though he should speak to them by a voice from heaven. Nay, therefore they reject what the prophet saith, because it comes from God, whom the carnal mind is enmity to. They are prejudiced against the law of God, and for that reason turn a deaf ear to his prophets, whose business it is to enforce his law.

4. He must resolve to put on courage, and Christ promiseth to steel him with it, ver. 8, 9. He is sent to such as are impudent and hard-hearted, that will receive no impressions, nor be wrought upon either by fair means or foul, that will take a pride in affronting God's messenger, and confronting the message; it will be a hard task to know how to deal with them. But, 1st. God will enable him to put a good face on it; "I have made thy face strong against their faces," that is, endued thee with all the firmness and boldness that the case calls for. Perhaps Ezekiel was naturally bashful and timorous; but if God did not find him fit, yet by his grace he made him fit, to encounter the greatest difficulties. Note, The more impudent wicked people are in their opposition to religion, the more openly and resolutely should God's people appear in the practice and defence of it; let the innocent stir up himself against the hypocrite, Job xvii. 8. When vice is daring, let not virtue be sneaking; and when God has work to do, he will spirit men for it, and give them strength according to the day. If there be occasion, God can and will by his grace make the foreheads of faithful ministers as an adamant, so that the most threatening powers shall not dash them out of countenance; "The Lord God will help me, therefore have I set my face like a flint," Isa. l. 7. 2nd. He is therefore commanded to have a good heart on it; and to go on in his work with a holy security, not valuing either the censures or the threats of his enemies. "Fear not, neither be dismayed at their looks;" let not the menaces of their impotent malice cast either a damp upon thee or a stumblingblock before thee.

to scorpions, the same writer tells us that five distinct species have been found in the Wilderness of Sinai alone. He adds that eight species have been described from Palestine, and he says, "We found several additional kinds, varying in colour and in size."

ii. 8—10. As is well known, ancient books were often written upon pieces of skin or other material, and rolled up. This form of book is implied in a number of texts, and such was the idea conveyed by our word volume. There were perhaps other books of a different shape. Rolls were not commonly written on both sides of the skin, and hence the exception is here particularly referred to.

iii. 1—3. We have here another of those symbolical actions of which frequent mention is made in the records of prophetic visions. As Dr. Adam Clarke says, "This must have passed in vision; but the meaning is plain: 'Receive my word; let it enter into thy soul; digest it; let it be thy nourishment; and let it be thy meat and drink to do the will of thy Father who is in heaven.'" A passage involving Bold sinners must have bold reprovers: evil beasts must be rebuked cuttingly, Tit. i. 12, 13; must be saved with fear, Jude 23. Those that keep close to the service of God may be sure of the favour of God, and then they need not be dismayed at the proud looks of men. Let not the angry countenance, that drives away a backbiting tongue, give any check to a reproving tongue.

5. He must continue instant with them in his preaching, whatever the success was, ver. 11. He must go to them of the captivity, who being in affliction it was to be hoped would receive instruction; must look upon them as the children of his people, to whom he was nearly allied, and for whom he therefore ought to have a very tender concern, as Paul for his kinsmen, Rom. ix. 3; and he must tell them, not only what the Lord said, but that the Lord said it. Let him speak in God's name, and back what he said with his authority, "Thus saith the Lord God;" tell them so, "whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear." Not that it may be indifferent to us what success our ministry has; but whatever it be, we must go on with our work, and leave the issue to God. We must not say, here are some so good that we do not need to speak to them; or, here are others so bad that it is to no purpose to speak to them; but, however it be, deliver thy message faithfully; tell them the Lord God saith so and so, let them reject it at their peril.

Full instructions being thus given to the prophet, pursuant to his commission, we are here told,

1st. With what satisfaction this mission of his was applauded by the holy angels, who were very well pleased to see one of a nature inferior to their own thus honourably employed and intrusted. He heard "a voice of a great rushing," ver. 12; as if the angels thronged and crowded to see the inauguration of a prophet; for to them is known by the church, that is, by reflection from the church, the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 10. They seemed to strive who should get nearest to this great sight. He heard "the noise of their wings that touched;" or, as the word is, 'kissed one another;' noting the mutual affections and assistances of the angels. He heard also the noise of the wheels of providence, moving over against the angels, and in concert with them. All this was to engage his attention, and to convince him that the God that sent him, having such a glorious train of attendants, no doubt had power sufficient to bear him out in his work. But all this noise ended in the voice of praise; he heard them saying, "Blessed be the glory of the Lord from his place," that is, First. From heaven, his place above, whence his glory was now in vision descending, or whither perhaps it was now returning. Let the innumerable company of angels above join with those employed in this vision, in saying, "Blessed be the glory of the Lord. Praise ye the Lord from the heavens. Praise him all his angels," Ps. cxlviii. 1, 2. Secondly. From the temple, his place on earth, whence his glory was now departing. They lament the departure of the glory, but adore the righteousness of God in it; however it be, yet God is blessed and glorious, and ever will be so. The prophet Isaiah heard God thus praised, when he received his commission, Isa. vi. 4; and a comfort it is to all the faithful servants of God, when they see how much God is dishonoured in this lower world, to think how much he is admired and glorified in the upper world. The glory of the Lord hath many slights from our place, but many praises from his place.

2nd. With what reluctancy of his own spirit, and yet with what a mighty efficacy of the Spirit of God, the prophet was himself brought to the execution of his office. The grace given to him was not in vain; for,

First. The Spirit led him with a strong hand. God bade him go, but he stirred not till the Spirit took him up. "The Spirit of the living creatures," that was in the wheels, now was in the prophet too, and took him up, first, to hear more distinctly the acclamations of the angels, ver. 12; but afterwards, ver. 14, lifted him up, and took him away to his work, which he was backward to, being very loath either to bring trouble upon himself or foretell it to his people. He would gladly have been excused, but must own, as another prophet doth, Jer. xx. 7, "Thou wast stronger than I, and hast prevailed." Ezekiel would willingly have kept all he heard and saw to himself, that it might go no farther; but the hand of the Lord was strong upon him, and overpowered him; he was carried on contrary to his own inclinations by the prophetical impulse, so that he could not but speak the things which he had heard and seen, as the apostles, Acts iv. 20. Note, Those whom God calls to the ministry, as he furnisheth their heads for it, so he bows their hearts to it.

Secondly. He followed with a sad heart. "The Spirit took me away," saith he, "and then I went," but it was "in bitterness, in the heat of my spirit." He had perhaps seen what a hard task Jeremiah had at Jerusalem, when he appeared as a prophet, what pains he took, what opposition he met with, how he was abused by hand and tongue, and what ill treatment he met with, and all to no purpose; and must I be set up for a mark like him? thinks Ezekiel. The life of a captive was bad enough, but what would the life of a prophet in captivity be? therefore he went in this fret, and under this discomposure. Note, There may in some cases be a great reluctancy of corruption, even there where there is a manifest predominancy of grace. "I went," not disobedient to the heavenly vision, or outrunning the work, as Jonah; but I went "in bitterness," not at all pleased with it. When he received the Divine revelation himself, it was to him sweet as honey, ver. 3, he could with abundance of pleasure have spent all his days in meditating upon it; but when he is to preach it to others, who he foresees will be hardened and exasperated by it, and have their condemnation aggravated, then he goes in bitterness. Note, It is a great grief to faithful ministers, and makes them go on in their work with a heavy heart, when they find people untractable, and hating to be reformed. He went in the heat of his spirit, because of the discouragements he foresaw he should meet with; but the hand of the Lord was strong upon him, not only to compel him to his work, but to fit him for it, and carry him through it, and animate him against the difficulties he would meet with, (so we may understand it,) and when he found it so he was better reconciled to his business, and applied himself to do it. Then he "came to them of the captivity," ver. 15, to some place where there were many of them together, "and sat where they sat," either working, or reading, or talking; and continued "among them seven days," to hear what they said, and observe what they did, and all that time he was waiting for the word of the Lord to come to him. Note, Those that would speak suitably and profitably to people about their souls must acquaint themselves with them and with their case; must do as Ezekiel did here, must sit where they sit, and speak familiarly to them of the things of God, and put themselves into their condition; yea, though they sit by the rivers of Babylon: but observe, he was there astonished, overwhelmed with grief for the sins and miseries of his people, and overpowered by the pomp of the vision he had seen. He was there desolate, so some read it. God shewed him no visions, men made him no visits; thus was he left to digest his grief, and come to a better temper, before the word of the Lord should come to him. Note, Those whom God designs to exalt and enlarge he first humbles and straitens for a time.

16 And it came to pass at the end of seven days, that the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 17 Son of man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore hear the word at my mouth, and give them warning from me. 18 When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand. 19 Yet if thou warn the wicked, and he turn not from his wickedness, nor from his wicked way, he shall die in his iniquity; but thou hast delivered thy soul. 20 Again, When a righteous man doth turn from his righteousness, and commit iniquity, and I lay a stumblingblock before him, he shall die: because thou hast not given him warning, he shall die in his sin, and his righteousness which he hath done shall not be remembered; but his blood will I require at thine hand. 21 Nevertheless if thou warn the righteous man, that the righteous sin not, and he doth not sin, he shall surely live, because he is warned; also thou hast delivered thy soul.

These farther instructions God gave to the prophet "at the end of seven days," that is, on the seventh day after the vision he had; and it is very probable that both that and this were on the sabbath day, which the house of Israel, even in their captivity, observed as well as they could in those circumstances. We do not find that their conquerors and oppressors tied them to any constant service, as their Egyptian taskmasters had formerly done, but that they might observe the sabbath rest, for a sign to distinguish between them and their neighbours; but for the sabbath work they had not the convenience of temple or synagogue, only it should seem they had a place by the river side where prayer was wont to be made, as Acts xvi. 13. There they met on the sabbath days, there their enemies upbraided them with the songs of Zion, Ps. cxxxvii. 1—3, there Ezekiel met them, and the word of the Lord then and there came to him. He that had been musing and meditating on the things of God all the week was fit to speak to the people in God's name on the sabbath day, and disposed to hear God speak to him. This sabbath day Ezekiel was not so honoured with visions of the glory of God as he had been the sabbath before; but is plainly, and by a very vulgar similitude, told his duty, which he is to communicate to the people. Note, Raptures and transports of joy are not the daily bread of God's children, however they may upon special occasions be feasted with them. We must not deny but that we have truly communion with God, (1 Jno. i. 3,) though we have it not always so sensibly as at some times; and, though the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven may sometimes be looked into, yet ordinarily it is plain preaching that is most for edification. God here tells the prophet what his office was, and what the duty of that office; and this (we may suppose) he was to tell the people, that they might attend to what he said, and improve it accordingly. Note, It is good for people to know and consider what a charge their ministers have of them, and what an account they must shortly give of that charge. Observe,

First. What the office is to which the prophet is called; "Son of man, I have made thee a watchman to the house of Israel," ver. 17. The vision he saw astonished him; he knew not what to make of that, and therefore God used this plain comparison, which served better to lead him into the understanding of his work, and so to reconcile him to it. He sat among the captives, and said little; but God comes to him, and tells him that will not do. He is a watchman, and hath something to say to them; he is appointed to be as a watchman in the city, to guard against fire, robbers, and disturbers of the peace; as a watchman over the flock, to guard against thieves, and beasts of prey; but especially as a watchman in the camp, in an invaded country, or a besieged town, that is to watch the motions of the enemy, and to sound an alarm upon the approach, nay, upon the first appearance of danger. This supposeth the house of Israel to be in a military state, and exposed to enemies, who are subtle and restless in their attempts upon it; yea, and each of the particular members of that house to be in danger, and concerned to stand upon their guard. Note, Ministers are watchmen on the church's walls, Isa. lxii. 6; watchmen that go about the city, Cant. iii. 3. It is a toilsome office. Watchmen must keep awake be they never so sleepy, and keep abroad be it never so cold; they must stand all weathers upon the watch-tower, Isa. xxi. 8; Gen. xxxi. 40. It is a dangerous office. Sometimes they cannot keep their post, but in peril of death from the enemy, who gain their point if they kill the sentinel, and yet they dare not quit their post upon pain of death from their general; such a dilemma are the church's watchmen in. Men will curse them if they be faithful, and God will curse them if they be false; but it is a needful office, the house of Israel cannot be safe without watchmen, and yet except the Lord keep it the watchman waketh but in vain, Ps. cxxvii. 1, 2.

Secondly. What is the duty of this office. The work of a watchman is to take notice, and to give notice.

1. The prophet, as a watchman, must take notice of what God said concerning this people; not only concerning the body of the people, which the prophecies of Jeremiah, and other prophets had most commonly reference to, but concerning particular persons according as their character was. He must not, as other watchmen, look round to spy danger, and gain intelligence; but he must look up to God, and farther he need not look; "hear the word at my mouth," ver. 17. Note, Those that are to preach must first hear; for how can they teach others who have not first learned themselves?

2. He must give notice of what he heard. As a watchman must have eyes in his head, so he must have a tongue in his head; if he be dumb, it is as bad as if he were blind, Isa. lvi. 10. Thou shalt "give them warning from me," sound an alarm in the holy mountain; not in his own name, or as from himself, but in God's name, and from him. Ministers are God's mouth to the children of men. The Scriptures are written for our admonition; "By similar principles and figures occurs in the Revelation of St. John (x. 9, 10), though there the book is received from the hands of an angel.

iii. 4, 5. The reference to people of languages far different from the Hebrew is altogether appropriate here, because in their captivity the Israelites were brought into contact with forms of speech which were both numerous and belonging to different families of languages.

iii. 9. The stone called shamir, here translated "adamant," was certainly very hard, and many are of the opinion of Gesenius, that it was the diamond. This is not at all unlikely, especially if, as is thought by some, the name is of Indian origin. The later rabbis concocted wonderful fancies out of the word, as when they spoke of it as a small worm of enormous power, able to cut and polish the hardest stones, and employed for that purpose by Solomon. The word for "flint" in this passage is the generic term for rock, and not flint in particular.

iii. 12—14. There is nothing in these words requiring us to under them is thy servant warned," Ps. xix. 11; but, because that which is delivered viva voce commonly makes the deepest impression, God is pleased by men like ourselves, who are equally concerned, to enforce upon us the warnings of the written word. Now the prophet in his preaching must distinguish between the wicked and the righteous, the precious and the vile; and in his applications must suit his alarms to each, giving every one his portion, which if he did, he should have the comfort of it, whatever the success was; but if not, he was accountable.

1st. Some of those he had to do with were wicked, and he must warn them not to go on in their wickedness, but to turn from it, ver. 18, 19. We may observe here, First. That the God of heaven hath said, and doth say, to every wicked man, that if he go on still in his trespasses, he shall surely die. His iniquity shall undoubtedly be his ruin; it tends to ruin, and will end in ruin. Dying thou shalt die, thou shalt die so great a death; shalt die eternally, be ever dying, but never dead. "The wicked man shall die in his iniquity," shall die under the guilt of it, die under the dominion of it. Secondly. That if a wicked man turn from his wickedness, and from his wicked way, he shall live, and the ruin he is threatened with shall be prevented; and, that he may do so, he is warned of the danger he is in, The wicked man shall die if he go on, but shall live if he repent. Observe, he is to turn from his wickedness, and from his wicked way. It is not enough for a man to turn from his wicked way by an outward reformation, which may be the effect of his sins leaving him, rather than of his leaving his sins; but he must turn from his wickedness, from the love of it, and the inclination to it, by an inward regeneration; if he do not so much as turn from his wicked way, there is little hopes that he will turn from his wickedness. Thirdly. That it is the duty of ministers both to warn sinners of the danger of sin and to assure them of the benefit of repentance; to set before them how miserable they are if they go on in sin, and how happy they may be if they will but repent and reform. Note, The ministry of the word is concerning matters of life and death, for those are the things it sets before us; the blessing and the curse, that we may escape the curse, and inherit the blessing. Fourthly. That though ministers do not warn wicked people as they ought, of their misery and danger, yet that shall not be admitted as an excuse for those that go on still in their trespasses; for, though the watchman did not give them warning, yet they shall die in their iniquity; for they had sufficient warning given them by the providence of God and their own consciences, which if they would have taken they might have saved their lives. Fifthly. That if ministers be not faithful to their trust, if they do not warn sinners, of the fatal consequences of sin, but suffer them to go on unreproved, the blood of those that perish through their carelessness, will be required at their hand; that is, it shall be charged upon them in the day of account, that it was owing to their unfaithfulness that such and such precious souls perished in sin; for who knows but, if they had had fair warning given them, they might have fled in time from the wrath to come? and if it contract so heinous a guilt as it doth to be accessary to the murder of a dying body, what is it to be accessary to the ruin of an immortal soul? Sixthly. That if ministers do their duty, in giving warning to sinners, though the warning be not yet taken, they may have this satisfaction, that they are clear from their blood, and have delivered their own souls, though they cannot prevail to deliver theirs; those that are faithful shall have their reward, though they be not successful.

2nd. Some of those he had to deal with were righteous; at least he had reason to think, in a judgment of charity, that they were so, and he must warn them not to apostatize and turn away from their righteousness, ver. 20, 21. We may observe here, First. That the best men in the world have need to be warned against apostacy, and to be told of the danger they are in of it, and the danger they are in by it. God's servants must be warned, (Ps. xix. 11,) that they do not neglect his work, and quit his service. One good means to keep us from falling is, to keep up a holy fear of falling; Heb. iv. 1, "Let us therefore fear;" and Rom. xi. 20, even those that stand by faith must not be highminded but fear, and must therefore be warned. Secondly. There is a righteousness which a man may turn from, a seeming righteousness, from which, if men turn, thereby it appears that it was never sincere, how passable, nay, how plausible soever it was; for "if they had been of us, they would no doubt have continued with us," 1 Jno. ii. 19. There are many that begin in the spirit, but end in the flesh; that set their faces heavenwards, but look back; that had a first love, but have lost it, and turned from the holy commandment. Thirdly. When men turn from their righteousness, they soon learn to commit iniquity. When they grow careless and remiss in the duties of God's worship, neglect them, or are negligent in them, they become an easy prey to the tempter. Omissions make way for commissions. Fourthly. When men turn from their righteousness, and commit iniquity, it is just with God to lay stumblingblocks before them, that they may grow worse and worse till they are ripened for destruction. When Pharaoh hardened his heart, God hardened it. When sinners turn their back upon God, desert his service, and so cast a reproach upon it, he doth in a way of righteous judgment not only withdraw his restraining grace, and give them up to their own hearts' lusts, but order them, by his providence, into such circumstances as occasion their sin and hasten their ruin. There are those to whom Christ himself is "a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence," 1 Pet. ii. 8. Fifthly. The righteousness which men relinquish shall never be remembered to their honour or comfort; it will stand them in no stead in this world or the other. Apostates lose all that they have wrought; their services and sufferings are all in vain, and shall never be brought to account, because not continued in. It is a rule in the law, Factum non dicitur quod non perseverat,—'We are said to do that only which we do perseveringly;' Gal. iii. 3, 4. Sixthly. If ministers do not give fair warning as they ought, of the weakness of the best, their aptness to stumble and fall, the particular temptations they are in, and the fatal consequences of apostacy, the ruin of those that do apostatise will be laid at their door, and they shall answer for it. Not but that there are those who are warned against it, and yet turn from their righteousness; but that case is not put here as was concerning the wicked man; but on the contrary, that a righteous man being warned, takes the warning, and doth not sin, ver. 21, for if you give instruction to a wise man, he will be yet wiser. We must not only not flatter the wicked, but not flatter even the righteous, as if they were perfectly safe anywhere on this side heaven. Seventhly. If ministers give warning, and people take it, it is well for both; nothing more beautiful than "a wise reprover upon an obedient ear;" the one shall live because he is warned, and the other has delivered his soul. What can a good minister desire more, than to save himself and those that hear him? 1 Tim. iv. 16.

22 And the hand of the LORD was there upon me; and he said unto me, Arise, go forth into the plain, and I will there talk with thee. 23 Then I arose, and went forth into the plain: and, behold, the glory of the LORD stood there, as the glory which I saw by the river of Chebar: and I fell on my face. 24 Then the spirit entered into me, and set me upon my feet, and spake with me, and said unto me, Go, shut thyself within thine house. 25 But thou, O son of man, behold, they shall put bands upon thee, and shall bind thee with them, and thou shalt not go out among them: 26 And I will make thy tongue cleave to the roof of thy mouth, that thou shalt be dumb, and shalt not be to them a reprover: for they are a rebellious house. 27 But when I speak with thee, I will open thy mouth, and thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD; He that heareth, let him hear; and he that forbeareth, let him forbear: for they are a rebellious house.

After all this large and magnificent discovery which God had made of himself to the prophet, and the full instructions he had given him how to deal with those to whom he sent him with an ample commission, we would have expected presently to see him preaching the word of God to a great congregation of Israel; but here we find it quite otherwise. His work here at first seems not at all proportionable to the pomp of his call.

First. We have him here retired for farther learning. By his unwillingness to go, it should seem as if he were not so thoroughly convinced as he might have been of the ability of him that sent him to bear him out; and therefore to hearten him against the difficulties he foresaw, God will favour him with another vision of his glory, which, if any thing, would put life into him, and animate him for his work. In order to this God calls him to the plain, (ver. 22,) and there he will have some talk with him. See and admire the condescension of God in conversing thus familiarly with a man, a son of man, a poor captive; nay, with a sinful man, that when God sent him went in bitterness of spirit, and was at this time out of humour with his work; and let us own ourselves for ever indebted to the mediation of Christ for this blessed intercourse and communion between God and man, between heaven and earth. See here the benefit of solitude, and how much it befriends contemplation. It is very comfortable to be alone with God, withdrawn from the world for converse with him; to hear from him, to speak to him: and a good man will say he is never less alone than when thus alone. Ezekiel went forth into the plain more willingly than he went among them of the captivity, ver. 15, for they that know what it is to have communion with God cannot but prefer that before any converse with this world, especially such as is commonly met with. He went out into the plain, and there he saw the same vision that he had seen by the river of Chebar; for God is not tied to places. Note, Those who follow God shall meet with his consolations wherever they go. God called him out to talk with him, but did more than that, he shewed him his glory, ver. 23. We are not to expect such visions, but we must own we have a favour done us no way inferior, if we so by faith behold the glory of the Lord as to be changed into the same image by the Spirit of the Lord; and this honour have all his saints. Praise ye the Lord, 2 Cor. iii. 18.

Secondly. We have him here restrained from farther teaching for the present. When he saw the glory of the Lord, he fell on his face, being struck with an awe of God's majesty, and a dread of his displeasure; but the Spirit entered into him to raise him up, and then he recovered himself, and got upon his feet, and heard what the Spirit whispered to him; which is very surprising. One would have expected now that God should send him directly to the chief place of concourse, should give him favour in the eyes of his brethren, and make him and his message acceptable to them; that he should have a wider door of opportunity opened to him, and that God should give him a door of utterance to open his mouth boldly; but what is here said to him is the reverse of all this.

1. Instead of sending him to a public assembly, he orders him to confine himself to his own lodgings; "Go, shut thyself within thy house," ver. 24. He was not willing to appear in public, and when he did the people did not regard him, nor shew him the respect he deserved; and, as a just rebuke both to him and them, to him for his shyness of them, and to them for their coldness towards him, God forbids him to appear in public. Note, Our choice is often made our punishment, and it is a righteous thing with God to remove teachers into corners, when they, or their people, or both, grow indifferent to solemn assemblies. Ezekiel must shut up himself, some think, to give a sign of the besieging of Jerusalem, in which the people should be closely shut up as he was in his house, and which he speaks of in the next chapter. He must shut himself within his house, that he might receive farther discoveries of the mind of God, and might abundantly furnish himself with something to say to the people when he went abroad. We find that the elders of Judah visited him, and sat before him, sometimes in his house, ch. viii. 1, to be witnesses of his ecstasies; but it was not till ch. xi. 25, that he spake to them of the captivity all the things that the Lord had shewed him. Note, Those that are called to preach must find time to study, and a great deal of time too; must often shut themselves up in their houses, that they may give attendance to reading and meditation, and so their profiting may appear to all.

2. Instead of securing him an interest in the esteem and affections of those to whom he sent him, he tells him that they shall put bands upon him, and bind him, ver. 25, either, 1st. As a criminal. They shall bind him in order to the farther punishing of him as a disturber of the peace. Though they were themselves sent into bondage in Babylon for persecuting the prophets, yet there they continue to persecute them. Or rather, 2nd. As a distracted man. They would go about to bind him as one beside himself; for to that they imputed his violent motions in his raptures. The captains asked Jehu, "Wherefore came this mad fellow unto thee?" Festus said to Paul, "Thou art beside thyself;" and so they said of our Lord Jesus, Mar. iii. 21. Perhaps this was the reason why he must keep within doors, because otherwise they would bind him, under pretence of his being mad, and therefore he must not go out among them. Justly are prophets forbidden to go to those that will abuse them.

3. Instead of opening his lips, that his mouth might shew forth God's praise, God silenced him, made his tongue cleave to the roof of his mouth, so that he was dumb for a considerable time, ver. 26. The pious captives in Babylon used this imprecation upon themselves, That if they did forget Jerusalem, their stand a miraculous act, such as the carrying away of Ezekiel bodily through the air. The spirit moved him as it moved Paul when he went "bound in the spirit to Jerusalem." He was unable to resist the divine influence and impulse, and was in the condition of inspired ecstacy, in which the powers of the invisible world were revealed to him.

iii. 15. How far the prophet journeyed we know not, but he came to a place called Tel-abib, on the banks of the Chebar, the river where he received his first revelation. The Hebrew words rendered "and I sat where they sat" are obscure, and various explanations have been proposed. The Syriac version omits them. Some translate the words "and I saw those who dwelt there;" others, "and those who dwelt there;" while others agree with our version. On the whole perhaps the best explanation is the first of these, "and I saw those who dwelt there."

iii. 22. The plain where the prophet had a repetition of the vision tongue might cleave to the roof of their mouth, Ps. cxxxvii. 6. Ezekiel remembers Jerusalem more than any of them, and yet his tongue cleaves to the roof of his mouth; and he that can speak best is forbidden to speak at all, and the reason given is, because they are a rebellious house to whom he is sent, and they are not worthy to have him for a reprover. He shall not give them instructions and admonitions, for they are lost and thrown away upon them. He is before commanded to speak boldly to them, because they are most rebellious, ch. ii. 7. But, since that proves to no purpose, he is now for that reason enjoined silence, and shall not speak at all to them. Note, Those whose hearts are hardened against conviction are justly deprived of the means of conviction. Why should not the reprovers be dumb, if, after long trials, it be found that the reproved resolve to be deaf? If Ephraim be joined to idols, let him alone. "Thou shalt be dumb, and not be a reprover;" implying that, unless he were dumb, he would be reproving; if he could speak at all, he would witness against the wickedness of the wicked. But when God speaks with him, and designs to speak by him, he will open his mouth, ver. 27. Note, Though God's prophets may be silenced awhile, there will come a time when God will give them the opening of the mouth again. And when God speaks to his ministers, he not only opens their ears to hear what he saith, but opens their mouth to return an answer. Moses, that had a veil on his face when he went down to the people, took it off when he went up again to God, Ex. xxxiv. 34.

4. Instead of giving him assurance of success when he should at any time speak to the people, he here leaves the matter very doubtful, and Ezekiel must not perplex and disquiet himself about it, but let it be as it will. "He that heareth let him hear," and he is welcome to the comfort of it; let him hear and his soul shall live; but "he that forbeareth let him forbear" at his peril, and take what comes. "If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it;" neither God nor his prophet shall be any loser by it; but the prophet shall be rewarded for his faithfulness in reproving the sinner, and God will have the glory of his justice in condemning him for not taking the reproof.

CHAPTER IV.

Ezekiel was now among the captives in Babylon, but they there had Jerusalem still upon their hearts. The pious captives looked towards it with an eye of faith, as Daniel, Dan. vi. 10; the presumptuous ones looked towards it with an eye of pride, and flattered themselves with a conceit that they should shortly return thither again. They that remained corresponded with the captives, and it is likely buoyed them up with hopes that all would be well yet, as long as Jerusalem was standing in its strength, and perhaps upbraided those with their folly who had surrendered at first; therefore to take down this presumption God gives the prophet, in this chapter, a very clear and affecting foresight of the besieging of Jerusalem by the Chaldean army, and the calamities which would attend that siege. Two things are here represented to him in vision: I. The fortifications that should be raised against the city. This is signified by the prophet's laying siege to the portraiture of Jerusalem, ver. 1—3; and lying first on one side and then on the other side before it, ver. 4—8. II. The famine that should rage within the city. This is signified by his eating very coarse fare, and confining himself to a little of it, so long as this typical representation lasted, ver. 9—17.

THOU also, son of man, take thee a tile, and lay it before thee, and pourtray upon it the city, even Jerusalem: 2 And lay siege against it, and build a fort against it, and cast a mount against it; set the camp also against it, and set battering rams against it round about. 3 Moreover take thou unto thee an iron pan, and set it for a wall of iron between thee and the city: and set thy face against it, and it shall be besieged, and thou shalt lay siege against it. This shall be a sign to the house of Israel. 4 Lie thou also upon thy left side, and lay the iniquity of the house of Israel upon it: according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie upon it thou shalt bear their iniquity. 5 For I have laid upon thee the years of their iniquity, according to the number of the days, three hundred and ninety days: so shalt thou bear the iniquity of the house of Israel. 6 And when thou hast accomplished them, lie again on thy right side, and thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days: I have appointed thee each day for a year. 7 Therefore thou shalt set thy face toward the siege of Jerusalem, and thine arm shall be uncovered, and thou shalt prophesy against it. 8 And, behold, I will lay bands upon thee, and thou shalt not turn thee from one side to another, till thou hast ended the days of thy siege.

ENGRAVED BRICKS FROM BABYLON.

The prophet is here ordered to represent to himself and others, by signs which would be proper and powerful to strike the fancy, and to affect the mind, the siege of Jerusalem; and this amounted to a prediction.

First. He was ordered to engrave a draught of Jerusalem upon a tile, ver. 1. It was Jerusalem's honour, that while she kept her integrity God had graven her upon the palms of his hands, Isa. xlix. 15, and the names of the tribes were engraven in precious stones on the breastplate of the high priest; but now the faithful city is become a harlot, a worthless brittle tile, or brick, is thought good enough to pourtray it upon. This the prophet must lay before him, that the eye may affect the heart.

Secondly. He was ordered to build little forts against this portraiture of the city, resembling the batteries raised by the besiegers, ver. 2. Between the city that was besieged and himself that was the besieger he was to set up an iron pan, as an iron wall, ver. 3. This represented the inflexible resolution of both sides: the Chaldeans resolved, whatever it cost them, they would make themselves masters of the city, and would never quit it till they had conquered it; on the other side, the Jews resolved never to capitulate, but to hold out to the last extremity.

Thirdly. He was ordered to lie upon his side before it, as it were to surround it; representing the Chaldean army lying before it, to block it up, to keep the meat from going in, and the months from going out. He was to lie on his left side three hundred and ninety days, ver. 5, about thirteen months. The siege of Jerusalem is computed to last eighteen months, Jer. lii. 4—6; but if we deduct from that five months' interval, when the besiegers withdrew upon the approach of Pharaoh's army, Jer. xxxvii. 5—8, the number of the days of the close siege will be three hundred and ninety. Yet that also had another signification; the three hundred and ninety days, according to the prophetic dialect, signified three hundred and ninety years. And when the prophet lies so many days on his side he bears the guilt of that iniquity which the "house of Israel," that is, the ten tribes, had borne three hundred and ninety years, reckoning from their first apostacy under Jeroboam to the destruction of Jerusalem, which completed the ruin of those small remains of them that had incorporated with Judah. He is then to lie forty days upon his right side, and so long to "bear the iniquity of the house of Judah," the kingdom of the two tribes, because the measure-filling sins of that people were those which they were guilty of during the last forty years before their captivity, since the thirteenth year of Josiah, when Jeremiah began to prophesy, Jer. i. 1. Or, as some reckon it, since the eighteenth, when the book of the law was found, and the people renewed their covenant with God. When they persisted in their impieties and idolatries, notwithstanding they had such a prophet, and such a prince, and were brought into the bond of such a covenant, what could be expected but ruin without remedy? Judah, that hath such helps and advantages for reformation, fills the measure of their iniquity in less time than Israel doth. Now we are not to think that the prophet lay constantly, night and day, upon his side, but every day, for so many days together, at a certain time of the day when he received visits, and company came in, he was found lying three hundred and ninety days on his left side, and forty days on his right side before his portraiture of Jerusalem, which all that saw might easily understand to mean the close besieging of that city; and people would be flocking in daily, some for curiosity, and some for conscience, at the hour appointed, to see it and make their different remarks upon it.

His being found constantly on the same side, as if bands were laid upon him, (as indeed they were by the Divine command,) so that he could not turn him from one side to another till he had ended the days of the siege, did plainly represent the close and constant continuance of the besiegers about the city during that number of days, till they had gained their point.

Fourthly. He was ordered to prosecute the siege with vigour; ver. 7, "Thou shalt set thy face towards the siege of Jerusalem," as wholly intent upon it, and resolved to carry it; so the Chaldeans would be, and neither bribed nor forced to withdraw from it. Nebuchadnezzar's resentment of Zedekiah's treachery, in breaking his league with him, made him very furious in pushing on this siege, that he might chastise the insolence of that faithless prince and people; and his army promised themselves a rich booty of that pompous city, so that both set their faces against it, for they were very resolute. Nor were they less active and industrious, exerting themselves to the utmost in all the operations of the siege, which the prophet was to represent by the uncovering of his arm; or, as some read it, the stretching out of his arm, as it were to deal blows about without mercy. When God is about to do some great work he is said to make bare his arm, Isa. lii. 10. In short, the Chaldeans will go about their business, and go on in it as men in earnest, that resolve to go through with it. Now,

1. This is intended to be "a sign to the house of Israel," ver. 3; both to them in Babylon that were eyewitnesses of what the prophet did, and to them also who remained in their own land, who would hear the report of it. The prophet was dumb, and could not speak, ch. iii. 26; but, as his silence had a voice, and upbraided the people with their deafness, so even then God left not himself without witness, but ordered him to make signs, as dumb men use to do, and as Zecharias did when he was dumb, and by them to make known his mind, that is, the mind of God, to the people. And thus likewise the people were upbraided with their stupidity and dulness, that they were not capable of being taught as men of sense are by words, but must be taught as children are by pictures, or as deaf men are by signs. Or, perhaps they are hereby upbraided with their malice against the prophet; had he spoken in words at length what was signified by these figures, they would have entangled him in his talk, would have indicted him for treasonable expressions, for they knew how to "make a man an offender for a word," Isa. xxix. 21; to avoid which he is ordered to make use of signs. Or, the prophet made use of signs for the same reason that Christ made use of parables, that hearing they might hear, and not understand; and seeing they might see, and not perceive, Mat. xxiii. 14, 15. They would not understand what was plain, and therefore shall be taught by that which is difficult, and herein the Lord was righteous.

2. Thus the prophet prophesies against Jerusalem, ver. 7; and there were those who not only understood it so, but were the more affected with it by it; described in the first chapter was no doubt in the vicinity of Tel-abib; but until it is decided where the Chebar was we cannot determine the positions of Tel-abib and of the "plain." The syllable Tel is a word meaning a hill, and in that sense is well known. The "plain" was probably the lower ground.

iv. 1, 2. The word rendered "tile" here might as well be rendered "brick," and the whole passage is an interesting reflex of the well-known custom of Babylonians and Assyrians of inscribing various devices upon their bricks. Specimens of bricks still remain, not simply bearing the sunken characters now so familiar to the eye, but with traces of painting in red, blue, black, yellow, white, green, &c. Clay tablets also were used for various purposes, where we should employ paper, and official deeds and sundry other documents upon clay have been deposited in the British Museum and other places. With respect to the making a plan of Jerusalem, it may also be noted that the Assyrians, among whom Ezekiel was, made rude plans and being so represented; for images to the eye commonly make deeper impressions upon the mind than words can; and for this reason sacraments are instituted to represent Divine things, that we might see and believe, might see and be affected with those things; and we may expect this benefit by them, and a blessing to go along with them, whilst, as the prophet here, we make use only of such signs as God has himself expressly appointed, which we must conclude are the fittest. Note, The power of imagination, if it be rightly used, and kept under the direction and correction of reason and faith, may be of good use to kindle and excite pious and devout affections, as it was here to Ezekiel and his attendants. Methinks I see so and so, myself dying, time expiring, the world on fire, the dead rising, the great tribunal sit, and the like, may have a mighty good influence upon us; for fancy is like fire, a good servant, but a bad master.

3. This whole transaction hath that in it which the prophet might, with a good colour of reason, have boggled at and excepted against, and yet in obedience to God's command, and in execution of his office, he did it according to order. 1st. It seemed childish, and ludicrous, and beneath his gravity, and there were those that would ridicule him for it; but he knew the Divine appointment put honour enough upon that which otherwise seemed mean to save his reputation in the doing of it. 2nd. It was toilsome and tiresome to do as he did; but our ease, as well as our credit, must be sacrificed to our duty; and we must never call God's service, in any instance of it, a hard service. 3rd. It could not but be very much 'against the grain' with him to appear thus against Jerusalem, the city of God, the holy city, to act as an enemy against a place to which he was so good a friend; but he is a prophet, and must follow his instructions, not his affections, and must plainly preach the ruin of a sinful place, though its welfare is what he passionately desires and earnestly prays for.

4. All this that the prophet sets before the children of his people concerning the destruction of Jerusalem is designed to bring them to repentance, by shewing them sin is the provoking cause of this destruction; sin the ruin of that once flourishing city, than which sure nothing could be more effectual to make them hate sin, and turn from it. While he thus in lively colours describes the calamity with a great deal of pain and uneasiness to himself, he is bearing the iniquity of Israel and Judah. Look here, said he, and see what work sin makes; what an evil and bitter thing it is to depart from God; this comes of sin, your sin, and the sin of your fathers. Let that therefore be the daily matter of your sorrow and shame now in your captivity, that you may make your peace with God, and he may return in mercy to you. But observe, it is a day of punishment for a year of sin; "I have appointed thee each day for a year." The siege is a calamity of three hundred and ninety days, in which God reckons for the iniquity of three hundred and ninety years; justly therefore do they acknowledge that God had punished them less than their iniquity deserved, Ezr. ix. 13. But let impenitent sinners know that though now God is longsuffering towards them, in the other world there is an everlasting punishment. When God laid bands upon the prophet it was to shew them how they were bound with the cords of their own transgression, Lam. i. 14, and therefore they were now "holden in the cords of affliction." But we may well think of the prophet's case with compassion, when God laid upon him the bands of duty, as he doth on all his ministers, 1 Cor. ix. 16, "Necessity is upon me, and woe unto me if I preach not the Gospel;" and yet men laid upon him bonds of restraint, ch. iii. 25. But under both it is satisfaction enough that they are serving the interests of God's kingdom among men.

9 Take thou also unto thee wheat, and barley, and beans, and lentiles, and millet, and fitches, and put them in one vessel, and make thee bread thereof, according to the number of the days that thou shalt lie upon thy side, three hundred and ninety days shalt thou eat thereof. 10 And thy meat which thou shalt eat shall be by weight, twenty shekels a day: from time to time shalt thou eat it. 11 Thou shalt drink also water by measure, the sixth part of an hin: from time to time shalt thou drink. 12 And thou shalt eat it as barley cakes, and thou shalt bake it with dung that cometh out of man, in their sight. 13 And the LORD said, Even thus shall the children of Israel eat their defiled bread among the Gentiles, whither I will drive them. 14 Then said I, Ah Lord God! behold, my soul hath not been polluted: for from my youth up even till now have I not eaten of that which dieth of itself, or is torn in pieces; neither came there abominable flesh into my mouth. 15 Then he said unto me, Lo, I have given thee cow's dung for man's dung, and thou shalt prepare thy bread therewith. 16 Moreover he said unto me, Son of man, behold, I will break the staff of bread in Jerusalem: and they shall eat bread by weight, and with care; and they shall drink water by measure, and with astonishment: 17 That they may want bread and water, and be astonied one with another, and consume away for their iniquity.

COLLECTING FUEL.—ver. 12.

The best exposition of this part of Ezekiel's prediction of Jerusalem's desolation is Jeremiah's lamentation of it, Lam. iv. 3, &c., and ch. v. 10; where he pathetically describes the terrible famine that was in Jerusalem during the siege, and the sad effects of it. The prophet here, to affect the people with the foresight of it, must confine himself for three hundred and ninety days to coarse fare, and short commons, and that ill dressed; for they should want both food and fuel.

First. His meat, for the quality of it, was to be of the worst bread, made of but a little wheat and barley, and the rest of "beans, and lentiles, and millet, and fitches," such as we feed horses or fatted hogs with; and this mixed as millcorn, or as that in the beggar's bag, that has a dish full of one sort of corn at one house, and of another at another house. Of such corn as this must the prophet's bread be made, while he underwent the fatigue of lying on his side, and needed something better to support him, ver. 9. Note, It is our wisdom not to be too fond of dainties, and pleasant bread, because we know not what hard meat we may be tied to, nay, and may be glad of, before we die. The meanest sort of food is better than we deserve, and therefore must not be despised or wasted; nor must those that use it be looked upon with disdain, because we know not what may be our own lot.

Secondly. For the quantity of it, it was to be of the least that a man could be kept alive with, to signify that the besieged should be reduced to short allowance, and should hold out till "all the bread in the city was spent," Jer. xxxvii. 21. The prophet must eat but twenty shekels weight of bread a day, ver. 10. That was about ten ounces; and he must drink but the "sixth part of a hin" of water, that was half a pint, about eight ounces, ver. 11. The stint of the Lessian diet is fourteen ounces of meat, and sixteen of drink. The prophet in Babylon had bread enough and to spare, and was by the river side, where there was plenty of water; and yet, that he might confirm his own prediction, and be a sign to the children of Israel, God obligeth him to live thus sparingly, and he submits to it. Note, God's servants must learn to endure hardness, and to deny themselves the use of lawful delights, when they may thereby serve the glory of God, evidence the sincerity of their faith, and express their sympathy with their brethren in affliction. The body must be kept under, and brought into subjection. Nature is content with a little, and grace with less; but lust with nothing. It is good to stint ourselves of choice, that we may the better bear it if ever we should come to be stinted by necessity. And in times of public distress and calamity it ill becomes us to make much of ourselves, as those that "drank wine in bowls," and "were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph," Am. vi. 4—6.

Thirdly. For the dressing of it, he must bake it with man's dung, ver. 12; that must be dried and serve for fuel to heat his oven with. The thought of it would almost turn one's stomach; yet the coarse bread thus baked he must "eat as barley cakes;" that is, as freely as if it were the same bread he had been used to. This nauseous piece of cookery he must exercise publicly in their sight, that they might be the more affected with the calamity approaching, which was signified by it; that in the extremity of the famine they should not only have nothing that was dainty, but nothing that was cleanly about them; but must take up with what they could get: "To the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet."

This circumstance of the sign, the baking of his bread with man's dung, the prophet, with submission, humbly desired might be dispensed with, ver. 14. It seemed to have in it something of a ceremonial pollution; for there was a law that man's dung should be "covered with earth," that God might "see no unclean thing in their camp," Deu. xxiii. 13, 14. And must he go and gather a thing so offensive, and use it in dressing his meat in the sight of the people? "Ah, Lord God," saith he, "behold my soul has not been polluted," and I am afraid lest by this it be polluted. Note, The pollution of the soul by sin is what good people dread more than any thing; and yet sometimes tender consciences fear it without cause, and perplex themselves with scruples about lawful things, as the prophet here, who had not yet learned that it is not that which goes into the mouth that defiles the man, Mat. xv. 11. But observe, he doth not plead, Lord, from my youth I have been brought up delicately, and never used to any thing but what was clean and nice; and there were those who were so brought up that in the siege of Jerusalem did embrace dunghills, Lam. iv. 5; but that he had been brought up conscientiously, and had never eaten any thing that was forbidden by the law, that died of itself, or was torn in pieces. And therefore, Lord, do not put this upon me now. Thus Peter pleaded, Acts x. 14, "Lord, I have never eaten any thing that is common or unclean." Note, It will be comfortable to us when we are reduced to hardships if our hearts can witness for us that we have always been careful to abstain from sin, even from little sins, and the appearances of evil. Whatever God commands us we may be sure is good; but if we be put upon any thing that we apprehend to be evil, we should argue against it from this consideration, that hitherto we have preserved our purity, and shall we lose it now? Now because Ezekiel, with a manifest tenderness of conscience, made this scruple, God dispensed with him in this matter. Note, Those who have power in their hands should not be rigorous in pressing their commands upon those that are dissatisfied concerning them, yea, though their dissatisfactions be groundless, or other representations, examples of which upon stone are to be seen in our museums. Thus, in accordance with verse 2, we find rude sketches of siege operations, with various appliances for attack and defence, which closely correspond with what is here mentioned.

iv. 3. The pan was probably an iron plate such as cakes were baked on, and was intended to represent the strength of the besiegers' works.

iv. 4—6. It is thought by many that all here described passed in vision, and that as an actual fact the prophet did not portray a siege upon a brick, did not use an iron plate as an emblem of the besieging force, and did not lie upon his left side 390 days, nor upon his right side 40 days, &c. And this is a very probable opinion. There is a diversity of opinion as to what 390 years and what 40 years are intended. The two make 430 years, the period between which Abraham went into Egypt and Israel's exodus took place, and some think there is a reference to this period. Others say that 390 years arising from education and long usage; but should recede from them rather than grieve or offend the weak, or put a stumblingblock before them, in conformity to the example of God's condescension to Ezekiel, though we are sure his authority is incontestable, and all his commands wise and good. God allowed Ezekiel to use cow's dung instead of man's dung, ver. 15. This is an implicit reflection upon man, as intimating that, he being polluted with sin, his filthiness is more nauseous and odious than that of any other creature. "How much more abominable and filthy is man!" Job xv. 16.

Now this sign is particularly explained here. It signified,

1. That those who remained in Jerusalem should be brought to extreme misery for want of necessary food. All supplies being cut off by the besiegers, the city would soon find a want of the country, for "the king himself is served of the field," and thus the "staff of bread" would be "broken in Jerusalem," ver. 16. God would not only take away from the bread its power to nourish, so that "they shall eat and not be satisfied," Lev. xxvi. 26, but take away the bread itself, Isa. iii. 1; so that what little remained should be "eaten by weight," so much a day, so much a head; that they might have an equal share, and might make it last as long as possible. But to what purpose, when they could not make it last always; and the besieged must be tired out before the besiegers? They shall eat and drink with care, to make it go as far as might be, and with astonishment when they saw it almost spent, and know not which way to look for a recruit. They shall be "astonied one with another;" whereas it used to be some alleviation of a calamity to have others share with us in it, (Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris,) and some ease to the spirit to complain of the burthen, it should be an aggravation of the misery that it was universal, and their complaining to one another should but make them all the more uneasy, and increase the astonishment; and the event shall be as ill as their fears: they cannot make it worse than it is, for "they shall consume away for their iniquity;" multitudes of them shall die of famine, a lingering death, worse than that by the sword, Lam. iv. 9. They shall die so as to feel themselves die; and it is sin that brings all this misery upon them. They shall 'consume away in their iniquity;' so it may be read. They shall continue hardened and impenitent, and shall die in their sins, which is more miserable than to die on a dunghill.

Now, 1st. Let us see here what woful work sin makes with a people, and acknowledge the righteousness of God herein. Time was when Jerusalem was filled with the finest of the wheat, Ps. cxlvii. 14, but now it would be glad of the coarsest, and cannot have it. Fulness of bread, as it was one of Jerusalem's mercies, so it was become one of her sins, ch. xvi. 49. The plenty was abused to luxury and excess, which was therefore thus justly punished with famine. It is a righteous thing with God to deprive us of those enjoyments which we have made the food and fuel of our lusts. 2nd. Let us see what reason we have to bless God for plenty; not only for the fruits of the earth, but for the freedom of commerce, that the husbandman can have money for his bread, and the tradesman bread for his money; that there is not only abundance in the field, but in the market, that those who live in cities and great towns, though they sow not, neither do they reap, yet are fed from day to day with food convenient.

2. It signified that those who were carried into captivity should be forced to "eat their defiled bread among the Gentiles," ver. 13; that is, to eat meat made up by Gentile hands, otherwise than according to the law of the Jewish church, which they were always taught to call defiled, and which they would have as great an aversion to as a man would have to bread prepared with dung; that is, as perhaps it may be understood, kneaded and moulded with dung. Daniel and his fellows confined themselves to "pulse and water," rather than they would "eat the portion of the king's meat" assigned them, because they apprehended it would defile them, Dan. i. 8. Or they should be forced to eat nasty, stinking meat, such as their oppressors would allow them in their slavery, and such as formerly they would have scorned to touch. Because they "served not God" with cheerfulness, "in the abundance of all things," God will make them "serve their enemies in the want of all things."

CHAPTER V.

In this chapter we have a farther and no less terrible denunciation of the judgments of God that were coming with all speed and force upon the Jewish nation, which would utterly ruin it, for when God judgeth he will overcome. This destruction of Judah and Jerusalem is here, I. Represented by a sign, the cutting and burning and scattering of hair, ver. 1—4. II. That sign is expounded, and applied to Jerusalem. 1. Sin is charged upon Jerusalem as the cause of this desolation: contempt of God's law, ver. 5—7, and profanation of his sanctuary, ver. 11; 2. Wrath is threatened, great wrath, ver. 8—10, a variety of miseries, ver. 12, 16, 17, such as should be their reproach and ruin, ver. 13—15.

AND thou, son of man, take thee a sharp knife, take thee a barber's razor, and cause it to pass upon thine head and upon thy beard: then take thee balances to weigh, and divide the hair. 2 Thou shalt burn with fire a third part in the midst of the city, when the days of the siege are fulfilled: and thou shalt take a third part, and smite about it with a knife: and a third part thou shalt scatter in the wind; and I will draw out a sword after them. 3 Thou shalt also take thereof a few in number, and bind them in thy skirts. 4 Then take of them again, and cast them into the midst of the fire, and burn them in the fire; for thereof shall a fire come forth into all the house of Israel.

We have here the sign by which the utter destruction of Jerusalem is set forth; and here, as before, the prophet is himself the sign, that the people might see how much he affected himself with, and interested himself in, the case of Jerusalem, and how near it lay to his heart. Even then when he foretold the desolations of it, he was himself so much concerned about it as to take what was done to it as done to himself, so far was he from desiring the woful day

First. He must "shave off the hair of his head and beard," ver. 1; which signified God's utter rejecting and abandoning that people as a useless, worthless generation, such as could well be spared, nay, such as it would be his honour to part with. His judgments, and all the instruments he made use of in cutting them off, were this sharp knife and this razor, that were proper to be made use of, and would do execution. Jerusalem had been the head, but being degenerated was become as the hair, which, when it grows thick and long, is but a burthen, which a man wishes to get clear of, as God of the sinners in Zion; "Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries," Isa. i. 24. Ezekiel must not cut off that hair only that was superfluous, but cut it all off, noting the full end that God would make of Jerusalem. The hair that would not be trimmed, and kept neat and clean by the admonitions of the prophets, must be all shaved off by an utter destruction. Those will be ruined that will not be reformed.

Secondly. He must weigh the hair, and divide it into three parts. This intimates the very exact directing of God's judgments, according to equity, (by him men and their actions are weighed in the unerring balance of truth and righteousness,) and the proportion which Divine justice observes in punishing some by one judgment and others by another; but one way or other they shall be met with. Some make the shaving of the hair to note the loss of their liberty and of their honour; it was looked upon as a mark of ignominy, as in the disgrace Hanun put on David's ambassadors. It notes also the loss of their joy; for they shaved their heads upon occasion of great mourning. I may add the loss of their Nazariteship; for the shaving the head was a period to that vow, Num. vi. 18, and Jerusalem was now no longer looked upon as a holy city.

Thirdly. He must dispose of the hair, so as that it might all be destroyed or dispersed, ver. 2. 1. One "third part" must be burnt "in the midst of the city;" noting the multitudes that should perish by famine and pestilence, and perhaps many in the conflagration of the city, "when the days of the siege were fulfilled;" or the laying of that glorious city in ashes might well be looked upon as a third part of the destruction threatened. 2. Another third part was to be cut in pieces with a knife, representing the many that during the siege were slain by the sword in their sallies out upon the besiegers, and especially when the city was taken by storm, the Chaldeans being then most furious, and the Jews most feeble. 3. Another third part was to be "scattered in the wind;" noting the carrying away of some into the land of the conqueror, and the flight of others into the neighbouring countries for shelter, so that they were hurried some one way and some another, like loose hairs in the wind. But, lest they should think that this dispersion would be their escape, God adds, "And I will draw out a sword after them," so that wherever they go evil shall pursue them. Note, God has variety of judgments wherewith to accomplish the destruction of a sinful people, and to make an end when he begins.

Fourthly. He must preserve a small quantity of the third sort that were to be "scattered in the wind," and "bind them in his skirts," as one would bind that which he is very mindful and careful of, ver. 3. This signified perhaps that little handful of people which were left under the government of Gedaliah, who it was hoped would keep possession of the land when the body of the people were carried into captivity. Thus God would have done well for them, if they would have done well for themselves. But these few that were reserved must be taken and "cast into the fire," ver. 4. When Gedaliah and his friends were slain, the people that put themselves under his protection were scattered, some gone into Egypt, others carried off by the Chaldeans, and, in short, the land totally cleared of them; then this was fulfilled, for out of those combustions "a fire came forth into all the house of Israel;" who, as fuel upon the fire, kindled and consumed one another. Note. It is ill with a people when those are taken away in wrath that seemed to be marked for monuments of mercy; for then there is no remnant or escaping, none shut up or left.

SHAVING THE HEAD.—ver. 1.

5 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
This is Jerusalem:
I have set it in the midst of the nations
And countries that are round about her.
6 And she hath changed my judgments into wickedness more than the nations,
And my statutes more than the countries that are round about her:
For they have refused my judgments and my statutes,
They have not walked in them.
7 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;

elapsed from the establishment of idolatry by Jeroboam and the desolation effected by Nebuzar-adan, and that the 40 years were those between Josiah's reformation and the same desolation. Others again suppose the days mean the number of days the siege of Jerusalem continued. To this last opinion it is a sufficient reply that the days are clearly meant to typify years. The natural interpretation would seem to be that the degradation of Israel and of Judah would extend over the period mentioned. But this leaves us still uncertain, as we cannot positively say when the respective periods commenced. On the whole, therefore, we prefer to leave the question undecided, as one of the mysteries of Holy Writ.

iv. 7—16. Another phase of the vision is contained in these verses. The prophet is to make bread of mingled seed—wheat, barley, beans, lentils, millet, and spelt (not fitches), and to bake it with a fire of human dung. It is wrong to suppose this last was to be an ingredient in the cakes; the dung of camels, oxen, and other animals

Because ye multiplied more than the nations that are round about you,
And have not walked in my statutes,
Neither have kept my judgments,
Neither have done according to the judgments
Of the nations that are round about you;
8 Therefore thus saith the Lord GOD;
Behold, I, even I, am against thee,
And will execute judgments in the midst of thee
In the sight of the nations.
9 And I will do in thee that which I have not done,
And whereunto I will not do any more the like,
Because of all thine abominations. [thee,
10 Therefore the fathers shall eat the sons in the midst of
And the sons shall eat their fathers;
And I will execute judgments in thee,
And the whole remnant of thee will I scatter
Into all the winds.
11 Wherefore, as I live, saith the Lord GOD;
Surely, because thou hast defiled my sanctuary with all thy detestable things,
And with all thine abominations,
Therefore will I also diminish thee;
Neither shall mine eye spare,
Neither will I have any pity.
12 A third part of thee shall die with the pestilence,
And with famine shall they be consumed in the midst of thee:
And a third part shall fall by the sword round about thee;
And I will scatter a third part into all the winds,
And I will draw out a sword after them.
13 Thus shall mine anger be accomplished,
And I will cause my fury to rest upon them,
And I will be comforted: [my zeal,
And they shall know that I the LORD have spoken it in
When I have accomplished my fury in them.
14 Moreover I will make thee waste, [thee,
And a reproach among the nations that are round about
In the sight of all that pass by.
15 So it shall be a reproach and a taunt,
An instruction and an astonishment
Unto the nations that are round about thee,
When I shall execute judgments in thee
In anger and in fury and in furious rebukes.
I the LORD have spoken it.
16 When I shall send upon them the evil arrows of famine,
Which shall be for their destruction,
And which I will send to destroy you:
And I will increase the famine upon you,
And will break your staff of bread:
17 So will I send upon you famine and evil beasts,
And they shall bereave thee;
And pestilence and blood shall pass through thee;
And I will bring the sword upon thee.
I the LORD have spoken it.

We have here the reddition of the foregoing similitude. "This is Jerusalem;" thus it is usual in Scripture language to give the name of the thing signified to the sign; as when Christ said, "This is my body." The prophet's head that was to be shaved signified Jerusalem, that by the judgments of God was now to be stripped of all its ornaments, to be emptied of all its inhabitants, and to be "set naked and bare," to be "shaved with a razor that is hired," Isa. vii. 20. The head of one that was a priest, a prophet, a holy person, was fittest to represent Jerusalem the holy city. Now the contents of these verses are much the same with what we have often met with, and still shall, in the writings of the prophets. Here is,

First. The privileges Jerusalem was honoured with; ver. 5, "I have set it in the midst of the nations and countries that are round about her," and those famous nations, and very considerable. Jerusalem was not situated in a remote, obscure corner of the world, far from neighbours, but in the midst of kingdoms that were populous, polite, and civilised, famed for learning, arts, and sciences, and which then made the greatest figure in the world. But there seems to be more in it than so.

1. Jerusalem was dignified and preferred above the neighbour nations and their cities; it was set in the midst of them, as excelling them all. This holy mountain was exalted above all the hills, Isa. ii. 2. "Why leap ye, ye high hills? this is the hill which God desireth to dwell in," Ps. lxviii. 16. Jerusalem was a city upon a hill, conspicuous and illustrious, and which all the neighbour nations had an eye upon, some for good-will, some for ill-will.

2. Jerusalem was designed to have a good influence upon the nations and countries round about; was set in the midst of them as a candle upon a candlestick, to spread the light of Divine revelation which she was blessed with, to all the dark corners of the neighbour nations, that from them it might diffuse itself farther, even to the ends of the earth. Jerusalem was set in the midst of the nations, to be as the heart in the body, to invigorate this dead world with a Divine life, as well as to enlighten this dark world with a Divine light, to be an example of every thing that was good. The nations that observed what excellent statutes and judgments they had concluded them to be a wise and understanding people, Deu. iv. 6; fit to be consulted as an oracle, as they were in Solomon's time, 1 Kin. iv. 34. And had they preserved this reputation, and made a right use of it, what a blessing had Jerusalem been to all the nations about. But failing to be so, the accomplishment of this intention was reserved for its latter days, when out of Zion went forth the gospel law, and the word of the Lord Jesus from Jerusalem, and there repentance and remission began to be preached, and thence the preachers of them "went forth into all nations." And when that was done Jerusalem was levelled with the ground. Note, When places and persons are made great, it is with design that they may do good, and that those about them may be the better for them, that their light might shine before men.

Secondly. The provocations Jerusalem was guilty of. A very high charge is here drawn up against that city, and proved beyond contradiction, sufficient to justify God in seizing its privileges and putting it under military execution.

1. She had not walked in God's statutes, nor kept his judgments, ver. 7; nay, they had refused his judgments and his statutes, ver. 6; they did not do their duty, nay, they would not, they said they would not. Those statutes and judgments which their neighbours admired they despised; which they should have set before their face, they cast behind their back. Note, A contempt of the word and law of God opens a door to all manner of iniquity. God's statutes are the terms on which he deals with men; they that refuse his terms cannot expect his favours.

2. She had changed God's judgments into wickedness, ver. 6; a very high expression of their profaneness; that they had not only broken God's laws, but had so perverted and abused them that they had made them the excuse and colour of their wickedness; they introduced the abominable customs and usages of the heathen, instead of God's institutions. This was changing the "truth of God into a lie," Rom. i. 25; and the glory of God into shame, Ps. iv. 2. Note, Those that have been well educated, if they live ill, put the highest affront imaginable upon God, as if he were the patron of sin, and his judgments were "turned into wickedness."

3. She had been worse than the neighbour nations, to whom she should have set a good example. She "hath changed my judgments," by idolatries and false worship, "more than the nations," ver. 6, and "multiplied," (that is, multiplied idols and altars, gods and temples, multiplied those things the unity of which was their praise,) "more than the nations that were round about." Israel's God is one, and his name one, his altar one; but they, not content with this one God, multiplied their gods to that degree, that "according to the numbers of their cities, so were their gods," and their altars "as heaps in the furrows of the field;" so that they exceeded all their neighbours in having gods many and lords many. They corrupted revealed religion more than the Gentiles had corrupted natural religion. Note, If those that have made a profession of religion, and have had a pious education, apostatize from it, they are commonly more profane and vicious than those who never made any profession; they have the "seven other spirits more wicked."

4. She had "not done according to the judgments of the nations," ver. 7; that is, they had not carried it towards their God, though he is the only true God, as the nations had carried it towards their gods, though they were false gods; had not been so observant of him, nor so constant to him. Hath a nation changed their gods, or slighted them so as they have? Jer. ii. 11. Or, it may refer to their morals; instead of reforming their neighbours, they came short of them, and many that were of "the uncircumcision kept the righteousness of the law," better than those that were of the circumcision, Rom. ii. 26, 27. Those that had the light of Scripture did not "according to the judgments" of many that had the light of nature. Note, There are those who are called Christians that will in the great day be condemned by the better tempers and better lives of sober heathens.

5. The particular crime charged upon Jerusalem is "profaning the holy things," which she had been both intrusted and honoured with; ver. 11, "Thou hast defiled my sanctuary with all thy detestable things;" that is, with thine idols and idolatries. The images of their pretended deities, and the groves erected in honour of them were brought into the temple, and the ceremonies used by idolaters were brought into the worship of God; thus every thing that is sacred was polluted. Note, Idols are detestable things anywhere, but more especially so in the sanctuary.

Thirdly. The punishment that Jerusalem should fall under for these provocations. "Shall not God visit for these things?" No doubt he shall. The matter of the sentence here passed upon Jerusalem is very dreadful, and the manner of expression makes it yet more so. The judgments are various, and the threatenings of them varied, iterated, inculcated, that one may well say, "Who is able to stand in God's sight when once he is angry?"

1. God will take this work of punishing Jerusalem into his own hands. And "who knows the power of his anger?" and what a fearful thing it is to "fall into his hands." Observe what a mighty emphasis is laid upon it; ver. 8, "I, even I, am against thee." God had been for Jerusalem to defend and save it; but miserable is its case when he is "turned to be its enemy, and fight against it." If God be against us the whole creation is at war with us, and nothing can be for us so as to stand us in any stead. You think it is only the Chaldean army that is against you; but they are God's hand, or rather the staff in his hand. It is "I, even I," that "am against thee;" not only to speak against thee by prophets, but to act against thee by providence; "I will execute judgments in thee," ver. 10; "in the midst of thee," ver. 8; not only in the suburbs but in the heart of the city; not only in the borders, but in the bowels of the country. Note, Those that will not observe the judgments of God's mouth shall not escape the judgments of his hand; and God's judgments, when they come with commission, will penetrate into the midst of a people, will enter into the soul; "into the bowels like water," and "like oil into the bones." "I will execute judgments." Note, God himself undertakes to execute his own judgments according to the true and full intent of them; whatever are the instruments, he is the principal agent.

2. These punishments shall come from his displeasure. As to the body of the people it shall not be a correction in love, but he will "execute judgments in anger, and in fury, and in furious rebukes," ver. 15; strange expressions to come from a God who hath said, "Fury is not in me;" and who hath declared is largely used in the East for fuel, so to this practice we must refer the idea. In some cases, where there is neither an oven nor an iron plate, the dough is made up into balls, as Dr. Kitto calls them, and these are placed in the fire, whether it is of dung or not, and so baked. "It seems very probable that it was such cakes or balls, baked in immediate contact with the fire, which the prophet intended to provide, and which made him the more abhor the idea of employing human dung for the purpose" of fuel. There is nothing in the passage to justify the terms used by Dr. Fairbairn when he speaks of "bread composed of such abominable materials." The materials were all wholesome and good, though not equally so; the fuel only was repulsive, and it is a complete misunderstanding which leads the author just named to render verse 15, "And he said, See, I have given thee cow's dung instead of human ordure, and thou shalt make thy bread of it." Verse 12 ought to have prevented such a mistake; and the Hebrew of verse 17 has to be distorted. The himself "gracious, and merciful, and slow to anger." But they are designed to shew the malignity of sin, and the offence it gives to the just and holy God. That must needs be a very evil thing which provokes him to such resentments, and against his own people too that had been so high in his favour; and expressed with so much satisfaction: ver. 13, "Mine anger," which has long been withheld, "shall now be accomplished, and I will cause my fury to rest upon them;" it shall not only light upon them, but lie upon them, and fill them as vessels of wrath, fitted by their own wickedness to destruction. And justice being hereby glorified, "I will be comforted," that is, will be entirely satisfied in what I have done. As when God is dishonoured by the sins of men he is said to be grieved, Ps. xcv. 10, so when he is honoured by their destruction he is said to be comforted. The struggle between mercy and judgment is over, and in this case judgment triumphs; triumphs indeed, for mercy that has been so long abused is now silent, and gives up the cause, has not a word more to say on the behalf of such an ungrateful, incorrigible people; "Mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have any pity," ver. 11. Divine compassion defers the punishment, or mitigates it, or supports under it, or shortens it; but here is "judgment without mercy," wrath without any mixture or allay of pity. These expressions are thus sharpened and heightened perhaps with design to look farther to "the vengeance of eternal fire," which some of the destructions we read of in the Old Testament were typical of, and particularly that of Jerusalem; for surely it is nowhere on this side hell that this word has its full accomplishment, "Mine eye shall not spare," but "I will cause my fury to rest." Note, Those that live and die impenitent will perish for ever unpitied. There is a day coming when "the Lord will not spare."

3. Punishment shall be public and open. I will execute these judgments "in the sight of the nations," ver. 8. The judgments themselves shall be so remarkable, as that all the nations far and near shall take notice of them, they shall be all the talk of that part of the world, and the more for the conspicuousness of the place and people on which they are inflicted. Note, Public sins, as they call for public reproofs, ("them that sin rebuke before all,") so, if those prevail not, they call for public judgments. "He striketh them as wicked men in the open sight of others," Job xxxiv. 26, that he may maintain and vindicate the honour of his government; for, as Grotius descants upon it here, 'Why should he suffer it to be said, See what wicked lives they lead that profess to be the worshippers of the only true God?' And as the publicness of the judgments will redound to the honour of God, so it will serve, 1st. To aggravate the punishment, and to make it lie the more heavy. Jerusalem being made waste, becomes "a reproach among the nations, in the sight of all that pass by," ver. 14. The more conspicuous, and the more peculiar any have been in the day of their prosperity, the greater disgrace attends their fall, and that was Jerusalem's case. The more Jerusalem had been a praise in the earth, the more it is now a reproach and a taunt, ver. 15. This she was warned of as much as any thing when her glory commenced, 1 Kin. ix. 8; and this was lamented as much as any thing when it was laid in the dust, Lam. ii. 15. 2nd. To teach the nations to fear before the God of Israel, when they saw what a jealous God he is, and how severely he punished sin, even in those that are nearest to him. "It shall be an instruction to the nations," ver. 15. Jerusalem should have taught her neighbours the fear of God by her piety and virtue; but, she not doing that, God will teach it them by her ruin; for they have reason to say, "If this be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" If judgment begin at the house of God, where will it end? If they be thus punished that only had some idolaters among them, what will become of us that are all idolaters? Note, The destruction of some is designed for the instruction of others. Malefactors are publicly punished, in terrorem, that others may take warning.

4. These punishments, in the kind of them, shall be very severe and grievous. 1st. They shall be such as have no precedent or parallel. Their sins being more provoking than those of others, the judgments executed upon them should be uncommon; ver. 9, "I will do in thee that which I have not done" in thee before, though thou hast long since deserved it, nay, that which I have not done in any other city; this punishment of Jerusalem is said to be "greater than that of Sodom," Lam. iv. 6, which was the sorest of all that went before it. Nay, it is such as "I will not do any more the like," all the circumstances taken in, to any other city, till the like comes to be done again to this city, in its final overthrow by the Romans. This is a rhetorical expression of the most grievous judgments, like that character of Hezekiah, that there was "none like him, before or after him." 2nd. They shall be such as will force them to break the strongest bonds of natural affection to one another, which will be a just punishment of them for their wilful breaking of the bonds of their duty to God; ver. 10, "The fathers shall eat the sons, and the sons shall eat the fathers," through the extremity of the famine, or compelled to do it by their barbarous conquerors. 3rd. There shall be a complication of judgments, any one of them terrible enough, and desolating; but what then would they be when they came all together and in perfection? Some shall be taken away by the plague, ver. 12; The pestilence shall pass through thee, ver. 17, sweeping all before it, as the destroying angel. Others shall be consumed with famine, shall gradually waste away as men in a consumption, ver. 13. This is again insisted on, ver. 16, "I will send upon them the evil arrows of famine," hunger shall pine and pierce them, and wound them to the heart, as if arrows, evil arrows, poisoned darts, were shot into them. God has many arrows, evil arrows, in his quiver; when some are discharged he hath still more in reserve; "I will increase the famine upon you." A famine in a bereaved country may decrease, as fruits spring forth, but a famine in a besieged city will increase of course; yet God speaks of it as his act, "I will increase it, and will break your staff of bread," will take away the necessary supports of life, will disappoint you of all that which you depend upon, so that there is no remedy but you must fall to the ground. Life is frail, is weak, is burthened; so that, if it have not daily bread for its staff to lean upon, it cannot but sink, and is soon gone if that staff be broken. Others shall fall by the sword round about Jerusalem, when they sally out upon the besiegers. It is a sword which God will bring, ver. 17. The sword of the Lord, that used to be drawn for Jerusalem's defence, is now drawn for its destruction. Others are devoured by evil beasts, which will make a prey of those that fly for shelter to the deserts and mountains; they shall meet their ruin where they expected refuge, for there is no outrunning the judgments of God, ver. 17. And lastly, Those that escape shall be scattered into all parts of the world; into all the winds, so it is expressed, ver. 10, 12, intimating that they should not only be dispersed, but hurried and tossed, and driven to and fro, as chaff before the wind. Nay, and Cain's curse, to be fugitives and vagabonds, is not the worst of it neither; the restless life shall be cut off by a bloody death, "I will draw out a sword after them," which shall follow them wherever they go. "Evil pursues sinners," and the curse shall come upon them and overtake them.

5. These punishments will prove their ruin by degrees; they shall be diminished, ver. 11; their strength and glory shall grow less and less; they shall be bereaved, ver. 17, emptied of all that which was their joy and confidence. God sends these judgments on purpose to destroy them, ver. 16. The arrows are not sent (as those which Jonathan shot) for their direction, but for their destruction; for God will accomplish his fury upon them, ver. 13. The day of God's patience is over, and the ruin is remediless. Though this prophecy was to have its accomplishment now presently in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, yet, the executioners not being named here, but the criminal only, This is Jerusalem, we may well suppose that it looks farther to the final destruction of that great city by the Romans, when God made a full end of the Jewish nation, and caused his fury to rest upon them.

6. All this is ratified by the Divine authority and veracity, "I the Lord have spoken it," ver. 15; and again, ver. 17. The sentence is passed by him that is judge of heaven and earth, whose judgment is according to truth, and the judgments of his hand according to the judgments of his mouth. He hath spoken it who can do it, for with him nothing is impossible. He hath spoken it who will do it, "for he is not a man that he should lie." He hath spoken it whom we are bound to hear and heed, whose ipse dixit commands the most serious attention and submissive assent. And "they shall know that I the Lord have spoken it," ver. 13. There were those who thought it was only the prophet that spake it in his delirium; but God will make them know by the accomplishment of it that he has spoken it in his zeal. Note, Sooner or later God's word will prove itself.

CHAPTER VI.

In this chapter we have, I. A threatening of the destruction of Israel for their idolatry, and the destruction of their idols with them, ver. 1—7. II. A promise of the gracious return of a remnant of them to God, by true repentance and reformation, ver. 8—10. III. Directions given to the prophet and other the Lord's servants, to lament both the iniquities and the calamities of Israel, ver. 11—14.

AND the word of the LORD came unto me, saying,
2 Son of man, set thy face toward the mountains of Israel, and prophesy against them, 3 And say,
Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord GOD;
Thus saith the Lord GOD to the mountains, and to the hills,
To the rivers, and to the valleys;
Behold, I, even I, will bring a sword upon you,
And I will destroy your high places.
4 And your altars shall be desolate,
And your images shall be broken:
And I will cast down your slain men before your idols.
5 And I will lay the dead carcases of the children of Israel
Before their idols;
And I will scatter your bones
Round about your altars.
6 In all your dwellingplaces the cities shall be laid waste,
And the high places shall be desolate;
That your altars may be laid waste and made desolate,
And your idols may be broken and cease,
And your images may be cut down,
And your works may be abolished.
7 And the slain shall fall in the midst of you,
And ye shall know that I am the LORD.

Here, First. The prophecy is directed to the mountains of Israel, ver. 1, 2. The prophet must set his face towards them. If he could see so far off as the land of Israel, the mountains of that land would be first and farthest seen; towards them therefore he must look, and look boldly and stedfastly, as the judge looks at the prisoner, and directs his speech to him, when he passeth sentence upon him. Though the mountains of Israel be never so high, and never so strong, he must set his face against them, as having judgments to denounce that should shake their foundation. The mountains of Israel had been holy mountains, but now they had polluted them with their high places God sets his face against them, and therefore the prophet must. Israel is here put, not as sometimes for the ten tribes, but for the whole land. The mountains are called upon to hear the word of the Lord, to shame the inhabitants that would not hear. The prophets might as soon gain attention from the mountains as from that rebellious and gainsaying people, to whom they all day long stretched out their hands in vain. "Hear, O mountains, the Lord's controversy," Mic. vi. 1, 2; for God's cause will have a hearing, whether we hear it or no. But from the mountains the word of the Lord echoes to the hills, to the rivers, and to the valleys; for to them also the Lord God speaks, intimating that the whole land is concerned in what is now to be delivered, and shall be witnesses against his people, that they had fair warning given them of the judgments coming; but they would not take it. Nay, they contradicted the message, and persecuted the messengers; so that God's prophets might more safely and comfortably speak to the hills and mountains than to them.

Secondly. That which is threatened in this prophecy is the utter destruction of the idols and the idolaters, and both by the sword of war. God himself is commander-in-chief of this expedition against the mountains of Israel, it is he that saith, "Behold, I, even I, will bring a sword upon you," ver. 3; the sword of the Chaldeans is at God's command, goes where he sends it, comes where he brings it, and lights as he directs it. In the desolations of that war,

1. The idols and all their appurtenances should be destroyed. The high places which were on the tops of mountains, ver. 3, these shall be levelled and made desolate, ver. 6; they shall not be beautified, shall not be frequented as they had been. The altars on which they offered sacrifice and burnt incense to strange gods shall be broken to pieces, and laid waste. The images and idols shall be defaced, shall be broken and cease, and be cut down, and all the fine costly works about them shall be abolished, ver. 4, 6. Observe here. 1st. That war makes woful desolations, which those persons, places, and things that were esteemed most sacred, cannot escape, for the sword devours one as well as another. 2nd. That God sometimes ruins idolaters even by the hands of idolaters, for such the Chaldeans themselves were. But, as if the deity were a local thing, the greatest admirers of the gods of their own country were the greatest despisers of the gods of other countries. 3rd. It is just with God to make that a desolation which we make an idol of: for he is a jealous God, and word which our translators render "prepare," like our word "do," sometimes means to cook. The true explanation is of some importance, because it removes a common reproach of infidels.

v. 1—4. The sharp knife is by some called a sword, and the Syriac renders the first words, "And thou, son of man, take thee a sword, sharp as the razor of a barber." The word for "knife" or sword, in fact, means any sharp-edged tool, and is here to be explained of a razor. The Jews did not usually shave themselves, as the Egyptians did. In this case the process was symbolical. Balances, or scales and weights, were common in those days, both in Egypt and in Assyria, as we learn from existing monuments and relics. After the division of the hair into three principal portions, there was still a remainder, the disposal of which is described in verses 3 and 4. Of course, the hair was a symbol of Israel, and its severance and division, its partial destruction and partial dispersion, &c., typified the afflictions of Israel. The symbolic actions as a whole included time past, present, will not bear a rival. 4th. If men do not, as they ought, destroy idolatry, God will, first or last, find out a way to do it. When Josiah had destroyed the high places, altars, and images with the sword of justice, they set them up again; but God will now destroy them with the sword of war, and let us see who dares re-establish them.

2. The worshippers of idols, and all their adherents, should be destroyed likewise. As all their high places shall be laid waste, so shall all their dwelling places too, even all their cities, ver. 6. They that profane God's dwelling place, as they had done, can expect no other but that he should abandon theirs, ch. v. 11. "If any man defile the temple of God, him will God destroy," 1 Cor. iii. 17. It is here threatened that "their slain shall fall in the midst of them," ver. 7; there shall be abundance slain, even in those places which were thought most safe; but it is added as a remarkable circumstance, that they shall fall before their idols, ver. 4, that their dead carcases should be laid, and their bones scattered about their altars, ver. 5. 1st. Thus their idols should be polluted, and those places profaned by the dead bodies which they had had in veneration. If they will not "defile the covering of their graven images," God will, Isa. xxx. 22. The throwing of the carcases among them, as upon the dunghill, intimates that they were but dunghill deities. 2nd. Thus it was intimated that they were but dead things, unfit to be rivals with the living God; for the carcases of dead men, that, like them, have eyes and see not, ears and hear not, were the fittest company for them. 3rd. Thus the idols were upbraided with their inability to help their worshippers, and idolaters upbraided with the folly of trusting in them; for it should seem they fell by the sword of the enemy then when they were actually before their idols imploring their aid, and putting themselves under their protection; Sennacherib was slain by his sons then when he was worshipping in the house of his god. 4th. The sin might be read in this circumstance of the punishment; the slain men are cast before the idols, to shew that therefore they are slain, because they worshipped those idols: see Jer. viii. 2. Let the survivors observe it, and take warning not to worship images. Let them see it, and know that God is the Lord, that is, that the Lord he is God, and he alone.

8 Yet will I leave a remnant,
That ye may have some that shall escape the sword among the nations,
When ye shall be scattered through the countries.
9 And they that escape of you shall remember me
Among the nations whither they shall be carried captives,
Because I am broken
With their whorish heart, which hath departed from me,
And with their eyes, which go a whoring after their idols:
And they shall lothe themselves for the evils which they have committed
In all their abominations.
10 And they shall know that I am the LORD,
And that I have not said in vain
That I would do this evil unto them.

Judgment had hitherto triumphed, but in these verses "mercy rejoiceth against judgment." A sad end is made of this provoking people, but not a full end. The ruin seems to be universal, and "yet will I leave a remnant," a little remnant, distinguished from the body of the people, a few of many, such as are left when the rest perish; and it is God that leaves them. This intimates that they deserved to have been cut off with the rest, and had been cut off, if God had not left them: see Isa. i. 9. And it is God who by his grace works that in them which he has an eye to in sparing them. Now,

First. It is a preserved remnant, saved from the ruin which the body of the nation is involved in, ver. 8, "That ye may have some that shall escape the sword." God said, ch. v. 12, that he would draw a sword after them that were scattered, that destruction should pursue them in their dispersions. But here is mercy remembered in the midst of that wrath, and a promise that some of the Jews of the dispersion, as they were afterwards called, should escape the sword. None of those that were to fall by the sword about Jerusalem shall escape, for they trusted to Jerusalem's walls for security, and shall be made ashamed of that vain confidence; but some of them shall escape the sword among the nations, where, being deprived of all other stays, they stay themselves upon God only. They are said to have those that do escape; for they shall be the seed of another generation, out of which Jerusalem shall flourish again.

Secondly. It is a penitent remnant; ver. 9, "They that escape of you shall remember me." Note, To those whom God designs for life he will give repentance unto life. They are reprieved and escape the sword that they may have time to return to God. Note, God's patience both leaves room for repentance and is an encouragement to sinners to repent. Where God designs grace to repent he allows space to repent, yet many that have the space want the grace; many that escape the sword do not forsake the sin, as it is promised these here shall do. This remnant here marked for salvation is a type of the remnant reserved out of the body of mankind, to be monuments of mercy, which are made safe in the same way that these were, by being brought to repentance. Now observe here,

1. The occasion of their repentance, and that is a mixture of judgment and mercy: judgment that they were carried captives, but mercy that they escaped the sword in the land of their captivity. They were driven out of their own land, but not out of the land of the living, not chased out of the world, as others were, and they deserved to be. Note, The consideration of the just rebukes of providence we are under, and yet of the mercy mixed with them, should engage us to repent, that we may answer God's end in both. And true repentance shall be accepted of God, though we are brought to it by our troubles; nay, sanctified afflictions often prove means of conversion, as to Manasseh.

2. The root and principle of their repentance. "They shall remember me among the nations." They that forgat God in the land of their peace and prosperity, waxed fat and kicked, were brought to remember him in the land of their captivity. The prodigal son never bethought himself of his father's house till he was ready to perish for hunger in the far country. Their remembering God was the first step they took in returning to him. Note, Then there begins to be some hopes of sinners when they begin to think of him whom they have sinned against, and to inquire, "Where is God my maker?" Sin takes rise in forgetting God, Jer. iii. 21. Repentance takes rise from the remembrance of him, and of our obligations to him. God saith, "They shall remember me," that is, I will give them grace to do so, for otherwise they would for ever forget him; that grace shall find them out wherever they are, and by bringing God to their mind shall bring them to their right mind. The prodigal, when he remembered his father, remembered how he had sinned against heaven, and before him; so do these penitents.

1st. They remember the base affront they had put upon God by their idolatries; and this is that which an ingenuous repentance fastens upon and most sadly laments. They had departed from God to idols, had given that honour to pretended deities, the creatures of men's fancies, and the work of men's hands, which they should have given to the God of Israel. They departed from God; from his word, which they should have made their rule, from his work which they should have made their business; their hearts departed from him. The heart which he requires and insists upon, and without which bodily exercise profits nothing,—the heart which should be set upon him, and carried out towards him,—when that departs from him, it is as the treacherous elopement of a wife from her husband, or the rebellious revolt of a subject from his sovereign. "Their eyes also go after their idols;" they doated on them, and had great expectations from them. Their hearts followed their eyes in the choice of their gods, they must have gods that they could see: and then their eyes followed their hearts in the adoration of them. Now the malignity of this sin is that it is spiritual whoredom; it is a whorish heart that departs from God; and they are eyes that go a whoring after their idols. Note, Idolatry is spiritual whoredom; it is the breach of a marriage covenant with God; it is the setting of the affections upon that which is a rival with him, and the indulgence of a base lust which deceives and defiles the soul, and is a great wrong to God in his honour.

2nd. They remember what a grief this was to him, and how he resented it. They shall remember "that I am broken with their whorish heart," and their eyes that are full of this spiritual adultery. Not only angry at it, but grieved, as a husband is at the lewdness of a wife whom he dearly loved, grieved to that degree that he is broken with it; it breaks his heart to think that he should be so disingenuously dealt with. He is broken as an aged father is with the undutiful carriage of a rebellious and disobedient son, which sinks his spirits, and makes him to stoop. "Forty years long was I grieved with this generation," Ps. xcv. 10. God's measures were broken, so some; a stop was put to the current of his favours towards them; and he was even compelled to punish them. This they shall remember in the day of their repentance, and it shall affect and humble them more than any thing; not so much that their peace was broken, and their country broken, as that God was broken by their sin. Thus "they shall look on him whom they have pierced, and shall mourn," Zec. xii. 10. Note, Nothing grieves a true penitent so much as to think that his sin hath been a grief to God and to the Spirit of his grace.

3. The product and evidence of their repentance; "They shall loathe themselves for the evils which they have committed in all their abominations." Thus God gave them grace to qualify them for pardon and deliverance. Though he had been broken by their whorish heart, yet he would not quite cast them off; see Isa. lvii. 17, 18; Hos. ii. 13, 14. His goodness took occasion from their badness to appear the more illustrious. Note, 1st. True penitents see sin to be an abominable thing, that abominable thing which the Lord hates, and which makes sinners and even their services odious to him, Jer. xliv. 4; Isa. i. 11. It defiles the sinner's own conscience, and makes him, unless he be past feeling, an abomination to himself. An idol is particularly called an abomination, Isa. xliv. 19. Those gratifications, which the hearts of sinners were set upon as delectable things, the hearts of penitents are turned against as detestable things. 2nd. There are many evils committed in these abominations, many included in them, attendant on them, and flowing from them, many transgressions in one sin, Lev. xvi. 21. In their idolatries they were sometimes guilty of whoredom, as in the worship of Peor; sometimes of murder, as in the worship of Moloch: these were evils committed in their abominations. Or, it notes the great malignity there is in sin; it is an abomination that has abundance of evil in it. 3rd. Those that truly loathe sin cannot but loathe themselves because of sin; self-loathing is evermore the companion of true repentance. Penitents quarrel with themselves, and can never be reconciled to themselves till they have some ground to hope that God is reconciled to them; nay, then they shall lie down in their shame, when he is pacified towards them, Eze. xvi. 1.

4. The glory that will redound to God by their repentance; ver. 10, "They shall know that I am the Lord," that is, they shall be convinced of it by experience, and shall be ready to own it, "and that I have not said in vain that I would do this evil unto them," finding that what I have said is made good, and made to work for good, and to answer a good intention, and that it was not without just provocation that they were thus threatened and thus punished. Note, 1st. One way or other God will make sinners to know and own that he is the Lord, either by their repentance or by their ruin. 2nd. All true penitents are brought to acknowledge both the equity and the efficacy of the word of God, particularly the threatenings of the word, and to justify God in them and in the accomplishment of them.

11 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
Smite with thine hand,
And stamp with thy foot, and say,
Alas for all the evil abominations of the house of Israel:
For they shall fall by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence.
12 He that is far off shall die of the pestilence;
And he that is near shall fall by the sword;
And he that remaineth and is besieged shall die by the famine:
Thus will I accomplish my fury upon them.
13 Then shall ye know that I am the LORD,
When their slain men shall be among their idols round about their altars.
Upon every high hill, in all the tops of the mountains,
And under every green tree, and under every thick oak,
The place where they did offer sweet savour to all their and future. To time past we must refer the burning of part of the hair on the conclusion of the siege, perhaps as re-enacted in chapter iv. The actual siege of Jerusalem took place some years before. Another use of "third parts" will be found in Rev. viii. With these verses the whole of the rest of the chapter must be associated.

v. 6. The words "she hath changed my judgments into wickedness" do not convey the sense of the Hebrew text, although agreeing with the Chaldee and the Syriac. The common and well-known meaning of the verb rendered "changed" is to disobey, provoke, or rebel, as Calvin and others have observed in connection with this passage. The wickedness of Jerusalem was worse than that of the heathen, because they did not profess to obey God's law. Therefore the prophet says in the Lord's name, "She has disobeyed my judgments unto wickedness more than the nations, and my statutes more than the countries which are around her;" i.e., her disobedience involves greater wickedness than that of the very pagans.

And make the land desolate,
Yea, more desolate than the wilderness toward Diblath,
In all their habitations:
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

The same threatenings which we had before in the foregoing chapter, and in the former part of this, are here repeated, with a direction to the prophet to lament them, that those he prophesied to might be the more affected with the foresight of them.

First. He must, by his gestures in preaching, express the deep sense he had both of the iniquities and of the calamities of the house of Israel; ver. 11, "Smite with thy hand, and stamp with thy foot." Thus he must make it to appear that he was in earnest in what he said to them, that he firmly believed it, and laid it to heart; thus he must signify the just displeasure he had conceived at their sins, and the just dread he was under of the judgments coming upon them. Some would reject the use of these gestures, and call them antic and ridiculous. But God bids him use them, because they might help to enforce the word upon some, and give it the setting on. And those that know the worth of souls will be content to be laughed at by the wits, so they may but edify the weak. Two things the prophet must thus lament: 1. National sins; "Alas, for all the evil abominations of the house of Israel!" Note, The sins of sinners are the sorrows of God's faithful servants, especially "the evil abominations of the house of Israel," whose sins are more abominable, and have more evil in them, than the sins of others. Alas, what will be in the end hereof? 2. National judgments. To punish them for these abominations, "They shall fall by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence." Note, It is our duty to be affected not only with our own sins and sufferings, but with the sins and sufferings of others, and to look with compassion upon the miseries that wicked people bring upon themselves, as Christ beheld Jerusalem and wept over it.

Secondly. He must inculcate what he had said before concerning the destruction that was coming upon them.

1. They shall be run down and ruined by a variety of judgments, which shall find them out and follow them wherever they are; ver. 12, "He that is far off," and thinks himself out of danger, because out of the reach of the Chaldeans' arrows, yet shall find himself not out of the reach of God's arrows, which fly day and night, Ps. xci. 5, "he shall die of the pestilence." "He that is near" a place of strength, which he hopes will be to him a place of safety, yet "shall fall by the sword" before he can retreat. He that is so cautious as not to venture out, but remains in the city, there he shall die by the famine, the saddest death of all. Thus will God accomplish his fury, that is, do all that against them which he had purposed to do.

2. They shall read their sin in their punishment; for their "slain men shall be among their idols, round about their altars," as was threatened before, ver. 5—7. There, where they had prostrated themselves in honour of their idols, God will lay them dead to their own reproach, and the reproach of their idols. They lived among them, and shall die among them. They had offered sweet odours to their idols, but there shall their dead carcases send forth a stinking smell, as it were to atone for that misplaced incense.

3. The country shall be all laid waste, as before the cities; ver. 6, "I will make the land desolate." That fruitful, pleasant, populous country, that had been as the garden of the Lord, the glory of all lands, shall be desolate, "more desolate than the wilderness towards Diblath," ver. 14; Diblathaim, it is called, Num. xxxiii. 46; Jer. xlviii. 22; that great and terrible wilderness which is described Deu. viii. 15, wherein were fiery serpents and scorpions. The land of Canaan is at this day one of the most barren, desolate countries in the world. City and country are thus depopulated, "that the altars may be laid waste, and made desolate," ver. 6. Rather than their idolatrous altars shall be left standing, both town and country shall be laid in ruins. Sin is a desolating thing; therefore stand in awe, and sin not.

CHAPTER VII.

In this chapter the approaching ruin of the land of Israel is most particularly foretold, in affecting expressions often repeated, that if possible they might be awakened by repentance to prevent it. The prophet must tell them, I. That it will be a final ruin, a complete, utter destruction, which would make an end of them, a miserable end, ver. 1—6. II. That it is an approaching ruin, just at the door, ver. 7—10. III. That it is an unavoidable ruin, because they had by sin brought it upon themselves, ver. 10—15. IV. That their strength and wealth should be no fence against it, ver. 16—19. V. That the temple which they trusted in should itself be ruined, ver. 20—22. VI. That it should be an universal ruin, the sin that brought it having been universal, ver. 23—27.

MOREOVER the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2 Also, thou son of man, thus saith the Lord GOD unto the land of Israel;

An end, the end is come
Upon the four corners of the land.
3 Now is the end come upon thee,
And I will send mine anger upon thee,
And will judge thee according to thy ways,
And will recompense upon thee all thine abominations.
4 And mine eye shall not spare thee,
Neither will I have pity:
But I will recompense thy ways upon thee,
And thine abominations shall be in the midst of thee:
And ye shall know that I am the LORD
5 Thus saith the Lord GOD;
An evil, an only evil, behold, is come.
6 An end is come, the end is come:
It watcheth for thee; behold, it is come.
7 The morning is come unto thee, O thou that dwellest in the land:
The time is come, the day of trouble is near,
And not the sounding again of the mountains.
8 Now will I shortly pour out my fury upon thee,
And accomplish mine anger upon thee:
And I will judge thee according to thy ways,
And will recompense thee for all thine abominations.
9 And mine eye shall not spare,
Neither will I have pity:
I will recompense thee according to thy ways
And thine abominations that are in the midst of thee
And ye shall know that I am the LORD that smiteth.
10 Behold the day, behold, it is come:
The morning is gone forth;
The rod hath blossomed, pride hath budded.
11 Violence is risen up into a rod of wickedness:
None of them shall remain, nor of their multitude, nor of any of their's:
Neither shall there be wailing for them.
12 The time is come, the day draweth near:
Let not the buyer rejoice, nor the seller mourn:
For wrath is upon all the multitude thereof.
13 For the seller shall not return to that which is sold,
Although they were yet alive:
For the vision is touching the whole multitude thereof,
Which shall not return; [his life.
Neither shall any strengthen himself in the iniquity of 14 They have blown the trumpet, even to make all ready;
But none goeth to the battle:
For my wrath is upon all the multitude thereof.
15 The sword is without, and the pestilence and the famine within:
He that is in the field shall die with the sword;
And he that is in the city, famine and pestilence shall devour him.

We have here fair warning given of the destruction of the land of Israel, which was now hastening on apace. God, by the prophet, not only sends notice of it, but will have it inculcated in the same expressions, to shew that the thing is certain, that it is near, that the prophet is himself affected with it, and desires they should be so too, but finds them deaf, and stupid, and unaffected. When the town is on fire men do not seek for fine words and quaint expressions in which to give an account of it, but cry about the streets with a loud and lamentable voice, Fire, fire! so the prophet here exclaims, "An end, an end; it is come, it is come; behold, it is come!" He that hath ears to hear, let him hear.

First. "An end is come, the end is come," ver. 2; and again, ver. 6; and ver. 3, "Now is the end come upon thee." The end which all their wickedness had a tendency to, and which God had often told them it would come to at last, when by his prophet he asked them, "What will ye do in the end hereof?" The end which all the foregoing judgments had been working towards, as means to bring it about; (their ruin shall now be completed;) or, the end, that is, the period of their state, the final destruction of their nation; as the deluge was the end of all flesh, Gen. vi. 13. They had flattered themselves with hopes that they should shortly see an end of their troubles; Yea, saith God, an end is come, but a miserable one, not the expected end which is promised to the pious remnant among them, Jer. xxix. 11. It is the end, that end which you have been so often warned of, that last end which Moses wished you to consider, Deu. xxxii. 29, and which, because "Jerusalem remembered not, therefore she came down wonderfully," Lam. i. 9; this end was long in coming, but now it is come. Though the ruin of sinners comes slowly, it comes surely; "It is come, it watcheth for thee," ready to receive thee. This perhaps looks farther to the last destruction of that nation by the Romans, which that by the Chaldeans was an earnest of; and still farther to the final destruction of the world of the ungodly. "The end of all things is at hand," and Jerusalem's last end was a type of the end of the world, Mat. xxiv. 3. O that we could all see that end of time and days very near, and the end of our own time and days much nearer, that we may secure a happy lot in the end of the days, Dan. xii. 13. This end comes upon the four corners of the land. The ruin, as it shall be final, so it shall be total; no part of the land shall escape, no, not that which lies most remote. Such will the destruction of the world be. All these things shall be dissolved; such will the destruction of sinners be, none can avoid it. Oh, that the wickedness of the wicked might come to an end before it brings them to an end.

Secondly. "An evil, an only evil, behold, is come," ver. 5. Sin is an evil, an only evil, an evil that has no good in it; it is the worst of evils. But this is spoken of the evil of trouble; it is an evil, one evil, and that one shall suffice to effect and complete the ruin of the nation; there needs no more to do its business. This one shall make an utter end; affliction needs not rise up a second time, Nah. i. 9. It is an evil without precedent or parallel, an evil that stands alone; you cannot produce such another instance. It is to the impenitent an evil, an only evil; it hardens their hearts and irritates their corruptions; whereas there were those to whom it was sanctified by the grace of God, and made a means of much good: they were sent into Babylon for their good, Jer. xxiv. 5. The wicked have the dregs of that cup to drink, which to the righteous is full of mixtures of mercy, Ps. lxxv. 8; the same affliction is to us either a half evil or an only evil, according as we carry ourselves under it and make use of it. But when an end, the end, is come upon the wicked world,

v. 7. The words "because ye multiplied" are objected to. Some say we should have "because your multitude was more," &c.; others, "because your tumult was more," &c.; others, "because ye were more tumultuous," &c. Ancient as well as modern authorities differ as to the sense, but we prefer that of being tumultuous and restless.

v. 11. For "diminish" others render "break," "extirpate," "cut down," "remove," "withdraw," &c. Perhaps the word "degrade" conveys the correct idea.

vi. 3—6. The emblems of idolatry were to be destroyed, as well as the idolaters. For "images," in verse 4, the margin has "sun-images," which is better. So in verse 6. The word rendered "idols" may include more than what we understand by the term, and extend to the sanctuaries and shrines of idolatry. Sometimes, however, idols only seem to be intended, as in verse 13. The common ruin of the idols and their worshippers showed the vanity of the one and the sin of the other.

then an evil, an only evil, comes upon it, and not till then. The sorest of temporal judgments have their allays, but the torments of the damned are an evil, an only evil.

Thirdly. "The time is come," the set time, for the inflicting of this only evil, and the making of this full end; for to all God's purposes there is a time, a proper time, and that prefixed, in which the purpose shall have its accomplishment. Particularly the time of reckoning with wicked people, and rendering to them according to their deserts, is fixed; the "day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God;" and he sees, whether we see it or no, that his day is coming. This they are here told of again and again, ver. 10. Behold the day that has lingered so long is come at last; "Behold it is come: the time is come, the day draws near, the day of trouble is near," ver. 7, 12. Though threatened judgments may be long deferred, yet they shall not be dropped; the time for executing them will come. Though God's patience may put them off, nothing but man's sincere repentance and reformation will put them by. "The morning is come upon thee," ver. 7; and again, ver. 10, "the morning is gone forth." The day of trouble dawns, the day of destruction is already begun. The morning discovers that which was hidden; they thought their secret sins should never come to light, but now they will be brought to light. They used to try and execute malefactors in the morning; and such a morning of judgment and execution is now coming upon them, a day of trouble to sinners, "the year of their visitation." See how stupid these people were, that, though the day of their destruction was already begun, yet they were not aware of it, but must be thus told of it again and again. "The day of trouble," real trouble, is near, "and not the sounding again of the mountains;" that is, not a mere echo or report of troubles, as they were willing to think it was, nothing but a groundless surmise, as if the men that came against them were but the shadow of the mountains, as Zebul suggested to Gaal, Jud. ix. 36, and the intelligence they received were but an empty sound, reverberated from the mountains. No, the trouble is not a fancy, and so you will soon find.

Fourthly. All this comes from God's wrath, not allayed, as sometimes it has been with mixtures of mercy. This is the fountain from which all these calamities flow, and this is the wormwood and the gall, in the affliction and the misery, which makes it bitter indeed; ver. 3, "I will send mine anger upon thee." Observe, God is Lord of his anger; it doth not break out but when he pleaseth, nor fasten upon any but as he directs it and gives it commission. The expression riseth higher, ver. 8, "Now will I shortly pour out my fury upon thee" in full vials, "and accomplish mine anger," all the purposes and all the products of it upon thee. This wrath does not single out here and there one to be made examples, but it is upon all the multitude thereof, ver. 12, 14; the whole body of the nation is become a vessel of wrath, fitted for destruction. God doth sometimes in wrath remember mercy, but now he saith, "Mine eye shall not spare thee, neither will I have pity," ver. 4; and again, ver. 9. They shall have judgment without mercy that made light of mercy when it was offered them.

Fifthly. All this is the just punishment of their sins, and it is what they have by their own folly brought upon themselves. This is much insisted on here, that they might be brought to justify God in all he had brought upon them. God never sends his anger but in wisdom and justice; and therefore it follows, "I will judge thee according to thy ways," ver. 3. I will examine what thy ways have been, compare them with the law, and then deal with thee according to the merit of them, and recompense them to thee, ver. 4. Note, In the heaviest judgments God inflicts upon sinners, he doth but recompense their own ways upon them; they are beaten with their own rod. And when God comes to reckon with a sinful people, he will bring every provocation to account; "I will recompense upon thee all thine abominations," ver. 3; and now "thine iniquity shall be found to be hateful," Ps. xxxvi. 2; and "thine abominations shall be in the midst of thee," ver. 4; that is, thy secret wickedness shall now be brought to light, and that shall appear to have been in the midst of thee which before was not suspected, and thy sin shall now become an abomination to thyself. So the abomination of iniquity will be when it comes to be an abomination of desolation, Mat. xxiv. 15. Or, Thine abominations, that is, the punishments of them, shall be in the midst of thee; that is, they shall reach to thy heart; see Jer. iv. 18. Or, Therefore, God will not spare nor have pity, because even then when he is recompensing their ways upon them, yet in their distress they trespass yet more; their abominations are still in the midst of them, indulged and harboured in their hearts. It is repeated again, ver. 8, 9, "I will judge thee, I will recompense thee."

Two sins are particularly instanced in as provoking God to bring these judgments upon them,—pride and oppression. 1. God will humble them by his judgments, for they have magnified themselves. The rod of affliction hath blossomed, but it was pride that budded, ver. 10. What buds in sin will blossom in some judgment or other. The pride of Judah and Jerusalem appeared among all orders and degrees of men, as buds upon the tree in spring. 2. Their enemies shall deal hardly with them, for they have dealt hardly with one another; ver. 11, "Violence is risen up into a rod of wickedness," that is, their injuriousness to one another is protected and patronised by the power of the magistrate. The rod of government was become a rod of wickedness, to such a degree of impudence was violence risen up: "I saw the place of judgment that wickedness was there," Eccl. iii. 16; Isa. v. 7. Whatever are the fruits of God's judgments, it is certain our sin is the root of them.

Sixthly. There is no escape from these judgments, nor fence against them; for they shall be universal, and shall bear down all before them without remedy.

1. Death in its various shapes shall ride triumphantly both in town and country, both within the city and without it, ver. 15. Men shall be safe no where, for "he that is in the field shall die by the sword;" every field shall be to them a field of battle; and "he that is in the city," though it be a holy city, yet it shall not be his protection, but "famine and pestilence shall devour him." Sin had abounded both in city and country; Ibacos intra muros peccatur et extra,—'Trojans and Greeks offend alike;' and therefore in both desolations are made.

2. None of those that are marked for death shall escape. There shall none of them remain,—none of those proud oppressors that did violence to their poor neighbours with the rod of wickedness; none of them shall be left, but they shall be all swept away by the desolation that is coming, ver. 11. None of their multitude, that is, of the rabble whom they set on to do mischief, and to countenance them in doing it,—to cry, Crucify, crucify, such as they were resolved to run down; "None of them shall remain, nor any of theirs." Their families shall all be destroyed, and neither root nor branch left them. This multitude, this mob, Divine vengeance will in a particular manner fasten upon, for "wrath is upon all the multitude thereof," ver. 12, 14; and "the vision was touching the whole multitude thereof," ver. 3, the bulk of the common people. The judgments coming shall carry them away by wholesale, and they shall neither secure themselves nor their masters, whose crew ares and tools they were. God's judgments, when they come with commission, cannot be overpowered by multitudes. "Though hand join in hand, yet shall not the wicked go unpunished."

3. Those that fall shall not be lamented; ver. 11, "There shall be no wailing for them," for there shall be none left to bewail them, but such as are hastening apace after them. And the times shall be so bad that men shall rather congratulate than condole the death of their friends, as reckoning those happy that are taken away from seeing these desolations, and sharing in them, Jer. xvi. 4, 5.

4. They shall not be able to make any resistance. The decree is gone forth, and the vision concerning them shall not return, ver. 13. God will not recall it, and they cannot defeat it; and therefore it shall not return re infecta,—'without having accomplished any thing,' but shall accomplish that for which he sends it. God's word will take place, and then, 1st. Particular persons cannot make their part good against God. No man shall "strengthen himself in the iniquity of his life," that is, it will be to no purpose for sinners to set God and his judgments at defiance, as they used to do; none ever hardened his heart against God and prospered. Those that strengthen themselves in their wickedness will be found not only to weaken but to ruin themselves, Ps. lii. 7. 2. The multitude cannot resist the torrent of these judgments, nor make head against them; ver. 14, "They have blown the trumpet" to call their soldiers together, and to animate and encourage those whom they have got together; and thus they think "to make all ready," but all in vain; none list themselves, and those that do have not courage to face the enemy. Note, If God be against us, none can be for us to do us any service.

5. They shall have no hope of the return of their prosperity, with which to support themselves in their adversity. They shall have given up all for gone, and therefore "let not the buyer rejoice" that he is increasing his estate, and is become a purchaser; neither "let the seller mourn" that he is lessening his estate, and is become a bankrupt, ver. 11. See the vanity of the things of this world, and how worthless they are, that in a time of trouble, when we have most need of them, we may, perhaps, make least account of them. They that have sold are the more easy, having the less to lose, and they that have bought have but increased their own cares and fears. Because "The fashion of this world passeth away, let those that buy be as though they possessed not," because they know not how soon they may be dispossessed, 1 Cor. vii. 29. It is added, ver. 12, "The seller shall not return" at the year of jubilee "to that which is sold," according to the law, though he should escape the sword and pestilence, and live till that year comes; for no inheritances shall be enjoyed here till the seventy years be accomplished, and then men shall return to their possessions, shall claim and have their own again, in the belief of which Jeremiah about this time bought his uncle's field; yet, according to the charge, the buyer did not rejoice, but complain, Jer. xxxii. 25.

6. God will be glorified in all. "Ye shall know that I am the Lord," ver. 4; that "I am the Lord that smiteth," ver. 9. You look at second causes, and think it is Nebuchadnezzar that smites you, but you shall be made to know he is but the staff; it is the hand of the Lord that smiteth you, and who knows the weight of his hand? Those who would not know it was the Lord that did them good shall be made to know it is the Lord that smiteth them; for, one way or other, he will be owned.

16 But they that escape of them shall escape,
And shall be on the mountains like doves of the valleys,
All of them mourning, every one for his iniquity
17 All hands shall be feeble,
And all knees shall be weak as water.
18 They shall also gird themselves with sackcloth,
And horror shall cover them;
And shame shall be upon all faces,
And baldness upon all their heads.
19 They shall cast their silver in the streets,
And their gold shall be removed:
Their silver and their gold shall not be able to deliver them
In the day of the wrath of the LORD:
They shall not satisfy their souls, neither fill their bowels:
Because it is the stumblingblock of their iniquity
20 As for the beauty of his ornament, he set it in majesty:
But they made the images of their abominations
And of their detestable things therein:
Therefore have I set it far from them.
21 And I will give it into the hands of the strangers for a prey,
And to the wicked of the earth for a spoil;
And they shall pollute it.
22 My face will I turn also from them,
And they shall pollute my secret place;
For the robbers shall enter into it, and defile it.

We have attended the fate of those that are cut off, and are now to attend the flight of those that have an opportunity of outrunning the danger. Some of them shall escape, ver. 16; but what the better? as good die once as in a miserable life die a thousand deaths, and escape only like Cain to be fugitives and vagabonds, and afraid of being slain by every one they meet; so shall these here be.

First. They shall have no comfort or satisfaction in their own minds, but be in continual anguish and terror; for wherever they go they carry about with them guilty consciences, which make them a burthen to themselves.

1. They shall be always solitary, and under prevailing melancholy. They shall not be in the cities, or places of concourse, but all alone upon the mountains, not caring for society, but shy of it, as being ashamed of the low circumstances to which they are reduced.

2. They shall be always sorrowful. Those have reason to be so that are under the tokens of God's displeasure; and God can make those so that have been most jovial, and have set sorrow at defiance. They that, when time was, thought themselves as the lions of the mountains, so daring were they, now become as the doves of the valleys, so sneaking are they, and so dispirited; ready to flee when none pursues, and to tremble at the shaking of a leaf. They

vi. 14. Some, with Dr. Gill, think Diblath was in Moab, or on its borders. The true form of the name is Diblah, and it has been held that originally the text had Riblah, which was in the north of Palestine. Certainly d and r were very much alike in the ancient alphabets.

vii. 5. The Syriac here has "evil for evil," i.e., one evil exchanged for or succeeded by another. Newcome renders "evil after evil." Others take it that one evil only is meant, but such an evil as shall comprise all other calamities. Fairbairn suggests "a singular" or remarkable evil.

vii. 7. For "morning" Fürst gives "a change of fortune, fate, mishap;" and Gesenius understands a vicissitude or turn of fortune's wheel. Sundry other shades of meaning have been proposed for the Hebrew word, but that of early morning, the opening of the day of trouble, is as good as any. The last words, "not the sounding again (or echo) of the mountains," are also doubtful. The Syriac omits are all of them mourning, not with a godly sorrow, but with the sorrow of the world, which worketh death, every one for his iniquity; that is, for those calamities which they now see their iniquity has brought upon them; not only the iniquity of the land, but their own; they shall then be brought to acknowledge what they have each of them contributed to the national guilt. Note, Sooner or later sin will have sorrow, of one kind or other; and those that will not repent of their iniquity may justly be left to pine away in it; that will not mourn for it as it is an offence to God, shall be made to mourn for it as it is a shame and ruin to themselves; to "mourn at the last when the flesh and the body are consumed, and to say, How have I hated instruction," Pr. v. 11.

3. They shall be deprived of all their strength of body and mind; ver. 17, "All hands shall be feeble," so that they shall not be able to fight, or defend themselves; and "all knees shall be weak as water," so that they shall be able neither to flee nor to stand their ground. They shall feel a universal colliquation; their knees shall flow as water, so that they must fall of course. Note, It is folly for the strong man to glory in his strength, for God can soon weaken it.

4. They shall be deprived of all their hopes, and shall abandon themselves to despair, ver. 18. They shall have nothing to hold up their spirits with, their aspects shall shew what are their prospects,—all dreadful; for "They shall gird themselves with sackcloth," as having no expectation ever to wear better clothing. "Horror shall cover them, and shame, and baldness," all the expressions of a desperate sorrow, Isa. xvii. 11. Note, Those who will not be kept from sin by fear and shame shall by fear and shame be punished for it; such is the confusion that sin will end in.

Secondly. They shall have no benefit by their wealth and riches, but shall be perfectly sick of them, ver. 19. They that were reduced to this distress were such as had had abundance of silver and gold, money, and plate, and jewels, and other valuable goods, from which they promised themselves a great deal of advantage in times of public trouble. They thought it would be their strong city, that with it they could bribe enemies, and buy friends; that it would be the ransom of their lives, and that they could never want bread as long as they had money, and that money would answer all things. But see how it proved:

1. It had been a great temptation to them in the day of their prosperity; they set their affections upon it, and put their confidence in it. By their eager pursuit of it they were drawn into sin, and by their plentiful enjoyment of it they were hardened in sin, and thus it was the stumblingblock of their iniquity, it occasioned their falling into sin, and obstructed their return to God. Note, There are many whose wealth is their snare and ruin. The gaining of the world is the losing of their souls; it makes them proud, secure, covetous, oppressive, voluptuous; and that which, if well used, might have been the servant of their piety, being abused, becomes the stumblingblock of their iniquity.

2. It was no relief to them now in the day of their adversity; for, 1st. Their gold and silver could not protect them from the judgments of God; they "shall not be able to deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord." They shall not serve to atone his justice, or turn away his wrath, nor to screen them from the judgments he is bringing upon them. Note, "Riches profit not in the day of wrath," Pr. xi. 4. They neither set them so high as that God's judgments cannot reach them, nor make them so strong as that they cannot conquer them. There is a day of wrath coming, when it will appear that men's wealth is utterly unable to deliver them, or do them any service. What the better was the rich man for his full barns, when his soul was required of him? Or that other rich man for his purple, and scarlet, and sumptuous fare, when in hell he could not procure a drop of water to cool his tongue? Money is no defence against the arrests of death, nor any alleviation to the miseries of the damned. 2nd. Their gold and silver could not give them any content under their calamities. First. They could not fill their bowels. When there was no bread left in the city, none to be had for love or money, their silver and gold could not satisfy their hunger, nor serve to make one meal's meat for them. Note, We could better be without mines of gold than fields of corn. The products of the earth, which may easily be gathered from the surface of it, are much greater blessings to mankind than its treasures, which are with so much difficulty and hazard digged out of its bowels. If God give us daily bread we have reason to be thankful, and no reason to complain, though silver and gold we have none. Secondly. Much less could they satisfy their souls, or yield them any inward comfort. Note, The wealth of this world has not that in it that will answer the desires of the soul, or be any satisfaction to it in a day of distress. "He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver," much less he that loseth it. 3rd. Their gold and silver shall be thrown into the streets; either by the hands of the enemy, who shall have more spoil than they care for, or can carry away. Silver shall be nothing accounted of, they shall cast that in the streets; but the gold, which is more valuable, shall be removed and brought to Babylon. Or, they themselves shall throw away their silver and gold, either because it would be an incumbrance to them, and retard their flight, or because it would expose them, and be a temptation to the enemy to cut their throats for their money; or in indignation at it, because they found that, after all the care and pains they had taken to scrape it together, and hoard it up, it would stand them in no stead, but do them a mischief rather. Note, "The world passeth away, and the lust thereof," 1 Jno. ii. 17. The time may come when worldly men will be as weary of their wealth as now they are wedded to it, when those will fare best that have least.

Thirdly. God's temple shall stand them in no stead, ver. 20—22. This they had prided themselves in, and promised themselves security from, Jer. vii. 4; Mic. iii. 11; but this confidence of theirs shall fail them. Observe, 1. The great honour God had done to that people in setting up his sanctuary among them; ver. 20, "As for the beauty of his ornament," that holy and beautiful house where they and their fathers praised God, Isa. lxiv. 11, which was therefore beautiful, because holy, (it was called the beauty of holiness, and that is the beauty of his ornament; it was also adorned with gold and gifts;) as for this, he set it in majesty; every thing was contrived to make it magnificent, that it might help to make the people of Israel the more illustrious among their neighbours. "He built his sanctuary like high palaces," Ps. lxxviii. 69. It was a glorious high throne from the beginning, Jer. xvii. 12. But, 2. Here is the great dishonour they had done to God in profaning his sanctuary. They made the images of their counterfeit deities, which they set up in a rivalship with God, and which are here called their abominations and their detestable things; for so they were to God, and so they should have been to them; and these they set up in God's temple, than which a greater affront could not be put upon him. And, therefore, 3. It is here threatened that they shall be deprived of the temple, and it shall be no succour to them; "Therefore have I set it far from them," that is, sent them far from it, so that it is out of the reach of their services, and they out of the reach of its influences. Note, God's ordinances, and the privileges of a profession of religion, will justly be taken away from those that despise and profane them. Nay, they shall not only be kept at a distance from the temple, but the temple shall itself be involved in the common desolation, ver. 21. The Chaldeans that are strangers, and therefore have no veneration for it, that are the wicked of the earth, and therefore have an antipathy to it, shall have it for a prey, and for a spoil, all the ornaments an treasures of it shall fall into their hands, who will make no difference between that and other plunder. This was a grief to the saints in Zion, who complained of nothing so much as of that which "the enemies did wickedly in the sanctuary," Ps. lxxiv. 3. But it was the punishment of the sinners in Zion, who, by profaning the temple with strange gods, provoked God to suffer it to be profaned by strange nations, and to turn his face from them that did it, as if he had not seen them and their crimes; and from them that deprecated it, as not regarding them and their prayers. Let the soldiers do as they will,—let them enter into the secret place, into the holy of holies, as robbers,—let them strip it, let them pollute it, its defence is departed, and then farewell all its glory. Note, Those are unworthy to be honoured with the form of godliness that will not be governed by the power of godliness.

23 Make a chain:
For the land is full of bloody crimes,
And the city is full of violence.
24 Wherefore I will bring the worst of the heathen,
And they shall possess their houses:
I will also make the pomp of the strong to cease;
And their holy places shall be defiled.
25 Destruction cometh
And they shall seek peace, and there shall be none.
26 Mischief shall come upon mischief, and rumour shall be upon rumour;
Then shall they seek a vision of the prophet;
But the law shall perish from the priest,
And counsel from the ancients.
27 The king shall mourn,
And the prince shall be clothed with desolation,
And the hands of the people of the land shall be troubled:
I will do unto them after their way,
And according to their deserts will I judge them;
And they shall know that I am the LORD.

Here is, First. The prisoner arraigned. "Make a chain," in which to drag the criminal to the bar, and set him before the tribunal of Divine justice; let him stand in fetters,—as a notorious malefactor,—stand pinioned to receive his doom. Note, Those that break the bands of God's law asunder, and cast away those cords from them, will find themselves bound, and held by the chains of his judgments, which they cannot break or cast from them. The chain signified the siege of Jerusalem, or the slavery of those that were carried into captivity, or that they were all bound over to the righteous judgment of God,—reserved in chains.

Secondly. The indictment drawn up against the prisoner. "The land is full of bloody crimes," full of 'the judgments of blood,' so the word is; that is, of the guilt of blood which they had shed under colour of justice, and by forms of law, with the solemnity of a judgment. The innocent blood which Manasseh shed, it is probable thus shed by the judgment of blood, was the measure-filling sin of Jerusalem, 2 Kin. xxiv. 4; or it is full of such crimes as by the law were to be punished with death, the judgment of blood. Idolatry, blasphemy, witchcraft, sodomy, and the like, were bloody crimes, for which particular sinners were to die; and therefore, when they were become national, there was no remedy, but the nation must be cut off. Note, Bloody crimes will be punished with bloody judgments. The city, the city of David, the holy city, that should have been the pattern of righteousness, the protector of it, and the punisher of wrong, is now full of violence. The rulers of that city having greater power and reputation, are greater oppressors than any other. This was sadly to be lamented. "How is the faithful city become a harlot!"

Thirdly. Judgment given upon this indictment. God will reckon with them not only for the profaning of his sanctuary, but for the perverting of justice between man and man; for, as "holiness becomes his house," so the "righteous Lord loveth righteousness," and is the avenger of unrighteousness. Now the judgment given is,

1. That since they had walked in the way of the heathen, and done worse than they, God would "bring the worst of the heathen upon them," to destroy them and lay them waste, the most barbarous and outrageous, that have the least compassion to mankind, and the greatest antipathy to the Jews. Note, Of the heathen some are worse than other, and God sometimes picks out the worst to be a scourge to his own people, because he intends them for the fire when the work is done.

2. That since they had filled their houses with goods unjustly got, and used their pomp and power for the crushing and oppressing of the weak, God would give their houses to be possessed, and all the furniture of them to be enjoyed, by strangers, and "make the pomp of the strong to cease," so that their great men should not dazzle the eyes of the weak-sighted with their pomp, nor with their might at any time prevail against right, as they had done.

3. That since they had "defiled the holy places" with their idolatries, God would defile them with his judgments; since they had set up the images of other gods in the temple, God would remove thence the tokens of the presence of their own God. When the holy places are deserted by their God, they will soon be defiled by their enemies.

4. Since they had followed one sin with another, God would pursue them with one judgment upon another. "Destruction cometh," utter destruction, ver. 25, for there shall come mischief upon mischief to ruin you, and rumour upon rumour to frighten you, like the waves in a storm, one upon the neck of another. Note, Sinners that are marked for ruin shall be prosecuted to it, for God will overcome when he judgeth.

5. Since they had disappointed God's expectations from them, he would disappoint their expectations from him. For, 1st. They shall not have the "deliverance out of the troubles" that they expect. They shall "see peace," that is, they shall desire it and pray for it, they shall endeavour it and expect it, but "there shall be none;" their attempts both to court their enemies and to conquer them shall be in vain, and their troubles shall grow worse and worse. 2nd. They shall not have the direction in the trouble that they expect; ver. 26, "They shall seek a vision of the prophets," shall desire, for their support under their troubles, to be assured of a happy issue out of them. They did not them. Gesenius understands "rejoicing;" so Fürst. Some explain "no brightness on the mountains;" but "there is no rejoicing on the mountains" gives a good and probable sense.

vii. 11. This verse is obscure after the first clause: "Violence hath risen for a rod of wickedness." The next Fürst explains "nothing (remains) of the tumult, nor of their multitude, nor of their fulness," and he thinks the words with which the verse ends mean that there is no meeting of people together i.e., no common intercourse. Several other interpretations have been suggested for almost every word in the passage.

vii. 13. Here also are some difficulties, but we take the sense to be that the seller will not return to or recover what has been parted with or sold, though he should be alive when the year of jubilee comes; because the prophecy relates to all the wealth of the land, he will not return, and no man will by his iniquity maintain his life. The last words Fairbairn renders, "And no one by his iniquity shall in-desire a vision to reprove them for their sin, or to warn them of danger, but to promise them deliverance,—such messages they longed to hear; but "the law shall perish from the priest," he shall have no words either of counsel or comfort to say to them. They would not hear what God had to say to them by way of conviction, and therefore he has nothing to say to them by way of encouragement. Counsel shall "perish from the ancients;" the elders of the people, that should advise them what to do in this difficult juncture, shall be infatuated, and at their wit's end. It is bad with a people when those that should be their counsellors know not how to consider within themselves, consult with one another, or counsel them.

6. Since they had animated and encouraged one another to sin, God would dispirit and dishearten them all, so that they should not be able to make head against the judgments of God that were breaking in upon them. All orders and degrees of men shall lie down by consent under the load, ver. 27. The king that should inspire life into them, and the prince that should lead them on to attack the enemy, they shall mourn, and be clothed with desolation; their heads and hearts shall fail, their politics and their courage, and then no wonder if the hands of the people of the land that should fight for them be troubled, none of the men of might shall find their hands. What can men contrive or do for themselves when God is departed from them, and appears against them? All must needs be in tears, all in trouble, when God comes to "judge them according to their deserts," and so make them know, to their cost, that he is the Lord, the God to whom vengeance belongs.

CHAPTER VIII.

God, having given the prophet a clear foresight of the people's miseries that were hastening on, here gives him a clear insight into the people's wickedness, by which God was provoked to bring those miseries upon them; that he might justify God in all his judgments, might the more particularly reprove the sins of the people, and with the more satisfaction foretell their ruin. Here God in vision brings him to Jerusalem, to shew him the sins that were committed there, though God had begun to contend with them, ver. 1—4, and there he sees, I. The image of jealousy set up at the gate of the altar, ver. 5, 6. II. The elders of Israel worshipping all manner of images in a secret chamber, ver. 7—12. III. The women weeping for Tammuz. ver. 13, 14. IV. The men worshipping the sun, ver. 15, 16. And then appeals to him, whether such a provoking people should have any pity shewed them, ver. 17, 18.

AND it came to pass in the sixth year, in the sixth month, in the fifth day of the month, as I sat in mine house, and the elders of Judah sat before me, that the hand of the Lord GOD fell there upon me. 2 Then I beheld, and lo a likeness as the appearance of fire: from the appearance of his loins even downward, fire; and from his loins even upward, as the appearance of brightness, as the colour of amber. 3 And he put forth the form of an hand, and took me by a lock of mine head; and the spirit lifted me up between the earth and the heaven, and brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem, to the door of the inner gate that looketh toward the north; where was the seat of the image of jealousy, which provoketh to jealousy. 4 And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel was there, according to the vision that I saw in the plain. 5 Then said he unto me, Son of man, lift up thine eyes now the way toward the north. So I lifted up mine eyes the way toward the north, and behold northward at the gate of the altar this image of jealousy in the entry. 6 He said furthermore unto me, Son of man, seest thou what they do? even the great abominations that the house of Israel committeth here, that I should go far off from my sanctuary? but turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations.

Ezekiel was now in Babylon, but the messages of wrath he had delivered in the foregoing chapters concerned Jerusalem, for in the peace or trouble thereof the captives looked upon themselves to have peace or trouble; and therefore here he has a vision of what was done at Jerusalem, and this vision is continued to the close of the eleventh chapter.

First. Here is the date of this vision. The first vision he had was in the fifth year of the captivity, in the fourth month, and the fifth day of the month, ch. i. 1. This was just fourteen months after. Perhaps it was after he had lain three hundred and ninety days on his left side to bear the iniquity of Israel, and before he began the forty days on his right side to bear that of Judah, for now he was sitting in his house, not lying. Note, God keeps a particular account of the messages he sends to us, because he will shortly call us to account about them.

Secondly. The opportunity is taken notice of as well as the time.

1. The prophet was himself sitting in his house, in a sedate, composed frame, deep, perhaps, in contemplation. Note, The more we retreat from the world, and retire into our own hearts, the better frame we are in for communion with God; they that sit down to consider what they have learned shall be taught more. Or, he sat in his house ready to preach to the company that resorted to him, but waiting for instructions what to say. God will communicate more knowledge to those who are communicative of what they do know.

2. The elders of Judah, that were now in captivity with him, sat before him. It is probable it was on the sabbath day, and that it was usual for them to attend on the prophet every sabbath day, both to hear the word from him and to join with him in prayer and praise; and how could they spend the sabbath better, now they had neither temple nor synagogue, priest nor altar? It was a great mercy that they had opportunity to spend it so well, as the good people in Elisha's time, 2 Kin. iv. 23. But some think it was on some extraordinary occasion that they attended him to inquire of the Lord, and sat down at his feet to hear his word. Observe here, 1st. When the law was perished from the priests at Jerusalem, whose lips should keep knowledge, ch. vii. 26, they in Babylon had a prophet to consult. God is not tied to places or persons. 2nd. Now the elders of Judah were in captivity, they paid more respect to God's prophets, and his word in their mouth, than they did when they lived in peace in their own land. When God brings men into the cords of affliction, then he opens their ear to discipline, Job xxxvi. 8, 10; Ps. cxli. 6. Those that despised vision in the valley of vision prized it now the word of the Lord was precious, and there was no open vision. 3rd. When our teachers are driven into corners, and are forced to preach in private houses, we must diligently attend them there. A minister's house should be a church for all his neighbours. St. Paul preached in his own hired house at Rome, and God owned him there, and no man forbade him.

Thirdly. The Divine influence and impression that the prophet was now under: "The hand of the Lord fell there upon me." God's hand took hold of him, and arrested him, as it were, to employ him in this vision, but at the same time supported him to bear it.

Fourthly. The vision that the prophet saw, ver. 2. He beheld a likeness, of a man we may suppose, for that was the likeness he saw before; but it was all brightness above the girdle, and all fire below, fire and flame. This agrees with the description we had before of the apparition he saw, ch. i. 27, and it is likely it was the same person, the man Christ Jesus. It is likely the elders that sat with him, as the men that journeyed with Paul, saw a light and were afraid, and this happy sight they gained by attending the prophet in a private meeting; but they had no distinct view of him that spake to him, Acts xxii. 9.

Fifthly. The prophet's remove in vision to Jerusalem. The apparition he saw "put forth the form of a hand," which took him by a lock of his head; and the Spirit was that hand which was put forth, for the Spirit of God is called the finger of God. Or, the Spirit within him lifted him up, so that he was borne up and carried on by an internal principle, not an external violence. A faithful, ready servant of God will be drawn by a hair, by the least intimation of the Divine will, to his duty, for he has that within him which inclines him to a compliance with it, Ps. xxvii. 8. He was miraculously lifted up between heaven and earth, as if he were to fly away upon eagles' wings. This, it is probable, so Grotius thinks, the elders that sat with him saw; they were witnesses of the hand taking him by the lock of hair and lifting him up, and then, perhaps, laying him down again in a trance or extacy, while he had the following visions; whether in the body or out of the body, we may suppose he could not tell, no more than Paul in a like case; much less can we. Note, Those are best prepared for communion with God, and the communications of Divine light, that by Divine grace are raised up above the earth and the things of it, to be out of their attractive force.

But, being lifted up towards heaven, he was carried in vision to Jerusalem, and to God's sanctuary there; for those that would go to heaven must take that in their way. The Spirit represented to his mind the city and temple as plainly as if he had been there in person. O that by faith we could thus enter into the Jerusalem, the holy city above, and see the things that are invisible!

Sixthly. The discoveries that were made to him there.

1. There he saw the glory of God; ver. 4, "Behold, the glory of the God of Israel was there," the same appearance of the living creatures, and the wheels, and the throne he had seen ch. i. Note, God's servants, wherever they are and whithersoever they go, ought to carry about with them a believing regard to the glory of God, and to set that always before them; and those that have seen "God's power and glory in the sanctuary" should desire to see it again as they have seen it, Ps. lxiii. 2. Ezekiel has this repeated vision of the glory of God, both to give credit to and to put honour upon the following discoveries. But it seems to have a farther intention here; it was to aggravate this sin of Israel in changing their own God, the God of Israel, who is a God of so much glory as here he appears to be, for dunghill gods, scandalous gods, false gods, and indeed no gods. Note, The more glorious we see God to be, the more odious we shall see sin to be, especially idolatry, which turns his truth into a lie, his glory into shame. It was also to aggravate their approaching misery, when this glory of the Lord shall remove from them, ch. xi. 23, and leave the house and city desolate.

2. There he saw the reproach of Israel, and that was the image of jealousy, set northward, at the gate of the altar, ver. 3, 5. What image this was is uncertain; probably, an image of Baal, or of the grove, which Manasseh made and set in the temple, 2 Kin. xxi. 7; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 3; which Josiah removed, but his successors it seems replaced there, as probably they did the chariots of the sun, which he found "at the entering in of the house of the Lord," 2 Kin. xxxiii. 11, and this is here said to be in the entry. But the prophet, instead of telling us what image it was, which might gratify our curiosity, tells us it was "the image of jealousy," to convince our consciences that, whatever image it was, it was in the highest degree offensive to God, and provoked him to jealousy. He resented it as a husband would resent the whoredoms of his wife, and would certainly revenge it, for "God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth," Na. i. 2. The very setting up of this image in the house of the Lord was enough to provoke him to jealousy, for it is in the matters of his worship that we are particularly told, "I the Lord thy God am a jealous God." They that placed this image at "the door of the inner gate," where the people assembled, called the "gate of the altar," ver. 5, thereby plainly intended, 1st. To affront God, to provoke him to his face, by advancing an idol to be a rival with him for the adorations of his people, in contempt of his law, and in defiance of his justice. 2nd. To debauch the people, and pick them up as they were entering into the courts of the Lord's house to bring their offerings to him, and to tempt them to offer them to this image. Like the adulteress Solomon describes, that "sitteth at the door of her house, to call passengers who go right on their ways, Whoso is simple, let him turn in hither," Pr. ix. 14—16. With good reason therefore is this called the "image of jealousy."

We may well imagine what a surprise and what a grief it was to Ezekiel to see this image in the house of God, when he was in hopes that the judgments they were under had by this time wrought some reformation among them; but there is more wickedness in the world, in the church, than good men think there is. And now, 1st. God appeals to him whether this was not bad enough, and a sufficient ground for God to go upon in casting off this people, and abandoning them to ruin? Could he, or any one else, expect any other, but "that vigorate his life," observing that they have seldom been correctly rendered. The Syriac says that the life of a man in his iniquity shall not endure, which is nearly the true sense.

vii. 16. The sense of this may be, "Let their fugitives escape, and be on the mountains like doves from the ravines, all of them cooing, every one for his iniquity." The idea is plain enough: as doves driven from the ravines below take refuge on the mountains, so would the Jews flee from their homes to seek other shelter, and bewail their sorrows like the fugitive doves. The "iniquity" is of course applicable only to the men.

vii. 19. Their wealth would not, as on ordinary occasions, be of any avail, but would be rejected as worthless in comparison of personal safety. The word rendered "removed" is not exactly correct, the sense being that wealth would be loathed and abominated.

vii. 20. The sense of the first clause is not certain. By some, as Dr. Boothroyd, it is understood of personal jewels and the like;

God should go far from his sanctuary," when there were such abominations committed there, in that very place; nay, was he not perfectly driven thence? They did these things designedly, and on purpose that he should leave his sanctuary, and "so shall their doom be." They have hereby, in effect, like the Gadarenes, desired him "to depart out of their coasts," and therefore he will depart; he will no more dignify and protect his sanctuary as he has done, but will give it up to reproach and ruin. But, 2nd. Though this is bad enough, and serves abundantly to justify God in all that he brings upon them, yet the matter will appear to be much worse. "But turn thee yet again," and thou wilt be amazed to "see greater abominations" than these. Where there is one abomination, it will be found there are many more. Sins do not go alone.

7 And he brought me to the door of the court; and when I looked, behold a hole in the wall. 8 Then said he unto me, Son of man, dig now in the wall: and when I had digged in the wall, behold a door. 9 And he said unto me, Go in, and behold the wicked abominations that they do here. 10 So I went in and saw; and behold every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel, pourtrayed upon the wall round about. 11 And there stood before them

seventy men of the ancients of the house of Israel, and in the midst of them stood Jaazaniah the son of Shaphan, with every man his censer in his hand; and a thick cloud of incense went up. 12 Then said he unto me, Son of man, hast thou seen what the ancients of the house of Israel do in the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery? for they say, The LORD seeth us not; the LORD hath forsaken the earth.

We have here a farther discovery of the abominations that were committed at Jerusalem, and within the confines of the temple too. Now observe,

First. How this discovery is made. God in vision brought him to "the door of the court," the outer court, along the sides of which the priests' lodgings were. God could have introduced him at first into "the chambers of imagery," but he brings him to them by degrees, partly to employ his own industry in searching out these mysteries of iniquity, and partly to make him sensible with what care and caution those idolaters concealed their idolatries. Before the priests' apartments they had run up a wall to make them the more private, that they might not lie open to the observation of those who passed by, a shrewd sign they did something that they had reason to be ashamed of. "He that doth evil hates the light." They were not willing that those who saw them in God's house should see them in their own, lest they should see them contradict themselves, and undo in private what they did in public. But behold "a hole in the wall," ver. 7, a spy-hole, by which you might see that which would give cause to suspect them. When hypocrites screen themselves behind the wall of an external profession, and with it think to conceal their wickedness from the eye of the world, and carry on their designs the more successfully, it is hard for them to manage it with so much art, but that there is some hole or other left in the wall, something that betrays them to those who look diligently not to be what they pretend to be. The ass's ears, in the fable, appeared from under the lion's skin. This hole in the wall Ezekiel made wider, and "Behold, a door," ver. 8. This door he goes in by into the treasury, or some of the apartments of the priests, and sees "the wicked abominations that they do there," ver. 9. Note, Those that would discover the mystery of iniquity in others, or in themselves, must accomplish a diligent search; for Satan hath his wiles, and depths, and devices, which we should not be ignorant of, and "the heart is deceitful above all things;" in the examining of it therefore we are concerned to be very strict.

Secondly. What the discovery is. It is a very melancholy one.

1. He sees a chamber set round with idolatrous pictures; ver. 10, "All the idols of the house of Israel," which they had borrowed from the neighbour nations, were "pourtrayed upon the wall round about," even the vilest of them; the forms of creeping things which they worshipped, and beasts, even abominable ones, that are poisonous and venomous; at least they were abominable when they were worshipped. This was a sort of a pantheon, a collection of all the idols together, which they paid their devotions to. Though the second commandment, in the letter of it, forbids only graven images, yet painted ones are as bad, and as dangerous.

2. He sees this chamber filled with idolatrous worshippers, ver. 14. There were seventy men of the elders of Israel offering incense to these painted idols. Here was a great number of idolaters, strengthening one another's hands in this wickedness; though it was in a private chamber, and the meeting industriously concealed, yet here were seventy men engaged in it. I doubt these elders were many more than those in Babylon, that sat before the prophet in his house, ver. 1. They were seventy men, the number of the great Sanhedrim, or chief council of the nation, and, we have reason to fear, the same men; for they were the ancients of the house of Israel, not only in age, but in office, who were bound by the duty of their place to restrain and punish idolatry, and to destroy and abolish all superstitious images wherever they found them. Yet these were they that did themselves worship them in private; so undermining that religion which in public they professed to own and promote, only because by it they held their preferments. They had "every man his censer in his hand;" so fond were they of the idolatrous service, that they would all be their own priests. And very prodigal they were of their perfumes in honour of these images, for "a thick cloud of incense went up," that filled the room. O that the zeal of these idolaters might shame the worshippers of the true God out of their indifferency to his service! The prophet took particular notice of one that he knew, who stood in the midst of these idolaters, as chief among them; being, perhaps, president of the great council at this time, or most forward in this wickedness. No wonder the people were corrupt, when the elders were so. The sins of leaders are leading sins.

Thirdly. What the remark is that is made upon it; ver. 12, "Son of man, hast thou seen this?" Couldst thou have imagined that there was such wickedness committed? It is here observed concerning it, 1. That it was done in the dark, for sinful works are works of darkness. They concealed it, lest they should lose their places, or at least their credit. There is a great deal of secret wickedness in the world, which the day will declare; the "day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God." 2. That this one idolatrous chapel was but a specimen of many the like. Here they met together to worship their images in concert, but it should seem they had every man the chamber of his imagery besides, a room in his own house for this purpose, in which every man gratified his own fancy with such pictures as he liked best. Idolaters had their household gods, and their family worship of them in private; which is a shame to those who call themselves Christians, and yet have no church in their house, no worship of God in their family. Had they chambers of imagery, and shall not we have chambers of devotion? 3. That atheism was at the bottom of their idolatry. They worship images in the dark, the images of the gods of other nations; and they say, Jehovah, the God of Israel, whom we should serve, "seeth us not, Jehovah hath forsaken the earth," and we may worship what god we will, he regards us not. 1st. They think themselves out of God's sight; "They say, The Lord seeth us not." They imagined, because the matter was carried on so closely, that men could not discover it, nor did any of their neighbours suspect them to be idolaters, that therefore it was hid from the eye of God; as if there were any "darkness, or shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves." Note, A practical disbelief of God's omniscience is at the bottom of our treacherous departure from him. But the church argues right as to this very sin of idolatry; Ps. xliv. 20, "If we have forgotten the name of our God, and stretched forth our hand to a strange god, shall not God search this out?" No doubt he shall. 2nd. They think themselves out of God's care. "The Lord hath forsaken the earth," and looks not after the affairs of it, and then we had as good worship any other god as him. Or, he hath forsaken our land, and left it to be a prey to its enemies; and therefore it is time for us to look out for some other god, to whom to commit the protection of it our one God cannot or will not deliver us, and therefore let us have many. This was a blasphemous reflection upon God, as if he had forsaken them first, else they would not have forsaken him. Note, Those are ripe indeed for ruin, who are arrived to such a pitch of impudence as to lay the blame of their sins upon God himself.

13 He said also unto me, Turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations that they do. 14 Then he brought me to the door of the gate of the LORD's house which was toward the north; and, behold, there sat women weeping for Tammuz. 15 Then said he unto me, Hast thou seen this, O son of man? turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations than these. 16 And he brought me into the inner court of the LORD's house, and, behold, at the door of the temple of the LORD, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, with their backs toward the temple of the LORD, and their faces toward the east; and they worshipped the sun toward the east. 17 Then he said unto me, Hast thou seen this, O son of man? Is it a light thing to the house of Judah that they commit the abominations which they commit here? for they have filled the land with violence, and have returned to provoke me to anger: and, lo, they put the branch to their nose. 18 Therefore will I also deal in fury: mine eye shall others, with Clarke, think the reference is to the Temple; others, again, suppose the ark of the covenant is intended. We believe the Temple is meant, and instead of "as for the beauty of his ornament," would render the words "and his beautiful ornament," in accordance with our idiom. The expression "and they made the images of their abominations," &c., we should render "and they made their abominable images, and their detestable things," &c. They had not merely set up in the Temple their idols, but they had practised pagan rites.

vii. 21, 22. The subsequent history of the Temple affords abundant illustrations of this prediction, and is the best commentary upon it.

vii. 27. The words "according to their deserts will I judge them" are not quite correct; the Hebrew is "and by (or according to) their judgments will I judge them."

viii. 3. We must understand this not of a bodily removal to Jerusalem, but of a spiritual influence, by which the prophet was enabled to see what was going on there. What is meant by the image not spare, neither will I have pity: and though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them.

Here we have,

First. More and greater abominations discovered to the prophet. He thought what he had seen was bad enough, and yet, ver. 13, "Turn thee again, and thou shalt see greater abominations," and greater still, ver. 15, as before, ver. 6. There are those who live in retirement, that do not think what wickedness there is in this world; and the more we converse with it, and the farther we go abroad into it, the more corrupt we see it. When we have seen that which is bad, we may have our wonder at it made to cease, by the discovery of that which upon some account or other is a great deal worse. We shall find it so in examining our own hearts, and searching into them; there is a world of iniquity in them, a great abundance, and variety of abominations; and when we have found out much amiss, still we shall find more; for the heart is desperately wicked, who can know it perfectly? Now the abominations here discovered were,

1. "Women weeping for Tammuz," ver. 14. An abominable thing indeed, that any should choose rather to serve an idol in tears than to serve the true God "with joyfulness and gladness of heart;" yet such absurdities as these are they guilty of who "follow after lying vanities," and "forsake their own mercies." Some think it was for Adonis, an idol among the Greeks; others for Osiris, an idol of the Egyptians, that they shed these tears. The image, they say, was made to weep, and then the worshippers wept with it. They bewailed the death of this Tammuz, and anon rejoiced in its returning to life again. These mourning women sat at the door of the gate of the Lord's house, and there shed their idolatrous tears, as it were in defiance of God, and the sacred rites of his worship; and some think, with their idolatry, prostrating themselves also to corporeal whoredom; for these two commonly went together, and they that dishonoured the Divine nature by the one were justly "given up to vile affections," and a reprobate sense, to dishonour the human nature, which nowhere ever sunk so far below itself as in these idolatrous rites.

2. Men worshipping the sun," ver. 16. And this was so much the greater an abomination, that it was practised "in the inner court of the Lord's house, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar;" there, where the most sacred rites of their holy religion used to be performed, was this abominable wickedness committed. Justly might God in jealousy say to those who thus affronted him at his own door, as the king to Haman, "Will he force the queen also before me in the house?" Here were about twenty-five men giving that honour to the sun which is due to God only. Some think they were the king and his princes. It should rather seem that they were priests, for this was the court of the priests, and the proper place to find them in. They that were intrusted with the true religion had it committed to their care, and were charged with the custody of it, they were the men that betrayed it. 1st. They "turned their backs towards the temple of the Lord," resolvedly forgetting it, and designedly slighting it, and putting contempt upon it. Note, When men turn their backs upon God's institutions, and despise them, it is no marvel if they wander endlessly after their own inventions. Impiety is the beginning of idolatry and all iniquity. 2nd. They turned "their faces towards the east, and worshipped the sun," the rising sun. This was an ancient instance of idolatry. It is mentioned in Job's time, Job xxxi. 26, and had been generally practised among the nations, some worshipping the sun under one name, and others under another. These priests finding it had antiquity, and general consent and usage on its side, (the two pleas which the papists use at this day, in defence of their superstitious rites, and particularly this of worshipping towards the east,) practised it in the court of the temple, thinking it an omission that it was not inserted in their ritual. See the folly of idolaters, in worshipping that as a god, and calling it Baal, 'a lord,' which God made to be a servant to the universe, (for so the sun is, and so his name Shemesh signifies, Deu. iv. 19;) and in adoring the borrowed light, and despising the Father of lights.

Secondly. The inference drawn from these discoveries; ver. 17. "Hast thou seen this, O son of man?" And couldst thou have thought ever to see such things done in the temple of the Lord? Now,

1. He appeals to the prophet himself concerning the heinousness of the crime. Can he think it is a "light thing to the house of Judah," who know and profess better things, and are dignified with so many privileges above other nations? Is it an excusable thing in them that have God's oracles and ordinances, "that they commit the abominations which they commit here?" Do not they deserve to suffer that thus sin? Should not such abominations as these make desolate? Dan. ix. 27.

2. He aggravates it from the fraud and oppression that were to be found in all parts of the nation; "They have filled the land with violence." It is not strange if they that wrong God thus make no conscience of wronging one another, and with all that is sacred trample likewise upon all that is just. And their wickedness in their conversations made even the worship they paid to their own God an abomination, Isa. i. 11, &c.: "They fill the land with violence," and then they return to the temple "to provoke me to anger" there; for even their sacrifices, instead of making an atonement, do but add to their guilt. They "return to provoke me;" that is, they repeat the provocation; do it, and do it again. And "lo, they put the branch to their nose," a proverbial expression, noting perhaps their scoffing at God, and having him in derision; they snuffed at his service, as men do when they put a branch to their nose. Or, it was some custom used by idolaters in honour of the idols they served. We read of garlands used in their idolatrous worship, Acts xiv. 13, out of which every zealot took a branch, which they smelled to as a nosegay. Dr. Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. in Jno. xv. 6, gives another sense of this place: 'They put the branch to their wrath,' or to 'his wrath,' as the Masorites read it; that is, they are still bringing more fuel (such as the withered branches of the vine) to the fire of Divine wrath, which they have already kindled, as if that wrath did not burn hot enough already. Or, 'putting the branch to the nose,' may signify the giving of a very great affront and provocation either to God or man; they are an abusive generation of men.

3. He passeth sentence upon them, that they shall be utterly cut off. Therefore, because they are thus furiously bent upon sin, I will also deal in fury with them, ver. 18. They filled the land with their violence, and God will fill it with the violence of their enemies; and he will not lend a favourable ear to the suggestions either, 1st. Of his own pity; "Mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity." Repentance shall be hid from his eyes. Or, 2nd. Of their prayers; "Though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them," for still their sins cry louder for vengeance than their prayers cry for mercy. God will now be as deaf to their prayers as their own idols were, on whom they cried aloud, but in vain, 1 Kin. xviii. 26. Time was when God was ready to have heard, even "before they cried," and to "answer while they were yet speaking;" but now "they shall seek me early, and not find me," Pr. i. 28. It is not the loud voice, but the upright heart, that God will regard.

CHAPTER IX.

The prophet had, in vision, seen the wickedness that was committed at Jerusalem, in the foregoing chapter, and we may be sure it was not represented to him worse than really it was. Now here follows, of course, a representation of their ruin approaching; for when sin goes before judgments come next. Here is, I. Preparation made of instruments that were to be employed in the destruction of the city, ver. 1, 2. II. The removal of the Shechinah from the cherubim to the threshold of the temple, ver. 3. III. Orders given to one of the persons employed, who is distinguished from the rest, for the marking of a remnant to be preserved from the common destruction, ver. 3, 4. IV. The warrant signed for the execution of those that were not marked, and the execution begun accordingly, ver. 5—7. V. The prophet's intercession for the mitigation of the sentence, and the denial of any mitigation, the decree being now gone forth, ver. 8—10. VI. The report made by him that was to mark the pious remnant of what he had done in that matter, ver. 11. And this shews an usual method of providence in the government of the world.

HE cried also in mine ears with a loud voice, saying, Cause them that have charge over the city to draw near, even every man with his destroying weapon in his hand. 2 And, behold, six men came from the way of the higher gate, which lieth toward the north, and every man a slaughter weapon in his hand; and one man among them was clothed with linen, with a writer's inkhorn by his side: and they went in, and stood beside the brasen altar. 3 And the glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub, whereupon he was, to the threshold of the house. And he called to the man clothed with linen, which had the writer's inkhorn by his side; 4 And the LORD said unto him, Go through the midst of the city, through the midst of Jerusalem, and set a mark upon the foreheads of the men that sigh and that cry for all the abominations that be done in the midst thereof.

In these verses we have,

First. The summons given to Jerusalem's destroyers to come forth and give their attendance. He that appeared to the prophet, ch. viii. 2, that had brought him to Jerusalem, and had shewed the wickedness that was done there, "he cried, Cause them that have charge over the city to draw near," ver. 1. Or, as it might better be read, and nearer the original, 'They that have charge over the city are drawing near.' He had said, ch. viii. 18, I will deal in fury; now, saith he to the prophet, thou shalt see who are to be employed as the instruments of my wrath. Appropinquaverunt visitationes civitatis,—'The visitations,' or 'visitors, of the city are at hand.' They would not know the day of their visitation in mercy, and now they are to be visited in wrath. Observe,
